To the most High and Mighty Monarch, ELIZABETH, (my dread Soveraigh) by the grate of God, Queen of England Frances and Ireland, Descinder of the Fairn, Gr.

L L my labour whatsoever, in translating another mans work, I present here unto your Highness, and consecrate to the happy and immortall memory of your most sacred Majesty. An attempt (I confess) in regard of mine own impersections, venturous and overfels In regard of mine win imperfections, Teenwrous and coerbold, as the first enterprise, right hard and exposed to perill. Tet, most Worthy and Powerfull Empress; Who is there so unsufficient, that by the savourable aspect of your countenance, may not be graced and enabled? What so difficult and dangerous, which under the fortunate auspices of your Majesty, caused be effected with ease and pass in safety?

Accept then, most gracious Lady, the first fruits of a few years study, for the benefit enjoyed of life and liberty. An offering, as well in that respects as of myself the meanest of many thousands, under all proportion; but considering either the argument or the sirst Author, not much unsitting. He, in penning the History of the greatest State in his time, for examinite eloquence had not his equall; no more than your Highness in glorious government at this day any second: Such are the incomparable perfections resplendent in your Royall person; the wonder of the world.

Pouchs afe also, of your accustomed elemency shewed to aliens, of your fer vent zeal to learning and good letters, wherein (among other rare currings and singular gifts seated in your Heroick mind) no Prince cometh near unto your Excellency, to reach forth your gracious hand to T. Livius: who having arrived long since and conversed as a meer stranger in this your famous Island, and now for love subcreos learned in some for the language, humbly craveth your Majesties savour to be ranged with other free denizens of that kind: so long to live under your Princely protection, as he shall duly keep his own alleageance, and acquaint your liege subjects with religious devotion after his manner, with wisdom, pollicy-veratue, valour loyalty, and not other wise.

And the Almighty guard your Majesty alwaies with his holy Angels, prolong your life among w in perfect health, adornyour noble heart with dirvine graces, maintain your Regall estate in all honour: bless therest of your daies (and insinite may they be) with sweet repose and sirm peace, to the joy of your true-hearted and loving people; and sinally, accomplish all your desires, for present prosperity and sutre selicity.

Your facred Majesties most humble and obedient subject,

Philemon Holland.

TO THE READER.

Rue is that Axiome received from Philosophy, This we observe to trigge was. i. The corruption of one thing is the generation of another. Thus out of the assess and ruines of Troy sprung the City of Rome: and by the worful sall of that one state, arose not only the most glorious empire of the Romans, but also the best writer of their hi-flory, Tims Livius. For wheras after the fatal destruction of Troy, two principal men of name remained alive, Eneas and Antenor: the one with his fleet arriving in that coast of Italy where Tybre runneth, built Lavinum, and became the first father of the Romans, according to Virgil in the first Eneid:

Albanique patres, alta mænia Romæ:

The noble Albanes eke, and walls of stately Rome.

Amenor entered the Venice gulf, & founded the City of Padua, the native place of Livy their historiographer; as the same Poet writeth a little after:

Hic tamen ille urbem Pata o I sedésque locavit Teucrorum, &c.

Yet here the City Padua built he: therein to plant His Trojanes, left when Troy was loft, who resting seat did want.

And I wot not well, whither they were more beholden to that fortune of theirs, (whereof so much they boasted) for Eneas the author of their beginning and admirable greatnes: than for this writer Livy, who commended their deeds to everlasting fame. For from their very first rising [even with Eneas] unto their sensible declining and decay, were not 1200 years compleat: but since Livy enchronicled their acts, sixteen hundred are come and gone yet continue they as fresh this day as at the first, and spread still far and neer into all parts of the world. So much more durable and permanent are the memorials recorded by learned Historians, than either any Monarchy be is never so great, or all those wonderful Pyramides and Obeliskes, reared by most magnificent Kings, and mighty Emperors, to immortalize their name and memory. This T. Livins then, was born at Padua, in the year 694 after the soundation of Rome, when L. Afranius and Q. Cacilius Metellus Celer were Consuls. He stourished all the time of Augustus Casar, and died in the fourth year of Tiberius. By which account, he lived sull LXXVI. years: as appeareth by an ancient Epitaph upon his tomb at Padua, (where it is thought he died) with the pourtraict of his visage: whereof the one is represented here, and the other immediatly before the beginning of the History.

To the Reader.

Other evidences there be concerning the same, which needless it were to call to witness: for no Epitaph nor inscription either enchased in Rone or cut in brass, is there left, better than the monuments of his own writings (if they had come entite to our hands) and the testimony of good and approved authors. For during the time of Augustus, he wrote the worthy deeds of the Romans, and continued the narration thereof from the very foundation of the City of Rome unto the one and twentieth year of his Empire. Aftory of 750 years, and a peece of work for the artificiall frame and elegant setting out, comparable to the best in that kind. My purpole is not here, to enter into a large field and Rhetorical difcourse of his praises in regard of any gists of fortune wherewith he was plentifully enriched: namely, the place of his nativity, a City more ancient by 400 years than Rome; flourishing in martial puissance, able to fet out and maintain 100000 fighting men for the wars; in stately port at home, having a nobility of 400 in number; in gorgeous and costly buildings; in traffique and frequent affluence of Matchants thither; as also, that Venice was a Colony deducted and drawn from thence; and, which is not the leaft, how at this day the famous Vniversity there, affordeth excellent Professors in all kind of learning: nor his happiness and felicity to live and die with the glory and beauty of Rome, and not to behold with his eyes those daies of her declining state & deformity, which in great wildome he foresaw in his spirit, and denounced accordingly: ne yet the special favour wherein he flood with his Prince Augustu, and Livia the Empress: much less then mean I to set forth the singular qualities and perfections of his mind, and namely his rare and passing eloquence, which my pen is more able now to describe and amplify to the worthiness therof, than it was to imitate and express the same in translating of his story. Moreover, if I should set into his commendation, befides that I must needs come far short of his merit, the thing it felf would but renew the just grief, that all learned men have taken for the piteous maime and defect of that notable peece of work & uniform complition which he left unto posterity. For having digested the whole history into an hundred and two and forty books, as Petrarch was of opinion, and as Sigonius therein well collecteth: like as also it is evident by the Breviaries of L. Florus the Epitomist, where f we have 140, with an evident flaw and default of twain, to wit, the 136 and 137: see the partial injury of the time the crooked and maligne destiny of the man ! Books of far less moment and importance, yea, & those of greater antiquity, have been spared & remain safe: but of that work of his, one fourth part hath not escaped the envy of fortune: and that which now is extant, hath been delivered unto us either by fragments of old copies unperfect, or by the over-curious medling of some busy Aristarches of late daies depraved, who with their correcting have corrupted; and in stead of reforming words, have deformed the natural sense and primitive construction. Where, by the way, I must advertise the Reader of that which Pettu Crinitus hath observed, even against the common opinion proved by those who otherwise are well learned, namely that our Author dispensed not this history into Decades: that is to say, futed and forted them not into several Tomes and Sections of ten books a peece. For Priscian and other old Grammarians, when they cite any testimony out of Livy, quote the book, and make no mention at all of any Decade; and with him the above-named Petrarch, Florus, and Politian do agree. Now in these 33 books, so sew as they be preserved as another Palladium out of a generall skare-fire, we may conceive the rare and wonderfull eloquence of our writer in the whole; for the farther he proceedeth into a world, as it were, of matter, the more copious still he floweth, and with such variety, as that he never iterateth one thing twice; but at every change of new affairs, returneth alwaies fresh and gay, furnished with new devises, inventions, and phrases; much like a second Antew, gathering greater strength and more forces still at every turn; or after the manner of a little hill, which issuing from a small source, is maintained with fresh springs and new riverets; and hasting toward the vast Ocean, carrieth a deeper channell and broader stream. For the form of his stile, I refer the readers to the sound and staid judgment rather of Quintilian, who compareth him with Herodotus, Thueydides, and the best Greeks; than to the fantasticall conceits of some Criticks of our time, who seeking nodum inscirpo, have dreamed of I wot not what Patavinity in him. What should I speak of that Patheticall spirit of his in moving affections? But, that which most of all commendeth an history, which being lux veritatis, ought especially to deliver with fincerity the whole truth and nothing but the truth, without respect of sace or person; to keep only to the substance and train of the subject argument; the due and orderly regard of the important circumstances thereto belonging, without incerting extravagant and impertinent by-matters, much less than fabulous tales; therein he hath the prick and price above all others. For, neither forbeareth he to reprove (as occasion is offered) the Romans, in whose favour he might be thought to have written; nor doubteth to praise the good parts and the valiant exploits of their mortall enemies. The Gauls he may feem to gall more bitterly upon a finister affection, glancing at them, as he doth, in many places for their greedy defire of gold and idle floath, as not able to endure any long travell, and heatleast of all; yet so, as the French, now living, feem not much offended therewith; for above other Nations they have given him most friendly entertainment, and twice enfranchised him among them. I am not unwilling to touch by the way this principall point and vertue of an Historiographer, I mean the delivery of a simple truth in his narrations; for that I have observed in him throughout, that he hath been most modest in reporting from others by hearsay anything that foundeth to an untruth; so little deserveth he to be noted with the infamous brand of lier. The wary circumspection of his in that behalf which I dare be bold to recommend unto the Reader, I proposed unto my self in making him English, endeavouring by conference especially of the select copies in Latine, yet not rejecting other translations (such as

I had some little skill in) to come as near as possibly I could, to the true meaning of the Author; making this account, that if I could approve my diligence that way to men of reason and understanding, all other my wants and defects might sooner be passed by and pardoned. A defire I had to perform, in some fort, that which is profitable to the most, namely, an english History of that C.W. which of all others (if I have any judgment) affoordeth most plenteous examples of devout zeal in their kind, of wisdome, pollicy, justice, valour, and all vertues whatsoever. According to this purpose and intent of mine I framed my pen, not to any affected phrase, but a mean and popular stile. Wherein, if I have called again into use some old words, let it be attributed to the love of my country language: if the sentence be not so concise, couched and knit together, as the originall, loath I was to be obscure and dark; have I not englished every word aprly? Each Nation hath severall manners, yea, and terms appropriate by themselves; have I varied in some places from the French or Italian? Censured I look to be, and haply reproved; but like as Alcibiades faid to one, adragov ir si axusov, i.e. Strike hardly (Euribiades) so you bear me speak; even lo I say, Find fault and spare not; but withall, read the originall better before ye give sentence. And howsoever I have faulted otherwise by overlight, set against it my affection and desire to do some good whiles I live to my fweet native country; add thereto the long travell that I have taken to reftifie the fame; and if that will not bring down the ballance, let the profit and delight both, which you shall find in the argument and discourse of the history, counterpoise and overweigh my wants, more or less And thus I recommend unto my countrimen Lingin english habit; Ling(1 (ay) who whether he were more honored whiles he lived, than beloved at this day of forrain nations, I cannot easily determine for like as then (by the testimony of S. Hieron, and Plingen his Epiteles) there repaired many great and noble personages from the fartheli pairs of Spannand France, only to lee his face, for the admizzion they concerned a him by the fame of his incomparable eloquence zero to which yet liveth in his writings) hath made a voyage by Flerence into the fame France and Spain; and hath passed as far as into Arabia one way, and Almain another. In which disfite and remote parts he hath found such kind entertainment, not only in Courts of Emperors and Kings, in palaces of Princes and great Potentates; but also with the people in generall; that they seem to strive no less (who may endow him with most ample franchises and free burgeosie)than those seven cities in old timewho every one challenged to themselves the birth of the Poet Homer. Since then, he hath thus long been defirous to cross the seas into this noble Island, not as a traveller to sojourn for a time in the Court only or the Vniversities, but to remain here still both in City and country, and thereto hath learned our language indifferently; let it now appear that this nation of ours (like to reap as great fruit and benefit by his acquaintance as any other) is ready to receive and embrace him as friendly as the rest.

OF THE HISTORIES

OF PAD VA FROM THE FOUNDATION OF THE CITY OF ROME.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the First Book.

He comming of Eneas into Italy, and his acts there: the reign of Ascanius in Alba: of Sylvius Æneas, and fo forth of other Sylvii, Kings thereof, are contained in the first Book. The daughter of Numitor with child by Mars, Romulus and Remus are born, Amulius killed. The City of Rome built by Romulus. The Senate by him chofen. He made war Romalus. with the Sabins. He presented unto Jupiter Feretrius the royall spoiles of their King, whom he flew with his own hands. He divided the people into Centuries, vanguished the Fidenates and Veientians, and was canonized a god, Numa Pompilus taught the rites and ceremonies of Numa Pampi Catrifice and divine service, creeked a Temple to Janus, and was the fift that shut the doores thereof, after he had made peace with all the Nations thereabout: and faining that he had secret company and conference by was acquit for killing his fifter. The execution of Metius Suffetius. Alba rased and d stroyed. The Aibans made free denizens of Rome, and there dwelt. War denounced against the Sabines. Finally, Tullus was con-Sumed with lightning . Ancus Mattius renewed the ceremonies by Numa first ordained. It it the Latines, be- snow M& ing conquered and made Citizens of Rome, he assigned the mount Aventine to inhabit. He won again by 1164 the force a town of the Latines called Politorium, which the old Latines had surprised and possessed a themselves of and utterly destroyed it, He made the Sublician or wooden bridge over Tybris, and adjoyned to the City the hill Janiculum. He enlarged the bounds of the Empire built Offia and reigned three and thirty years. In the time of his raign, Lucumo the fon of Demaratus a Corinthian, removed from Tarquins, a City of Tuscane, and came to Rome: and there entring into amity with Ancus, legan to bear the name of Tarquinius, and so to be called: and after the death of Ancustook, the Kingdom upo 1 him. He encreased the number of the Senators by one hundred subdued the Latines appointed the Circus or Theater, set forth the publike games and plaies: and being warred upon by the Sabines, he augmented the centuries of the horsemen. And for to make proofe and triall of Accius Navius the Augur his cunning, he demaided of him, as they (ay, whether that which he conceived in his mind were possible to be effected: and when he made answer, that it was, he commanded him to cut a wherstone in two with a razor, which out of hand was by Accius done. Moreover he man the field of the Sabines, and defeated them, malled the City about, made the vaulted finks: and when he had raigned eight and thirty years, was murdered by the fons of Ancus. There succeeded after him Servius Tullius, the fon of a Captive, anothe Lady of Corniculum, who being a child and lying fwad- Servius Tullsled in the cradle had a flame of fire (as the report goeth) burning about his head. He discomfitted the Veien-

D tes and Tulcanes in baitell: He was the first that numbred the people of Rome, valued their goods and infituted the Lustrum every sive years, in which were reputed to have been numbred eighty thousand Citizens. He described the Classes and Centuries: set out further the bounds of the Pomarie without and within the City wals: and put to the City the hils Quirinalis Viminalis, and Equilinus, He together with the Latines founded the Temple of Diana in mount Aventine, and when he had raigned four and thirty years, he was, with the privity, and by the counfell of his daughter Tullia, murdered by L. Tarquinius, the fon of Pricus, After him L. Tarquinius Superbus usurped the Kingdom, without the election either of the Set Tanquin nators or the prople On which dir Tullia (most wicked and cursed wretch that she was) caused her Coach to be driven over the Corps of her father, lying dead on the ground. He had about him a troup of armed men Eforthe gnard of his perfor. By a fubrile wile he put to death Turnus Herdonius. He had war with the Volseians, and of their spiles edified a Templeto Jupiter, on the hill Capitall, where the god Terminus and goddeffe Juvencas, agreed not to be displaced, whose altars could not be stirred nor removed, as the others. By the fraudulent practife of his son Sex, Tarquinius he brought the Gabians to his obersance. Unto his other H two sous, being gone to Delphi, and consisting there the Oracle, whether of them should be King of Rome, answer was n. ade, That he should reign who first kissed his mother : which answer they interpreting wrong, Junius Brutus, who accompanied them in their voyage, made as though he cought a fall, and kiffed the ground, the mother indeed of all: which proved true on his part as it fell out in the end. For when as Tarouinius Superbus by his proud tyrannicall demeanour, had incurred the hatred of all men: he at last upon quintus superious of the production of the foreible outrage and villary done by Sex, Tarquinius (his son) in the night season upon the body of Lu-(Kilia: who sending for her f, ther Tricipitinus, and her hust and Collatinus, besought them earness the new metally not to see her death unrevenged, and so with a knife killed her selfe : he, I say, by the means of Brutus, especially was driven and expelled out of Rome, when he hadraigned five and twenty years. Then were the Confuls I first created, Lu. Jun. Brutus, and Lu. Taroninius Collatinus.

The Preface of Titus Livius to bis whole Work.

Hether in writing the acts and affairs of the people of Rome, from the first Foundation of the City, I shall perform a work of importance and worth my travail, reither wot I well, nor if I wift, dare I avouch : feeing it is a thing both old and usuall, that new Writers alwaies perswade themselves, either in matter to deliver more truth and certainty, or in manner of curious penning thereof, to outgo the rudenesse of elder time. How- K foever it fall out, this yet will do me good, that even I also to the utmost of my power, have endeavoured to eternize the worthy deeds of that people which is the foveraign of the whole world. And if, among to many Writers, my fame chance to be obscure, yet may I comfort my selfe in this, That they who shall darken and shadow the same, are men to highly reputed and renowned. Befides, the thing it felf is of infinite toile and labour, as counting and comprizing from above 700 years palt, and which arising from small beginning hath proceeded and grown so great, as now the bigneffe thereof is combrous to it self: and I doubt not, but the Readers for the most part will take but small delight and pleasure, either in those far-fetched Originals, or in the times next ensuing, for not timal designt and pleasure, earlier in those har received expanses on in the times next entiting, for halfe they make to their novelties of later daies, wherein the puillance of that for mighty people hath wrought long fince their own downfall and overthrow. But I contrariwise will leek even this for L guerdon of my pains, namely, to turn away from beholding these calamities, which this our Age for many years bath feen, to long at leaft: whileft I call to remembrance, and wholly employ my fpirits in confidering those ancient monuments of old time, exempt from care and trouble, which were able, if not to withdraw my mind as I write from the truth, yet to make it pensive and heavy. As for inch things as are reported, either before, or at the Foundation of the City, more beautified and fet out with Poets Fables, than grounded upon pure and faithfull Records, I mean neither to aver nor disprove. This leave and priviledge hath antiquity, by interlacing the asts of gods and mentogether to make the first rising of Cities more facred and venerable. And if it may be lawfull for any people under heaven to confectate and ascribe unto the godstheir Originall, surely, such is the renowned martiall prowefs of the Romans, that all nations of the world may as well abide them to M report Mars above the reft, to be the primefather both of themselves and of their first founder, as they can be content to live in subjection under them. But these and such like matters, howsoever they shall hereaster be censured or esteemed, I will not greatly weigh and regard. This would I have every man rather to think upon in good earnest, and consider with me what their life, and what their carriage was, by what men and means, both in war and peace, their dominion was achieved and en-larged. Afterward as their discipline began by little and little to shrink, let him mark how at the very first their behaviour and manners sunk withall: and how still they fell more and more to decay and ruin yea, and began foon after to tumble down right even untill these our daies, wherein we can neither endure our own fores, nor falves for the cure. For this is it that is so good and profitable in an history, when a man may see and behold, as in a conspicuous monument and lightsom memoriall N the lively examples of all forts, fet up in open view for his instruction, whereout he may chuse for himself and his Country what to follow, as also learn how to eschew a foul enterprise, and avoid a shamefull end. But unlesse I be deceived with the affectionate love of mine own commenced work. never was there Common-weal, either more mighty, more holy, and devout, betterstored of good presidents, or into which covetousnesse and excesse more lately crept, or wherein poverty and frugality were to greatly or to long time honoured, intomuch as the more they wanted, the leffe they defired. Now of late daies wealth hath brought in avarice, abundant pleasures have kindled a defire by rior. Inff, and loofe life, to destroy and bring all to naught. But these complaints, which will be nothing pleasant, no not when perhaps they shall be needfull, banish we must (howsoever we do) at our first entrance of so weighty a matter: when as we rather should begin (if as the Poets use, it o were our manner also) with good presages and lucky forespeakings, with vows and prayers to gods and goddesses, to vouchsafe their furtherance and happy successe to the enterprise of so great a

Is of all this is generally held for certain, That the Greeks, after the winning of Trop, dealt cruelly with all the Trojans, fave only Eneas and Amenor: to whom, as well in regard of the bond of mutuall entertainment, as also for that they ever perswaded peace and the rendring again of Hilen, they wholly forbare to shew any rigour at all, as by martiall right of war they might have done. And how Antenor afterwards, accompanied with a number of Henetians, who driven by civill discord out of Papi lagonia, and having lost ye at Troy their King Pylemenes, were to leek both a refling place, and a Captain feeded from yet through many adventures and accidents of fortune, in the immolf oulf of mania people of the control of the to conduct them, arrived through many adventures and accidents of fortune, in the inmost gulf of "

The place of the second that the Eugenians that the Eu where first they landed, called Troy, whereof the Territory and Seigniory thereabout was also named dee of Auto Troy, and the whole people in generall called Henetians. Moreover, how Aneas upon like misfortune, having fled his countrey, yet alpiring by the fatall direction of the deftinies to greater affairs. came first into Macedony: and after into Sicily, seeking an abiding place: and failing with a fleer from Sicily arrived at length, and landed in the countrey of Laurentum: which place likewife was from Sicily arrived at length, and landed in the country of their long wandring nothing in a termed Trop. Where the Trojans being fet a shore, having after their long wandring nothing in a termed trop. manner left them but ships and armour, as they forraged and drave booties out of the Countrey, Kitte Latinus with the Aborigines, who at that time inhabited those parts, ran forth in warlike man-C ner out of town and countrey, to withstand the violent invasion of these strangers. But what beself thereupon, is two manner of waies reported. Some fay, that Latinus being in a battell vanquished, first madepeace with Eneas, and after that allied himself to him by marriage. Others affirm, that as both armies stood ranged in battell array, before the trumpers founded the battell, Latinus came forth into the Vanguard, and called out the Generall of the strangers to parle : demanding who they were, from whence they came, by what chancethey departed from their own home, and to what end they entred the Laurentine borders? After that he heard the company were Trojans, the Captain Eseas, fon of Venus and Anchifes, and that upon the burning of their City, they having forgone their countrey, fought some place to abide and build them a City in: wondred much, not only at the noblenesse of the people and their leader, but also at their couragious hearts, resolved either for war

D or peace: wherenpon, by giving his right hand he plight his troth, and faithfully promifed them friendship and amity. So the two Generals made a League, and each host saluted other. And Eneas was by Latinus entertained and lodged in the Court. Where Latinus folemnly in presence of his fawas by Latinize electricity and the state of abode. Tercupon a Town to will be will be the second of th Whom Lavinia, before Amas his coming, had been espoused, taking it to heart that a stranger was E preferred beforehim, made war both upon Enew and Latinus: but neither Army departed from the Bartell with joy and well appaid. For the Rutilians were variouished: the Aborigines and Trojans wah indeed the field, but lost their Captain Lucinus. Then Furnus and the Rutilians mistrusting Lucinus and their own firength, fled for succour to the puissant and mighty Tuscans, and to their King Mesentins, who keeping his Royall Court at Core, a town in those daies of great wealth, not well pleased even from the first beginning, with the foundation of a new City and supposing the Trojans power was already much more encreased than might well stand with the lasety of the borderers, joyned full willingly his forces with the Rutilians, Eneas to win the hearts of the Aborigines against so dreadfull and dangerous war to the end they all should not only live under one government, but also be all of one name, called both Nations Latines. And from that time forth were the Aborigines no- The Latines. F thing inferiour to the Trojans in love and loyalty towards their Prince Eneas, Eneas also truffing

the Alpes to the narrow leas of Sicily: yet whereas he might well have refilted the force of his H enemies, and maintained a defensive war within his wals, he brought his Army forth into the open field. This was the second battell that the Latines fought, and the last deed that ever Anew, whilest and lapoliture he was man, archieved. And how loever by right he ought to be named, he lieth interred upon the ri-of the state of the lapolitude of the lap age to sway the Scepter. Howbeitthe Royall Crown remained whole and sale for him, untill he came to fourteen years of age. So long continued the state of the Latines, and the Kingdom by grandfire and father delicended, unto the childs behoof, under the government only of a woman, as Protectresse: of so vertuous disposition and princely carriage was Dame Lavinia. Doubtfull much Istand (for who can certainly avouch a thing fo longage?) whether this were that Afaming, or noe elder I than he, who had to his mother Create, while Himm flourished, and who fled with his father from thence, and from whom being stamed Mio Tulur, the house and family of the Tulis do fetch their same and pedigree. That same Ascanius, wheresoever, or of whomsoever he was born, (but Aneas his fon of a truth he was) when Lavinium grew exceeding populous, left that City now flourithing and wealthy (as the world went then) unto his mother or stepmother, I wot not whether. He himself built another out of the ground under the mountain Alba, which of the scituation thereof, stretching Ling Alba built another out of the ground inher the mountain Alba, which of the children and built by Alba. Between the building of Lavinium and Long Alba, which became an under-town or Colony drawn out of the other, and peopled from thence, were almost thirty years. But so mighty grew they, especially after the discomsture of the Tulcans, that neither upon the death of Eneas, nor during the time of a womans government, nor w all the while that the young Princelearned to be a King, durst either Mezentins, or the Tulcans, or any other of the borderers once ftir or rife in arms. But peace was concluded upon these termes, That the river Albala, which now they call Tybris, should divide the Tuicans from the Latines, and limit to either of them their own bounds. After this raigned Sylvius, the son of Ascanius, born by chance within the forrests: who begat Eneus Sylvius, and he had issue Latinus Sylvius, by whom were certain Colonies or petty Townships erected, and the inhabitants named Prisci Latini. And from thenceforth all the Kings of Allincontinued the firmame of Sylvius. This Latinus begat Allia, of Alba came Airs, Airs begat Capis, and outling descended Capetins; whose son Tiberinus in ferrying over the river Albala was drowned, and by his name renowned that river unto all posterity. Next unto him raigned Agrippa his son, and after him increeded Romalus Sylvius in his fathers King-L don, who being frucken dead with a thunderbolt, left the Crown to Aventinus. This Aventinus was buried in that hill, which now is part of the City of Rome, and beareth his name. Then raigned Protas, who had two fons, Numitor and Amulius. And unto Numitor, because he was the elder, he bequeathed by his last will and testament the ancient Kingdom of the Sylvians line, Howbeit, might prevailed more than either the will of the father or the reverend regard of elder brother. For Amer list having driven out Numitor, raigneth himselfes and not herewith content, heapeth one mischief upon another. For first he murdered the issue male of his brother then by making Rhea Sylvia his brothers daughter a Vestall Nun and that under colour of honour and dignity, by perpetuall vowed virginity, hebereft her of all hope of child-bearing. But it was a fatall thing, and (as I think) which God would have, that so great a City should be built for to yeeld the ground and beginning M of that Empire, which next under the gods is most mighty. For behold, the Vestall Virgin was by force defloured, and after delivered of two twins: and were it that the thought fo in very deed, or became the name and credit of a god might carry away and cleake the fault more cleanly, the faithered her bastard children upon Mars. But meicher god nor man was able to save her self or her childdien from the Kings cruelty & For the Votary was committed to close prilon, and there kept bound in irons : as for the babes he commanded they should be call into the fiream of the river. But (as God would) by good hap the Tyber overflowed the banks, and the standing waters on either side was nothing rough; yet fo, as there was no coming to the deep current or channell of the very tiver; was nothing rough; yet to, as necessarian and they that brought the infants, hoped well they might be drowned in any place of the water, were in mever for fill and low. So to fulfill after a fort the Kings commandement, they laid the children N in the next plath they came to: even where as now flanderh the fig-wee Runningles galled, as they fay, Romalaris: but all that ground then was nothing but wafte defects, and a very wildernesse. The report yet goeth, that when the ebbe and shallow water was gone, and had left on dry ground the floating trough or veffell, wherein the babes were put forth, a float Wolf from out of the mountains, thereby, being athirft, turned towards the childrens cry, and with her pendant teats fo gently gave the infams luck, that Faighulus the head Reeve and overfeer of the Kings Cattell found her licking them with her tongue: will brought them to his homestall, and gave them to his wife Laurentia to befo-Rered. There be that think, that Laurentia being a common finimpet among these heardmen and the pherds, was usually called Lupa. Whereupon arose the occasion of this strange tale and wondrous miracle. Well, to were they born and to brought up. And as foon as they grew once to some big- O neffe, it was no boot to keep them within doores, mor to fer them idly to tend the cattell, for they would use to hunt abroad in the forrest: whereby having gotten strength of body, and courage withall, they were able now, not only to withfrand the violence of wild beafts, and to kill them, but also to fer upon common robbers by the high-waies fide, laden as they were with booties, and to spoile them thereof, yea, and divide the prey among the shepherds, and as the number of younkers dayly

A daies (as men lay) was the festivall pastime Lupercal, used in mount Palatine, which of Palanteum, Lupercal, a City in Arcadia, was first called Pelantium, and after Palatine, wherein Evander, who descended Evanter. from the Arcadians, long before reigned in that country, and ordained a folemngame and recreation yearly to be held, as aforesime in Arcadia, in this manner: that youngmen in the honor of Pan Pontyeen Lucaus, whom the Romans after called Innus, thould loosely and wantonly run naked. Now whileft of Innus. they were bufily occupied in this kind of sport, which by vow yearly they performed; there lay in ambush the robbers aforesaid, in revenge and for anger of the prizes which they had lost: Where amount the rootest aroterial, interests they took priloner: and being thus taken, they brought Remulus manfully quit himfelf, but Remus they took priloner: and being thus taken, they brought Remulus manfully quit himfelf, but Remus they took priloner:

him before King Amalius, accusing him grievously, and laying especially to his charge, that he with pulsoner B others invaded and made rodes into Numitor his Land, and with a power of lufty youths, affembled in warlike fort, had fortaged and spoiled the same. Thus was Remus delivered unto Numitor to be put to death. Now had Fauftulus even fince the first day conceived some hope, that there were in his housefoster children of royali bloud: For well he wift, that both by the Kings commandment the babes were cast forth to perish, and also that the time when he took them up fell out fitly thereunto: mary this would he in no wife should be known in haste, and before due time; unlesse it were either upon good occasion or great necessity. Necessity happed first: and so for very sear he was driven to reveal the whole matter to Romulus. It happed aifo, that Numitor himlelt having Remus in durance, and hearing they were brethren twins, by comparing their age, and viewing with all their very countenance and towardness, proceeding from no iervile and baic parentage, berhought himfer of his

C fifters children: and by farther enquiry and computation came to far, as he feemed well-near to acknowledge Remus for his nephew. Thus on all hands were means wrought to circumvent and jurprize King Anulius. For Romulus on the one fide not accompanied with a troup of tall fellows, for he was not able in open fight to make his part good ! but giving the herdmen his affiltants, in charge to come at a time appointed, some one way, and some another, to the Kings Palace, he set upon the King. On the other fide, Remus with another cruefrom Numitor his house, came to second him: and in they flew the King. Numitor at the first uprore giving out estioons, that the enemies had entred tne City, and affailed the Kings Palace, and thereupon having called the youth of Alba into the unperlian-Citadell, to keep it by force with a good guard, and espying the two young men after the murder. done, comming towards him with joy: forthwith affembied the people together, and declared o-

The two young men pasthe indicator in 174 in by them established a Thus was the whole Regiment or Kingdom of the Albans committed to Numitor. Then Romilus and Remus had a great defire to found themselves a City in the very place where of Misthey had been cast forth and fostered. Now were there of Albans and Latines both, very many Thefounday that might be spared; besides, a number of herdmen: who all set together, put them ingood hope, that Alba and Lavinium too, would be but small Cities in comparison of that which now was a

E building. Whilest they were devising of these things, an old canker came between to mar all, even postention defire of rule and joveraignty, the same which had troubled their grandfires before them: and between the denie of the and foretagny, the fails which and fight occasion. For a much as they were both thread to be the company of the strength of the company of the twins at one birth, and the respect of their age might yeeld no choice and difference, it was thought good and agreed upon, that the gods, who had the tuition of those places, should by Augury or flight of birds declare and shew whether of the twain should both name the City, and also rule the fame. Romulus chose the mount Palatine, and Remus the Aventine, for their temples or religious quarters, to mark the bird-flight, and each one apart to receive their Augury. First (as they say) had Augury. Remus appearing in flight fix vultures or gripes: and as tidings came unto him of this Augury, it hapned that the number unto Romulus was presented double: whereupon they were both of them by in their affiltants and favorites faluted Kings. The one fide took the vantage of the time: the other of the number, for the prerogative of the Kingdom. Thus they fell to hot words first, and from chothe number, for the precognition of the number, for the people, Remai was woun-lerick words to blows and blondshed: in which stir and preis of the people, Remai was wounded and flain in the place. The more common report goeth, that Remus in scorn of his brother, leapt over the new walls: whereupon Romulus in great choler flue his brother with his own hands, and in menacing wife, added these words withall, So perish he, whatever el'e he be, that shall once dare to leap over my walls. Thus Romulus alone became King, and the City new built, of the founders name was called Rome. Wherein first he fortified mount Palatine, in which he was himself of the reared. To all the rest of the gods he sacrificed after the rule and custome of the Albans: only to Herenles after the manner of the Greeks, according to the first institution of Evander. For the

But as Caess forcibly made head against him, and would have kept him from enrance. Hergules fmote him with his club: and for all his calling upon other herdmen for help flew 1 him outright At the same time Evander, who fled out of Peloponnelus, governed that Countrey, rather by a kind of countenance and authority, than by force and Lordly command. A man much honoted for his wonderfull invention of Letters, a strange and rarething among those rude and unlearned fort; but more honored for the opinion that the people had of his mother Carmenta, reputed to be a goddeffe, whom for her spirit of prophesie, those countries, before that Sybilla came into Ita-Ir. had in great reverence and admiration. This Evander being raifed with the concourse of the shepherds, affrighted about the tiranger, guilty of manifelt murder, and nearing of the fact committed, and the occasion thereof: viewing well therewith the perion of the man, his feature and favour, more stately a good deal, and carrying a greater Majesty than the ordinary proportion of men; demandeth of him who he was. In a good hour be it tpoken (quoth Hercules) and the prefage I gladly accept : and so giving him his hand faithfully promifed to accomplish the will of the gods, and erected it raightwaies and confecrated an Altar in the place. There and then first, he facrificed one of the fairest Oxen, choten out of the whole drove, calling to the ministry of that divine service and feast, the Potitii and Pinarii, two most noble houles at that time in those parts. It happed to, by chance, that the Poriti were ready at hand in due time, and the inwards or intrals were let before them: which being eaten, the Pinarii came to the good chear behind : whereupon the cultome held that to long as the family of the Pinarii continued they might not feed of the facred inwards. But the Pointi, instructed by Evander, became the Priests of that holy facrifice many ages after: untill the folemp fervice and ministery of this family was put over to publike servants, and the whole lock of the Patitis utterly worn out and dead. These were the only forgain facrifices of all other that Ronglus received and admitted, being even then a furtherer and maintainer of immortality, by his own prowels atchieved, and whereunto his fortune conducted him. Having in this manner religiously performed and established the service of the gods, he affembled the multitude to an audience: and for that they could by no means but by Laws be united together into one body and fociety of a people, he deviled Statutes, and ministred justice unto them. And supposing that those Laws would be accounted facred and inviolable of the wild and M rufficall fort of men, in case he shewed himself by some regall entigns venerable: he carried with Royall rober him a greater port and Majefly. not only in his cobes and princely habit, but most of all in the attendance of twelve Officers and Sergeants, called Lietores, whom he caused to go ordinarily before his person. Some think he chose this number according to the birds, which by Augury did foreshew and prognofficate his raign: Trather am of their opinion, who think that Sergeants at Arms, and this kind of Officers came from the Tuscans their neighbours, from whence also the Ivory chair of effate, called Sella curulis, and the Royall purple robe embroidered, named Toga pratexta, was fer hed as also the very number of Serjeants or Lictors. For that the Tuscans had this manner. when they chose their King by the common voices of their twelve principall States, each one found a Sergeant. All this while grew the City more and more to be fortified with Ramparts and Bul-N warks, as men faill built in fundry places where they liked beft, feeming thereby to provide rather for a future multitude in time to come, than for the prefent number wherewith it was then peopled. Fur hermore, left that the City fo large in compatie, should fland void and vacant, Romulus for to en rease the number of the inhabitants (according to the old practise of the founders of Cities, who by gathering about them the base multitude and obscure, seigned that they were an off-foring born out of the earth) fet up a Sanctuary or lawleffe Church, called Afrlum, in that place which at this day between the two groves, is enclosed and fenced round about with thick briers and brambles. Max, i. the best and greatest of all the gods command you to stay and begin the battel aftesh. Herewith the Romans, no less then if they had been commanded from heaven above, made a fland. And Romulus in person hyed him with all speed to the formost in the vanguard Now was Metius Cursius, principal leader of the Sabins, rundownfrom the Caffle, and had featered and chafed the Romans back as far as the Forum or common place of Rome at this day reacheth in length: and being come within a little of the gate of Palatium, he lift up his voice and cried aloud: e Vanquisht we have these faithless friends, and heartless soes: and now know they well, it is one e thing to ravish maidens, and a far other thing to fight with men. In this fort, as he braved it out, Romalus with a troop of lufty youngmen, made head against him, Metius haply at that time fought on Horfeback, whereby he was forced the fooner to recule, and the Romans made after and purfued him. The other battel of the Romans in like manner, being much encouraged with the valour B of their King, discomfited the Sabins Metius with his horse under him, aftrighted at the noise of them that ran after, leaprint a marish or bog thereby. Which accident, considering the danger of fo great a perion, made the Sabins to look back to him. And he verily taking heart again at the calling and encouragement of many of his favourites, escaped. But the Romans and Sabins both, in the middle valley between the two hills, renew the battel again: where the Romans gor the better hand. Then the Sabine Dames, for whole wrongful niage all this war arole, with their hair hanging loofe about their shoulders, and renting their garments, for very grief and forrow pathallfear, ventured to run amongst the javelins and darts as they flew; and thus having thrust themselves violently overthwart between them, began to part these bloody armies, and to end their deadly tend: Beby overting their own fathers on the one fide, and their husbands on the other, that they being fathers women the ching their own fathers on the one fide, and their husbands on the other, that they being fathers women to the first own the fide of and tony in tay, would not employ the means a state of the means and unmaterial of conference and the state of the state o of their body begotten. If ye our fathers, think much (lay they) of the affinity between our bus-" bands and you, or if ye our husbands are dipleated with our marriage, bend all your arger and es malice against us: we are the cause of this war, we are the cause of wounding and killing both constant and father yet will we rather die, then live either Orphais without the one, or Widows without the other. This thing moved as well the multitude of Souldiers, as also the Captains; and prefently of a fudden all was huftet, and the fight ceased. Whereupon, the Generals came forth to conclude a League. Neither made they peace only, but one City of two: united their Realms, and joined rogether in the Regiment : but the royal effate they fetled in Rome,

The City thus being made one of twain, the Romans for to gratifie the Sabins in some fort, were of Cures, a town of the Sabins, called Quinus. And for a memorial of that battel, the very place a of Carety a towns one source years. And for a monoton of the deed marifin first fer his horse on firm groups, was where mrun, auer ne was graten but of the erect manin, increase managed with a property was named Carring his lake. This joyons peace estiming prefently upon to cruel w. r., made these women constitution and of their husbands and parents there especially of Romatas handlet. And therfore when Gain, 10. he divided the City into thirty Wards or Parifices; he called them by their pames. But it is not left in any record (for out of all question the women were far more in number them fo) whether those that should give names unso the Wards, were chosen by age, or by their own dignity and worthiunds, ortheir husbands degree and calling, or by casting lots. At the same time were enrolled and ordained three Centuries of Gentlemen or Knights: The Raminenses were so called of Ramidus, the E Tittenfes of Tittu Testus; but of the name and fift beginning of the Lucerians, the occasion is not ord ABut after certain years the kined of King Tating chanced to bear and evil entreat the Embaf-Jadors of Laurenam. And when as the Laurentines pleaded the law of Nations, for fatisfaction of this outrage; Turius his kinsfolk what by favour, and what by intreaty, prevailed more with him then the just complaint of the others. Whereby he brought vengeance due to them upon his own head : for being come upon a sime to Laviniani, mato a folemn farifice and feath, there is an uproar or hullburly the people ran spote bim, and fo was beddin. Which thing (they fay) Komplus made less regard of then was meet fasther for charfellowihip in Lordhip is never faithful, or because he effected him not injustify toke made away. Whereipon he forbare indeed to make war: yet to p the end the wrong done and o be Emballadors; it getter with the murder of the King, might be explate and purged clean away, the League between the Cities of Rome and Lavinium was renewed.

Bur whilft prace werily was beyond mens expectation with them concluded behold another fresh war arole, much negret then the other, and hard afmon at their very gates, For the people of Fi-And improving the Romans power and riches to entrease over much so neer unto them; before they hould grow to fuch greaters as they were like to do began first to war upon them: and coding a power of lufty tall fouldiers, saveded and wulled allebe country between the City of Rome and Fr-Ame. And taking their way on the left hand, for that the Tyber kept from the other, they forraged and spoiled as they went, to the great fear of the Pealants and Country people. So as this sudden immuk andgarboul heard out of the fields into the City, brought the fift news of the war, Remulus C railed therewith (for to nigh a warmight bearno delay) led forth his army, and encamped within a mile of Fidene: and leaving there a competent guard, he departed thence with all his other forces, commanding part of his souldiers to lie close in certain covere places, among the thickers in ambuthment. Himlest with the greater number, and all his horse, advanced forward, and riding up and downbefore their gates after a difordered and bragging manner, made (emblant of a bravado, and all to train the enemy forth, which was the thing he only fought. This kind of horiefervice was a means that the Kulenares less inspected and meavelled at their flying, which they were to counterfeit. For whilst the Cavalry stood unresolved, as it were, in a mammering whether to fly or fight, G and the Infantry withal began to retire: all at once the enemies in thronging manner fallied forth of the gates, and chased the Romans to fiercely, that in their eager pursuit they were drawn to the very place of ambush. Thencethe Romans suddenly arose, and charged the flanck of the enemies; And to encrease their fright, they likewise that were left behind to guard the camp, shewed themselves with banners displayed, So the Fidenates terrified fundry ways, before well neer that Romulus and his men of arms could rein about their horse-heads, turned their backs, and rodefull gallop towards the town again, and so much the faster, for that they fled now in good earnest themselves, that pursued them, who a little before made but semblance thereof. Yet for all this could they not escape before the gates could be shut against them. At this Fidenatian war spreading so dangerously, the Veientians grew angry in their hearts, and began to chaie. Touched they were also in regard of kin-

the enemy: for the Romans hard at their heels, rushed together with them pel-mel into the town, H

B had not yet tafted the sweetness of liberty and freedom. Besides, the Nobles began to fear, lest peradventure in case the hearts of many Cities thereabouts, should not be well disposed, but provoked against them, some forraign power would make invasion, finding the City without government. and the army without a Captain. Therefore they all liked well to have one head, but none could find in his heart to give place unto another. Whereupon the hundred Senators affociate and combine together in the rule of the Common-weale, by dividing themselves into ten Decuries, and for one together in the time of the Common Heart, by an tangement of interest Decures, and for every Decury chuling one to bear the chiefe authority. So that ten governed at once, but one alone had the regal Enigns and the Lictors before him. This foveraignty and preheminence determined every five days: and thus went it through them all round in course. After which manners they continued the space of one year. And the government upon this occasion was (as it is still at C this day) called Interregnum. Then after a year began the Commons to grudge and mutter, that their fers ittide was greater then before, having now Lords over them an hundred for one : and feemed they would no longer endure, but have a King again, yea, and one of their own change. The Senators feeing them thereabouts, and taking it to be good policy for to offerthat of their own accord, which they were otherwise like to forgo, curried favour with them in this wife, to wit, by granting the chief prerogative unto the people (in chaing a King) yet fo, as they gave them no greater priviledg, then they referred to themselves. For thus it was decreed, that when the people had elected a King, it should stand firm and ratified, if the Senators liked thereof, and gave thereto their royal affent. And even at this day in making of Laws, and chusing of Magistrates of Rulers, the same right is in some sort observed, setting aside the violence of Tribunes. For that now before the peo-D ple give their voices, the Senators passe by their authority, that which they would have done, fall it out in the assembly of people, by scrutiny, doubtful as it will. To proceed then, the Interregent having called a general Parliament: In the name of God (quoth he) O Quarites, and which may be to you good, lucky, and prosperous, elect, or nominate yea new King: for so is the good pleasure of the Nobles and Senators: and in case ye shall elect a man of such quality, as may be deemed worthy to succeed Romalus, then will they by their assent pass the same, and allow thereof. This pleased and contented the Commons so highly, that because they would not seem behind in bounty and courtesie, they answered again, that this only they ordained and agreed upon, to wit, that the Senate should determine who should be King of Rome. There was in thosedays one Numa Pompilus, much renowned and efteemed for his just life and religious: he dwelt in Cares, a City of the Sabins, E a man right skilful and very well seen (as any one might be in that age) in all Laws both divine and humane: whole teacher and first master, for want of other Author of his Science and Knowledge

(they say) but yet untruely, was Pythagoras of Sames, Concerning whom, this is well known, that he 100, years after and above, in the days of Servius Tullius King of Rome, held a School of young men Students, that were his Disciples, and followed his Sect, in theutmost and farthest coast of staly, about Metapontum, Heraclea, and Croton. From which places (albeithe had lived in that time) (3) about rect appriment, the mean, and to the Sabins ? or by what entercourse and affinity of lan-what fame of him could spread to far as to the Sabins ? or by what entercourse and affinity of language might he possibly have trained any man unto him for desire of learning at his hands? or by what good means and help, could Numa travel alone unto him in fafety, through so many countries, of divers congues and fundry manners? I am of this opinion rather, that the man by nature n was framed and disposed to vertue, and that he was instructed, not so much in strange and forraign Sciences, as after that frict rule, that ftern and severe discipline of the ancient Sabins; then whom, there was not a nation in times past, more precise, reformed, and void of corruption. The Roman

Senarors hearing the name of Numa, although they saw well enough, that the Sabins were like to prove of great reputation and power, by chusing their King from among them, yet was there none of them to and actions, as to prefer either themselves, or any one of their party and faction, not any one, Hay, Senator or Citizen, before that man: but allingeneral with one accord, agreed to confer the Kingdom upon Numa Pomp lins, Who being fent for and come; like as Romulus at the founding of the City was inaugurate King, or attained to the Crown by means of Augury: lo also he would needs, that the will and counsel of God should be sought for, touching his own election. Where-

G upon he was by the Augur (unto whom for ever after that publick Ministry or Priesthood, in regard of honor and reverence by patent belonged) brought unto the Castle hill, and there he set him down upon a flone, with his face toward the South. Then the Augur on his left fide, with head over the south of the south ked towards the top, which they called Lituus. From whence after that he had with good advise, the Organ taken a prospect and view towards the City and Country, and made his prayers unto the gods, he limited the quarters of the Heaven, from East to West: and the parts Southward he appointed for

In this mean while the Senators fell to firive who should be King, and the defire of soveraignty troubled much and perplexed their minds. But as yet, there was no banding nor fiding from any one person in particular: for that in a State so newly risen, and of so small continuance, there was not one that far excelled another in authority, All the contention was between the two feveral smitebenot one that let extend a national mental the same and the same and the same are the same and the same are th tactions in general. For they their part, that had raigned with Romalus in equal jurisdiction, they saking for the Crown were delirone to have a King cholen out the Crown. should now lose their possession and title to the Crown, were desirous to have a King choien out of their corporation. The old Romans again might not abide an alien or forraigner to be King. Howbeit, thus diverily affected as they were, a King they all will needs have, as who (God wor) fields, they return again to Veii, The Romans contrariwife, not finding the enemies in the field, but vet provided and resolved to give battel, and to hazzard all, passed over the Tyber, Whom the Veientians understanding to be encamping themselves, fully minded to come against their City: issued forth and met them, intending to try the quarrel by dint of fword, and in open field, rather then to be mued up within the town, and to fight and defend themselves from off their houses and walls and ancount be instead up within the territy from the control of t and supply whatsoever, without policy or stratagem, had the better: and having thus discomfited the enemies, he chased them even to their very walls. And for that the City was exceeding strong, ward, he wasted the country, more upon a mind to revenge, than hope of spoil. With this defeature the Veientians no less subdued then if they had lost a field, sent Orators to Rome to sue for peace: unto whom Truce was granted for an hundred years, but they were amerced to lofe part of their unto whom I ruce was granted to an immuted years, lands. These were in manner all the acts that were done both at home and abroad, during the reign of Romalus. Whereof none seemed to derogate any jot from the opinion, both of his divine birth and beginning, and also of his immortality or deification after his death. Such was his courageous heart in recovering his Grandfires Kingdom: his policy and wildom infounding the City first, and after in effablishing and governing the same, as well in war as in peace. By whose good proceedings it got such strength, and so sure footing, that for forty years space after, it enjoyed peace with safety. Nevertheless of his Commons he was better beloved then of his Nobles: but above all, his

aroue a tempert with great cases of the fact of him. And never after was Romalus feen on earth. The Romany outh, after their fear was at length paft, and that upon lo dark and troublefome weather, it proved a fair day again, and calm withal feeing the Kings Throne empty, albeit they credited the Senators that flood next about him, who gave out he was taken up aloft in the florm: yet flrucken Senators that from feet about min, who gave one to be taken by about in the form: yet thrucken into fad dumps, as it were for the lost of their father, held their peace a good while, But afterwards, when some few of them had once begun, they all set on and cried about, Albait god Romulus the some of a god, King and Father of the Cuty of Rome: With earnest prayer believehing him of his grace, that he would vouchfafe to be propitious, and favetheir off-fpring and posterity for ever. I am of that ne would come there were even then, that suspected and secretly surmised that the King was M pulled in pieces by the hands of the Nobles, For this rumor also was bruited abroad, although in very dark and obscure tearms. But by reason of the high admiration of the man, and the presentear withal, the former opinion took place; and was more currant. Over and befides, it grew the rather within the former opinion to passed and a series of the whole City was penive and for-rowfulfor the mis of their King, and fore displeased with the Senators, one Procular Juliu, a sub-flantial good author (as men lay) and to be believed in a matter of great importance, stepped forth into the affembly. "Romalus (quoth he) O Quiraes, the Founder and Patron of this City, even "this very morning at the day break, descended inddenly down from heaven and met me, and as "I flood all quaking for fear, ready to worship him, and humbly befeeching that I might behold "I flood an quaking to rear, acasy to the Romans that the will of the gods in heaven is, that N as my City of Rome shall be the head and chief of the whole world: will them therefore to follow "and practife chivalry, and the knowledg thereof: and wot this well, and fo let them teach their " posterity, to wit. That no power in the world shall be able to withstand the puissance of the Ro"mans. Which (faid he) was not fo foon spoken, but he ascended on high, and departed. A wonder it was to see, how much they gave credit to this mans tale, and how greatly the miss of Romalus both among the Commons and the Army, was by this belief of his immortality, digested, the right hand, andthose Northward for the lest. And so far as ever he could cast his eye and see H forward, he imagined to himself a mark: then shifting his staff into his lest hand, and laying the right hand upon Name his head, he prayed in this forms. O Father Jupiter, if it may be right and lawful, that this Nama Pompiluus, whose head I lay my hand upon, shall be King of Rome, show I be-seech thee some certain and manifest signs within that compals and those precuncts, that I conceived and set our. Then pronounced he in plain words what tokens by sight or slight of sows the would have to appear. Which being once ieen, Nama was declared King, and so came down from the

Temple or place of prospect abovesaid. In this manner, being inaugurate and invested in the Kingdom, he provideth by good Orders, Laws, and Customs, to re-edifie, as it were, that City, which beforetime had been new built by force I and arms. Whereunto, he feeing that they might not be brought and framed in time of war, whose hearts were already by continual warfare grown wild and favage: and supposing that this fierce people might be made more gentle and tractable, through diffue of arms, he therefore built the Temple of Janus in the nether end of the street Argiletum, in token both of war and peace: with this invention, that being open it should fignifie, that the City was in arms; and standing shut, that all the neighbor countries were in peace and quiet. Twice only after the raign of Numa was this Temple shut : once, when T. Manlim was Consul, after the first Carthaginian war was done and ended: and a second time (as God would) in our age for us to see, when as the Emperor Casar Augufus, after the battel of Actium (with Antonius and Cleopatra) had obtained peace both by Land and Sea. Numathen having knit the hearts of the borderers about him in firm league and amity, K and thereupon closed up the doors of Janus, secured now from all sear and care of dangers abroad. yet doubting lest through ease and idleness their minds might fall to looseness and riot, whom the dread of enemies and martial discipline had held in aw and good order: devised above all things to strike some fear of God into them, and to plant religion in their hearts: a policy no doubt, with the simple multitude (rude in those days and ignorant) most effectual. Which reverence of God, for that it could not fink nor enter well into their heads, and take a deep impression, without some device of a fained miracle, hemade semblance, and gave out, that he conversed in the night season and had. I wot not what, secret conference with the goddess Ageria. By whose counsel and direction forfooth, he ordained fuch divine service and facrifices to the gods, as to them was most acceptable: and to every god appointed leveral Priests for the ministery thereof accordingly. But first a- L bove all other things he divided the year, according to the course of the Moon, into twelve months: and for as much as the Moon hath not full thirty days to every month, whereby fome days are wanting to make up the just year, after the revolution and circle of the Sun: he, by putting the odd days between every month, so disposed and ordered the year, that in every three and twenty years space the days agreed just to the same point of the Sun from whence they began, and so made up the void spaces, and accomplishedfully the term of every year. He appointed likewise law days and days of vacation, called Fafti and Nefafti, thinking it good, that otherwhiles there should be rest from attendance on the Courts, and no dealing with the people. After this, he let his mind about the creation of Priests, albeit in his own person he performed very many sacrifices, especially those which at this day pertain to the Priest of Jupiter, called Flamen Dialis. And supposing that in a City so mar- M tial, there should succeed more Kings like to Romalus then Numa, who in proper person would go forth to war: left haply the divine ministry that belonged to the King, might be neglected, he created a Flamine to Jupiter, for to be a facrificer continually resident: endued and adorned him with a rich cope or vestment, and with an ivory chair of state upon wheels, called Sella curulis, Unto him he adjoined two Flaminesmore; one for Mars, another for Q virinus. He instituted also a Nunnery, as it were, of religious Vestal Virgins. A Priesthood that had the beginning from Alba, and futed well with the house, from whom the first founder of the City was descended. And to the end they should attend continually about the Church, as resiant Chaplains, he allowed them an ordinary fee or pension, at the publick charges of the City: and made them by perpetual vowed virginity, and other ceremonies to be reverenced and accounted holy. Likewise unto Mars Gradious hee- N lected twelve Priests called Salii, and gave unto them a rich purple coat, embroidered for an ornament, and to wear upon that coat a brazen brest-plate, and to bear certain scutchions or bucklers that fell from heaven, called Ancilia: commanding them to run about the City, chanting hymns and fongs, with dancing and leaping full folemnly. Moreover, he chose for a Superintendent or high Priest, Numa Martius, the son of Marcus, one of the Senators : and to him he gave in writing fet down under his hand and feal, a rule, whereby he might know what beafts should be killed for facrifice, upon what days, and at which Temples, and how the money should be levied and disburfed for the defraying of all charges. All other facred rites as well publick as private, he submitted and referred to the discretion and ordering of that high Priest: to this end, that the common people might know unto whom they were to refort for counsel and instruction, and that no part of Q Gods worship and service should by neglect of the ancient rites and traditions of their own country, be confounded and corrupted by bringing in any strange and forraign superstitions. He ordained besides, that the same Arch-Prelate should teach, not only these heavenly ceremonies, but also funeral obsequies, and how the spirits beneath, and ghosts of bodies departed, should be quieted and pacified: and what strange and prodigious tokens, that came by way of lightning, thunder, or any other fearful fight whatfoever, should be expiate and purged by facrifice accordingly.

A for to know the truth, portended by these tokens even from the minds of heavenly spirits above, he-consectated unto Jupiter Elieuse an altar upon the mount Aventine, And by the means of Angury, he considered with that god, what things, he was to enterprize and go about. Whilst the whole multitude was thus drawn away, and clean turned from thinking of lorce and arms, and bussed about devising and ordering of these matters, nor only their minds were occupied in doing somewhat, but also the continual fear of God now settled in them, (as being perhvaded that the heavenly power was present in the managing of mens affairs) had posseled now all their hearts with such pietry and religious holiness, that faithful promise once made, and the reverence of an oath taken, abandoning all sear of law and punishment, was able to rule and govern the City, And B as the people framed and reformed themselves to the fashions and manners of their King, as the only and special pattern to follow: for the nations likewise bordering upon them, who before time verily thought that City to be built, and as it were encamped in the midit of them to the diffurbance and disquieting of all their peace, were now become to respective of them, that they thought it an impious and finful deed, once to offend or offer abuse to that City, so well given, and devoted to the worship and service of God. Furthermore, there was a grove, the midst whereof was watered continually by a spring that issued out of a dark and shadowed cave: into which, because Numa used very oft to retire himself alone, without any other, as it were, to have familiar company with Ageria, he dedicated that grove unto the Muses, for that, their affishance also in counfel and advise he defired together with his wife Ageria. And to Faith alone he instituted a so-C lemn yearly festival day, and erected a chappel: Unto which he commanded the Flamines to ride in an arched or embowed close Chariot, drawn with two horses, and to sacrifice and execute their function, with their hands covered and wrapped close to their fingers ends: fignifying thereby, that faith is to be kept and preferred: and that her feat was facred and confecrated even upon the right hands. Many other facrinces, and places for facrifice, which the Priests call Argeos, did he appoint and dedicate. But of all his acts this was most worthy and memorable, that during the time of his raign he had no leffe regard to prefer peace, then to maintain royal effate and dominion. Thus two Kings one after another, taking either of them a several course by himself, that one by war, this other by peace, mightily promoted the welfare of the City. Romulus raigned 37. years, Numa 43. So that now the City became very pulfant, as being well and equally tem-

D pered both with feats of arms, as also with discipline of peace.

Upon the death of Nismathe regiment recursed again to an inter-raign. Then the people nominated and elected for their Kingswith, the royal aften of the Senators Tullus Hoftling, the Nephew or Grandson of that Hoftling, who had in times pattought valiantly against the Sabins, at the loot of the Caftle hill. This man was not only unlike the former Kingsbut also more ferce and hardy then Romalus himself. For besides the heat of youth, and drength of body withal, the glorious remembrance of his Grandstather set him on, and pricked him forward. Supposing therfore that the City through rest and ease began to age, as inverse, and to degay, he sought every way to pick, quarrels, and to give occasion to make war. It fortuned, that the Peasants about Rome, and those of Mas likewise, proped upon and spoiled one anothers land, At that time C. In this camp the Alban King Clussias ended his days, in whose lead the Alban army created Merius Suferius their Dictator. Tulius in the mean timebecame haughty and proud, especially upon the death of the King, oftentimes giving out and faying, that the mighty power of the gods, having thus begun at the very head, would likewife take vengeance of the whole body of the Alban Nation, for this their unjust and godlets war: and one night above the rest passed except by the camp of his enemies, and in warlike manner invaded the Alban lad. Tullus resulted not the offer, albeit they were but vain to ies that were pretended, and therefore let his men in battel aray. The Albans in like manner came forth against him. Alice they were thus ranged and embattelled ready to fight, the Generals on both fides, accompanied with a few of their principal Nobes, advance between both armies. Then began the Alban Dictator in this wife: "Me thinks (quoth he) I hear already of in jury and wrongs done, and how 's such goods as were demanded are not restored again according to the form of the league, as also 'that Clussius our King was cause of this war: neither doubt 1, O Tullus, but even you pretend, 'that Clussius our King was cause of this war: neither doubt 1, O Tullus, but even you pretend,

But this one point Tullus, I would have you to remember and "confider: How strong about us and you especially the Tuscans are, you know better, the nearer yeare unto them: mighty they are by land, much more by sea. Then wot well this, that when "you shall cause the Trumpet to found unto battel, these two armies will be to them a fair mark "and foectacle to behold: that they may give an affault to both at once, as well the victors, as "them that are vanquished, whilst they are wearied and toiled out of heart. For the love of God, 7 " if there be any spark of grace in us, fince we not contented with that liberty which we surely en-" joy, will needs venture and put in doubtful hazzard, which of us shall rule and command, and "who shall serve and obey the other, let us take some good course whereby it may be decided "without great loss or bloodshed on both sides, whether shall be Lord and Soveraign. The motion Tullus milliked not, albeit both for disposition of nature, and hope of victory, he were the haughtier of the twain. And as they fought on both parts what way to take, this means at length they found, whereunto fortune it fell prefented fit matter and occasion. T For by good hapeyen then, in either hoft three brethren twins there were born at one birth, and those neither in age nor frength unlike. Their names were Curiatii and Horatii, that is very certain, neither is there any thing of ancient record more famous and notable. Yet as clear in substance as it is, there're- M marieth fill (one doubt and error in their names: of whether people the Curiatii and the Horatii were. Writers there be on both fides; but the greater number say, as I find, that Horatii were the Romans, to Whom I rather encline, and my mind giveth me to follow them. With these three brighten the Kings went in hand, pethwading them to fight for the honor of their country, and try the quartel by dirt of (word i shewing them, dire) on whether side the victory sell, there should remain the soverhigh dominion. Nothing resided they to do; the time and place both were agreed upon and appointed. But before the combar, it was covenanted between the Romans and Albans, and these conditions drawn: That whose champions in fight should have the bester, that nation should peaceably command the other. There are of covenants many and subdry Capital lations far different in matter : but they run all after one manner and form. As for this, it was N made, as we have heard in this wife, neither is there extant a more ancient record of any compofition whatfoever, The Herald (called Fecialis) demandeth of King Tullus in this wife: Is it won will and commandment my Lord, That I make a covenant and accord with the Paterpatrate of the Alban people? It is (quoth the King.) Then (quoth he) I demand of you facred herbs. The King answered again, Take them pure and clean, The Fecial then reached from the Cafile hill pure herbs from among the grafs : which done, he thus asked the King : Do you (inv Lord)ordain me the Mellenger Royal of the Commons of the people of Rome? and allow necessary implements, all furniture for my felf, and my retime and train? The King answered: I do, for far forth as may be, without the harm or detriment of my felf, and of the Citizens of the people of Rome. The Fecial or Herald for that time, was Marcus Valerius, who created Paterpatrate a King at Arms, Sp. O Fullus, by touching his head and hair with Vervain. Now the Paterpatrate is for to confirm the agreement with an oath, and so he read out the covenant and oath, and that with many words: Which to rehearle, as they were in a long prescript form pronounced, were very needless. After this having recited all the Articles and conditions thereof. "Hearken (quoth he) O Jupiter, liften "thou Herald for the Albans, attend also and give ear ye the Alban people, how these conditions "from the first to the last, have been read aloud out of those Books or Tables of wax, without

"coven, or fraud, and how at this day they are most rightly meant and understood, according to "the tenure of the words: from their articles I fay, shall not the people of Rome start back first, "nor make default: If they shall first go back and fail therein by publick consent and fraudulent-"ly; that day, O Jupiter, imite thou the City of Rome, as I to day will drike this Swine: yea, and " imite thou home fo much more, as thou art more able and powerful then my felf. And after he had thus taid, he smore the swine with a slint stone. The Albans likewise repeated their prescript form of words, and the oath, by their Dictator and Priests for the purpose. The complements of the covenant and composition thus performed, and all concluded, then those three brethren of both fides as it was before agreed, buckle to arm themselvs. And being encouraged on both hands, B by their well-willers and friends, that put them in mind of their country gods, their native foile and parents, faying, that all their fellow Citizens and country men whatfoever, both at home in the City, and abroad in the camp, every one had their eye only upon them, their weapons and their hands : the young men being both of themselves by nature forward and lusty, and also emboldened with the comfortable words of their friends, advanced forth between both armies. Now were the two hofts fet on both fides before their camps, rid of prefent danger, rather then void of care and pensivenels. For why? the whole trial of soveraignty and rule, retted in the valour and good speed of a few. Whereupon they longing to see the sequel and issue, were wholly bent to behold, and only minded this unpleasant light and spectacle. At sound of Trumpet these brave brethren, three to three like as they had been two fet battels, and carrying the flomachs verily of two C great armies, affronted one another, and with cruel and mortal weapons gave the charge. Neither regarded they their own proper peril, but fet before their eyes, only the rule or iervitude of the Common-weal as if the state of their country from thenceforth lay wholly upon their good or bad fuccess in this action. So soon as they began to cope together and make assault, that their harnels The coucleon and weapons once clattered, and their drawn swords shone and glittered again, behold such an betothern faritists exceeding tear came upon the beholders, that they trembled and quaked withal: and during the and Horata, time of equal combat, feeing no inclination of victory to the one fide or the other, they were fo aftonied, that hardly they could well freak or freely take their wind. Afterwards, when as they were come to hand-firoaks, and that now not only the firring of their bodies, and the doubtful handling of their weapons and armor, but bloody wounds also were seen, two of the Romans D (having fore wounded all the three Albans) fell down one upon the other, and yeelded up the gholt. At whole fall, the Alban holt shouted again for joy: but the Roman legions, albeit they were now past hope of victory, yet they were not void of care being amated, and an extaste as it were, with very fear what should become of him, who being but one, had three Curiationpon him at once. But as good hap was, he as yet was fresh and unwounded. And as he was not able alone to make his part good with them altogether, so in sipple fight, man to man, he thought himselse good enough for them all, one after another. To single therefore, and to part them in fight, he begins to flie, thinking thereby they would follow after him, each one as his hurt body would give him leave. Now when he was retired a pretty good way from the place where they fought, and looking behind him, espied them following far asunder, and one of them not much behind E himself, he turned again upon him with great violence. And whilst the host of the Albans cried out to the Curiatis to rescue and succourtheir brother, Horatius by that time had slain his formost enemy, and was in hand with the second. Then the Romans with such a shout, as they are wont to make, who after a great fright recover themselves and take heart again, encourage their champions and he himself hatteneth to finish the combat. And before that the third, who was not far off. could get to the other, he had flain the fecond Curiatius. So that now there was but one to one, left to fight on even hand: and they, beither in hope nor fittength equally matched. As for the one of them, his body as yet not wounded; and his double victory with al caused him to attempt the third conflict flourly and couragiously. The other faint and feeble of his hurt, tired with running had much ado to come forward; and quite out of heart, feeing his two brethren lie flain at E his fleet, offerett himfelf as a prey to his victorious enemy : for furely between them was no fight at all to speak of The Roman he triumphing and trying out for joy, Two brethren already (quoth he have I fene to the Divel the third likewife shall I fend after them, that a Roman may command an Alban, which is the cause of all this war. And therewith he thrust his sword alost into his threat who had much ado to hold his weapons and to foon as he was down, firing and rifled him. "The Romans with great triumph and gratulation, receive Horaine rejoicing to much the more, sas his case was more dangerous and well neer desperate. Then of both fides address they themstelves to bury their champions; but not with like theer and alacrity of hearts For why? they of the one part were become Lords, and they of the other, Subjects. Their tombs remain yet to be feer in the very places where they were each of them flain, two of the Romans entombed together C in one place neeres unto Alba: the three Albans towards Rome; but distant afunder, like as they fought and left their lives. Before they dillodged and departed thence the one from another, Merisi, according as it was capitulated in the composition, asked and demanded what Tullus would cottamand from to do: who enjoined him to keep his youth ready in arms at an hours warning for that he would employ them in service, in case he should war with the Veientians. So were the armies dismissed home. And Horaius he wentformost baring afore him the threefold spoile of three efpying upon her brothers shoulders, the coat of arms of her espoused husband, which she her self H had wrought with her own hands; she unbound her head, let her hair loose, and pitionsly called upon her dead spouse by name. This lamentable wailing of the fifter presently upon victory, and amid to great and publick joy, moved the proud and hauty young man to wrath, and drawing out his fword therewith, ran the filly damfel through: and with these bitter words rebuketh her also Get thee hence (quoth he) to thy spouse with thy unleasonable and foolharly love, forgetful as thou art, of thy two brethren dead, and him that is alive: forgetful of thy native country, and the honor thereof: and to with a mischief go she, whatever she be, that shall bewail an enemy of Rome. A cruel and horrible fact this feemed, as well to the Senators, as to the Commons: but his late and fresh desert made it the less trespass; yet for all that was he apprehended, and brought before I the King. The King, that he might not feem the author of a judgment so unpleasant and odious unto the people, and confequently of punishment according to the doom, affembled the people tinto the polyn, and that a constitution of the theory of the term in the following the term of the te in dreadful kind of form. Go Listor therefore, and bind his handstogether. Then came the Listor and cast a cord about them. But Horaius, by the advise of Tullus, a gentle and mild interpreter of the Law, I appeal (quoth he.) So upon his appeal was the matter debated, and to be tried before the people: who were not a little troubled in deciding or judging this caule, and most of all in regard of Publius

Yet to the end that the murder fo manifest and openly known, should be in some fort expiate, and fatisfaction made therfore, his father was charged to purge his fons fin, and make amends, at the expences of the City. The Sisters beam. And in that very place where Horatia was wounded and fell N down, her tomb was erected of four fquarestone.

But not long continued the Albans in quiet and peace. For the common people finding fault and greatly dilcontented, that the whole flate of the Weale-publick was put into the hands of three fouldiers, intected fo, and poiloned the vain and shittle head of the Dictator: that for as much as plain and upright dealing sped no better, he began to win again the hearts of his Commons by crooked means, and indirect courses. Seeking therefore war in time of peace, as before intime of war he fought peace: and feeing his people had more heart then hand, and their ftrength not aniwerable to their ftomacks: he flirred up other nations, openly by way of proclamation and defiance to make war, and referved his own men under a colour of league and confederacy, for to practile treason and falshood. The Fidenates, a Colony of the Romans, having O made the Veientians partakers of their counsel, and combined with the Albans to forsake the Romans, when time came, and turn unto them, brake out and took arms. When Fidene had thus openly revolted. Tullus sent for Metius and his power from Alba, and setteth forward against his enemies and palling over the river Anio, encamped near the confluent, where both freams meet together. Between which place and Fidene, the army of the Veientians had croffed the Tyber, who put themselves in the right wing of the battel fast by the river, and the Fidenates in the

A left neerer to the mountains, Tullus directly opposeth his own forces against the Veientians, and placeth the Albans to affront the Fidenates. The Alban Captain having as little heart as honeity and truth, neither durit keep his standing, nor openly turn unto the enemy, but by little and little withdraweth himself toward the mountains: and when he thought he had gained vantage enough, he mounted up the hill with all his companies, and with a wavering mind to foedd the time, displayeth his ranks. His intent and purpose was, on what side fortune seemed to give the better, with them to join and take their part. The Romans that flood next, perceiving their flanks naked by reason of thedeparture of their friends and allies, at first marvelled much at the matter: but afterwards there gallopt an horfeman, and advertifed the King that the Albans were

R gone away, Tullus in this to tearful and dangerous case, vowed twelve Prietts Salii, and two Temples to Pallor and Pavor, i. e. to Paleness and Fear; and with a loud voice cryed out in the hearing of his enemies, commanding the faid horieman to return to the battel, laying, There was no cause at all to fear, for that himself had commanded the Alban host to wheel and terchabout, and so to charge the Fidenates on their backs where they lay open. Willing him expressy moreover, to cause the men of arms to hold up their lances on end. By which means, a great part of the sootmen could not fee the Albans as they departed and went their ways. And those that had feen them, thinking it was a truth which they heard the King to speak, fought so much the morehotly. So the fear turned now from them, and fell upon the enemies: for they heard the King when he spake so loud, and also a great many of the Fidenatians being co-habitants with the Romans. o understood Latine. For fear therefore, that the Albans should all on a sudden run down from the hils and flop their paffage to the town, they turned their backs and fled. Then Tullis preffeth hard mis, and not then pauage to the company of the state wing, cometh back more fiercely upon the Veientians, being already amazed at the fright of the other. Neither were they able to withstand the brunt. Howbeit the river behind at their backs kept them at first from flying away, but afterwards when their flight bended thitherward: some flinging their weapons shamefully away, like blind men, ran headlong into the water other lingering ftil, and thaying on the bank fide, doubtful whether to flee, or to flick to it and fight, were trod under foot, and hewne in pieces. Never had the Romans before that day a more cruel battel. Then the Alban army, which beheld and faw all this conflict, descended down into the plain. And Metins, forsooth, rejoiceth much on D Tullus behalf for his victory. Tullus again speaketh Metius fair, and gave order, that the Albans in a good hour should jointheir camp to the Romans: and against the next day, prepared a purging or Lustral sacrifice. The morrow when it was day, and that all things were in a readiness, according to the manner, he commandeth both armies to affemble together to an audience. The Criers, beginning at the farthest part of the camp, summoned the Albans first. Who also for the firangeness of the matter, and desirous to hear the Roman King to make his Oration, pressed for ward to fland next. The Roman legion on set purpose, as it was before decreed, flood armed round about, and hemmed them in and the Centurions had in charge without delay to execute whatfoever they were commanded.

Thenbegan Tullus to speak in this wife, "If ever in any war heretofore had cause, O Romans, The Oration to render thanks, first to the immortal gods, and then to your own manhood and valor, cer- of Thum. tainly it was in yesterdays battel. For ye fought not then with the force of your enemies more "then with the treachery and falshood of your friends and consederates, which is the greater " conflict and far more dangerous. For to put you clean out of doubt, and to bear you no longer "in hand with a wrong perswasion: The Albans went up toward the hills without mycommission "on, neither was that my commandment, but a policy and countenance only of command : to "this end, that ye not knowing how ye were for faken, might not withdraw your hearts from "fight, and also that your enemies weening they were environed behind, should be afraid and so "enforced to flee. Yet are nor the Albans all in general to be charged with this fault which I re-"prove. They did but follow their leader, as ye likewife would have done, if I had willed the march to have turned any whither from thence, It is Metius that was the guide and leader of F marin to naverunce any winters now the market and devifer of this war, Merina I fay it is, and none which is journey, Merina is he that is the worker and devifer of this war, Merina I fay it is, and none " but Meriss, the breaker of the Roman and Alban league. But let who that will from henceforth presume hardly to do the like, if I make not him a notable example to all the world. The Centurions flood armed round about Metius, and the Kinggoeth on with the rest of his speech as he began, and faid: "That which I pray God may turn to the good properity and happiness of the "people of Rome, of my felf, and you the Albans, I am minded to reduce all the Alban nation to as Rome: to endue the Commons with the freedom of the City: to advance their chief Gentle-"men to the order of Senators, and to make one uniform City and Common-wealth: that as in "times past the Albans state, out of one body was divided into twain, so now it may be united G "and become one again. At these words the Alban youth unarmed, and beset on every side with armed men, albeit they were distracted in mind, yet were they forced with a general fear to keep filence, and hold their peace. "Metius Sufferius (quoth Tullus then) If thou coulds have " learned to keep allegiance, promife, and covenants, thou mighteft have been taught it at my "hands with life. But now fince thy froward nature is incurable, teach thou by thy fearful exam-"pleand death all mankind, to hold and repute those things for sacred and holy, which have by "thee been broken and violate. Like as therefore erewhiles thou barest a double heart in doubt-

A footmen, but more upon the firength of their men of arms, whose number lately was appreciated for by the suddain and forcible charge of the horfemen, the barnets the Sabins was appreciated their ranks so disordered, that they could neither stand close together to fight it out, not yet fired themselves to file, without great slaughter and bloodingd.

The Sabins thus vanquilhed, and the kingdom of Tulin; and the whole direct Ray, feing very glorious and wealthy: behold, news came to the King and Senitors, that in the Marginount it rained (tones: which hardly was believed, and therefore certain men weekent of purpole to fee this strange and prodigious ight: who might plainly behold (tones to fall thisk out of the skie like as when some torcible winds drive hail in big round bals upon the earth. They imagined more-Bower, that they heard a great and mighty voice out of the grow from the very top of the bill crying unto them, and warning the Albans to dofactifice and divine fervice according to the ries and ancient maner of their forestathers, which they had difficutioned and forgotten as fiftogether with their country they had abandoned their gods, and either taken to the Roman fathion, or eliebeing angry with fortune (as it is commonly leen) fortet and neglected tilt worthip of the gods altogether. The Romans likewife upon that miraculous fign, for the purging and expiration thereof, celebrated folemn publick facrifices for the ipace of nine dayes, called a Novembat: either became they were moved thereto by that voice from heaven (for that allois reported) or took direction from the Soothfayers that pry into the inwards of beatts. Certainitis, that a folemn cultome remainent fitill unto this day, that whenloever word cometh of the like wonder, they keep holyday on ine dayes together. Not long after this, the petilitien er aigned in the city. And albeit the people began thereby to flack (onidery and military tervice: yet would not this martial prince give them

C nine dayes together. Not long after this, the pertitence raigned in the city. And after the people began thereby to flack foundery and military lervice: yet would not this martial prince give them rett and respite from war: being of this mind, that the bodies of young men were more healthy in armour, abroad in the open held, than at home in the city under covert: until himle f at length fell fick of a long and lingering difeafe. Then that haughty and couragious fromack of his, together with his butly and able body, became so bated, that he who east before thought nothing less before the his mind, and busy his brains about religious ceremonies: now all upon a suddain became wholly devoted to all kind of superstition both more and lesse, yea, and filled the peoples heads besides with holinels and devotion. So as now the very common fort wishing again for the old world, under the reign of king Nama, were fully perswaded, that there D was no other remedy less for their sick and diseased bodies, but to obtain at Gods hands grace and was no other remedy leir for their fick and difficiled bodies, but to obtain at Gods handing race and pardon. Men lay, that the king himle in pertuing and tuming over the Commentaries and registers of Nama his predeceflour, and therein finding certain hidden and folemn factifices that had been unto Inpirer Elicuse, retired himself, and kept close within a houle to celebrate the fame. But for that this holy fervice was neithful begin aright; nor duly administred, he had no, onely no divine apparition and heavenly efficient end unto him, but also incure a praying the first and with the latest and the second with the latest and the second with the latest and the second with the latest and his whole house were consumed with lightning. This Tulin, an great gory and renown of martial prowefs, reigned two and thirty years.

When Fallus was dead, the government returned again, as it was from the first beginning or a dained, unto the Senators; who named an Interregent, and he called a Parliament, wherein the people cleded Aneus Martins for their King, and the Senators gave their after thereto. This Aneus Martins, was Numa Pemplius his daughters fon, who to foon as he was come to the crown, both in remembrance of his grand-fathers glorious government, and also in regard of the raign of his next predeceflor, which in other points right excellent and commend. It is onely failed, and was not fo happy: either for that religion was neglected, or not with due cremonies exercited; and thinking it a thing most necessary, and of greatest moment, to reduce all publick divine service and sacrifices to the first institution of Nama, commanded the Arch-prelate or High-priest to make an extract, and transcript of all the facted rites and mysteries out of Nama his Commentaries, and ingrois them into one table, and to publish them approved unto the people: whereby both his subjects and citizens destrous of peace, as also the States thereby adjoining, were in good hope. that the king would altogether comform himself, and take after the customes and ordinances of his grand-father.

Hereupon the Latins, with whom in King Tullus his dayes a league was made, took heare unto them, 'made inrodes into the country about Rome, and fetcht out booties. And when the Romans demanded reflicution, they made them a proud answer, supposing belike. That the King of Rome would pais the whole course of his raign in ease and idlenes, fitting fill in his chappels, and by his holy altars. But Aneus was of a mean and indifferent dipotion by nature, having an eye as well to Numa, as to Rome us, and composed as it were of both. For over and besides, that he thought peace more expedient and necessary for his grandines reign, the geological being as then but new risen, unsetled, and serve withal: considering also, that him-less thous the thought without easily, without easing wrong, enjoy the quietness which to him hapned: for that his parience was already tried, and not onely tried, but also despited: and seeing that the State of the prefent time was fitter for a Tailus to be King, than a Numa: yet to the end that, as Numa in time of peace infittuted ceremonies of religion, so he might likewise et out to posterity others concerning war: and that wars should not be onely made, but also denounced and proclaimed orderly, and in some religious form of solemitry.

"ful ballance, between the the Fidenates and the Romans state: even so streight ways shalt thou H we led thy body to be drawn a sindner, and planked in two peces accordingly. Then for shwith the caucid two reames of four houses to be set to, and Messus to be stretched our and sted shuto the charicats to them belonging. Afterwards were the horses driven a contrary way, and carried with them in both chariots the body torn in pieces, as far forth as the limbs hung falt together by their cords and ligaments: which made all men avert their eyes from beholding to cruel and horrible a speciacle. This was the first and last punishment that ever the Romans executed with 6 little respect or none at all (coly a turth) of the laws of humanity. I hall other they may fately make their boats, that no nation in the world hath been less designed and pleased with extremity of rooms.

Whill thesethings were in doing, there had been certain horsemen sent afore to Alba, for to translate the multitude to Rome: After whom were the legions also of the footmen thither led, to rase and destroy the city. At whose entrance within the gates, there was not that stir nor fearful hurry, as usually is seen when cities are lost: and when with breaking down the gates, beating and bettering the wals with rams and other engins for ing the citadel, the enemies shout and the armed fouldiers run to and tro in the city, killing and flaying, fixing and burning all afore them as they go: but a fad filence, and a faill kind of forrow and penfiveness so possessed and aftenied all their minds, that for feat forgetting what to leave behind them, or what to take with them, without advise and countel one asking another what to do, they one while tood in their house entries, another while ran up and down wandring in their houses, as if their last day had been come. But to 1000 as they heard the horiemen cry aloud, and command them with mena ing to void and depart, and that now the rathing of the tiles and flates from off the hours, as they were a pulling down, was from the furthest part of the town heard: and that the dust raised from places far off, had as it were with a cloud overcast and filled all: then every man carching up hattily and carrying forth what he could, leaving their domestical gods, leaving their houses wherein they had been horn, bred, and brought up, departed forth: 10 that now they filled the freets as they went close on a row together, and the fight one of another with mutual commiteration, redoubled their tears and worull complaints. Yea, and pitious mone and lamentations were heard of women especially, as they passed by their fair and stately churches, belet with fouldiers, and abandoned their gods as it were captives and priloners. After the Albans had thus quit the city, down went the Romans every where with the buildings, as well-publick as private, and laid them even with the ground and so in one hour destroyed and rated four hundred yeers work, for so long had Alba Hood and flourished. Howbeir the temp es of the gods they spared, for so the king had given commandment. Rome all this while rifeth by the fall of silba. The number of Citizens increased double to enlarge the city, the mount Celius was annexed to it and that it should be better peopled and more inhabited, Tullus had his royal feat and palace there, and therein from that time forth he kept his court. The chief Citizens of the Albans he advanced to the order of Senators, that he might augment that state also of the Commonweal; namely, the houses of the Tullij, Servilii, Quintif, Geganif, (urinty, (lalif: and for that degree and order of Senators by him encreased, he built an hall of new court, called until our fathers dayes Holilia curia. M i. Hostilias court. And that all estates and degrees might out of this new people be somewhat firengthened, he chose from out of the Albans ten troops or cornets of horsemen, and with the same supply he both fulfilled the number of the old legions, and also made and enrolled

War with th

Tullus upon this affiance he had in his frength and power denounceth war against the Sabins, a people in those dayes of all other most puissant and mighty, both in men and munition, next the Tullans. Wrongs had been done, and outrages committed on both parts, and restitution or amends demanded, but to no effect. Tulius found himfeif grieved, that divers occupiers or merchants of Rome, at an open mart or fair of great refort before the temple of Feronia were laid hold upon and apprehended. The Sabins on the other fide, omplained, that their men not withfranding N they took fanctuary in a certain facted and priviledged grove, were arefted and in hold at Rome.

These were the quarrels and o casions pretended of the war. The Sabins well remembring, that not onely part of their own for es was by Tatius translated to Rome, and there planted, but also that now of late the puillance of the Romans was well amended by the supplement of the Albans, began likewise for their part to cast about, and seek for help abroad, and for rain aids. Now was Tulcan their neighbour nation, and of the Tulcans the neerest unto them were the Veientians. From thence they gat certain voluntaries to take their part, by reason that their minds already were well disposed to revolt upon old grudges and rancour remaining still of the former war past othersome also vagarants and id e persons of the rascal fort, and needy ommons, were soon hired for mony, But as for any succour from thence by publick consent of the state they had none at all. So much prevailed even with the Veientians (for in the reft it was lets marvel) the faithful covenant of trace concluded with Romalus. Now when their preparations of war were made on both fides to the uttermost of their power, and that it stood upon this point, That they were like to have the ods and vantage, who should begin first, and enter the field: Tullus prevented the enemies and invaded the Sabine land. A tharp and bloody battel was there fought under the wood Malicula. Where the Romans bare themselves bravely that day, much upon the valour of the Legionary

he fet down in writing that law and formal order, by vertue whereof refliction is demanded H (which at this day the Feciales or Heralds observe) like as he received it from the ancient people

The Embassador Fe. ial, coming to their borders, at whose hands the goods are required again. covering his head with a bonnet or vail of woollen yarn, faith thus: Hear O Jupiter, give ear ye limits and confines (naming them of such and such a Country) let Justice and Right hearken also to what I shall say: I am the publick messer of the people of Rome, of a sust and religious embassage am I come, and to my words give credit. After this, rehearseth he all his demands, and then calleth Tuputer to witness, saying, If I unjustly and impiously demand, that such persons should be delivered, or such and such goods be rendered unto me, the publick messenger the people of Rome: then let me ne- I ver return again to enjoy mine own country. These words rehearleth he, as he setteth foot, and steps into the confines: the same also he speaketh to him whomsoever he meeteth first: the self same words he pronounceth, as he entreth within the gate of the City: yea, and when he is come into the market place he faith the fame, changing and varying in some few tearms, from the prescript form of the demand, and taking the folemn oath. In case then, the persons whom he requireth, be not yeelded after 33, days expired (for fo many just are usually granted) then proclameth he war in this wife. Hear O Jupiter, and thou Juno, Quirinus thou: ye celeftial Saints all, and terrefirial powers, ye infernal spirits also listen and give car. I callyou all towitness, and protest before you, that this nation (naming them who loever they be) is unjust, and doth not according to right and equity. But of these matters will we consult at home in our own country, with our elders, and ask their advice how K we may come by our own. Herewith returneth the messenger unto Rome for counsel, and presently the King would in these or such like words, fitting in Councel with his Peers, move them in this maner. Whereas the Paterpatrat or Herald, in the behalf of the people of Rome, and their Quirites, hath treated with the Paterpatrat, or Herald, in the name of the ancient Latines, and with the folk of the ancient Latines, concerning certainthings, differences, sutes, and causes thereupon depending; which things they have neither yeelded nor paid, nor performed and done; which ought to have been paid, yeelthingsthey never networ feetines to promise the state of by just and lawful war. This do I fully agree unto, this do I determine resolutely. After him were the other asked in course: and when the greater number of them who were present accord thereunto, T then by general consent, they were wont to proclame war in this order: That the Fecial or King at Arms should go with a javelin, having an ironhead, or with a red bloody spear burnt at the end. as far as to their borders or marches: and there in the presence of three witnesses at the least. not under fourteen years of age, should say thus: Whereas the people of the old Latines, and the old Latine folk have practifed and trespaffed against the people of Rome and the Quirites, and whereas the people of Rome and the Quirites have fo determined, confented, and agreed, that war should be made with the ancient Latines; I therefore together with the people of Rome, do denounce and proclame and make war with the nations of the old Latines, and with the old Latine folk. And when he had thus faid. he lanced his spear or javelin within the confines of the enemies. After this manner then, was reflitution demanded of the Latines, and war denounced or proclamed: which order of proceeding, M their posterity by tradition received.

Anous having committed the charge of divine service and sacrifice unto the Flamins, and the other Priests, levied a new Army, went forth into the field, and by force won Politorium, a City of the Latines. And following the usual manner of the former Kings his progenitors, who had mightily encreased the Roman State, by admitting their enemies into the number of Citizens, transported the whole multitude from thence to Rome. And because the ancient natural Romans inhabited Palatium, the Sabins about the Capitol and rock Tarpeta, and the Albans replenished the mount Calius: therefore the hill Aventine was allowed this new company to dwell in. Unto whom not long after, there came fresh inhabitants to people it, upon the winning of Tellene and Ficana. But after this, the Romans were driven to recover by war Politori- N um again: for that whilest it stood void and empty, the old Latines had surprised and taken it. Which was the cause, that the Romans destroyed that City quite, that it should not be at all times a receptacle for the enemies. Last of all, when as now the Latines war was driven wholly and brought before Medullia, there for a good while was much ado, and doubtful iffue of fight, and inter hangeable victory: for that the Town was both well fortified with bulwarks, and jurnished with a strong garrison of men: and also by reason that the army of the Latines being incamped in plain and open ground, had fundry times with banners displayed, encountred hand to hand with the Romans. At the last Ancus bending his whole power against them, first gave them an overthrow in a fet battel: and so having gained rich pillage, returned to Rome, At that time also were many thousands of the Latines received into the City; Who to the end, that O the Aventine and Palatium should meet together, were appointed to seat themselves about the Temple of * Murtia. The Janiculum likewife was adjoined unto the City not for want of ground, but because it might not be at any time a fortress and hold for the enemies : which was thought good to be united unto the City, not only with a wall, but also for more commodious passage to and fro, with a wooden bridge over Tyber. The Quirites fols or ditch alfo, no small defence against the easie access from the plain grounds, was a work of Ancus. Thus theestate being grown to exceeding strength and bigness when as now in so huge a multitude of people there was much confusion, and no difference of welldoing or ill, and thereby many mischiers and outrages began fecretly to be committed: for to reftrain therefore with fome terror, fuch boldness increafing dayly more and more, there was a goal or common priton built in the heart of the City, even ing dayly more anymore, since was a goar or common principle and the neart of the City, even overagainft the common place of affembly. And in this kings days not only the circuit of the Cioveragame the common place of all all of their Lands and Territories. For by reason that the forrest Massa was conquered from the Veientians, their Seignory reached to the Sea. where, in the very mouth of Tiber was the town H. stin built, and the falt pits made there about, and upon inch noble exploits by arms atchieved, the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, was immore ample and glorious manner re-B edified.

In the reign of Ancus, there came to dwell at Rome one Lucumo, a pregnant nimble headed man, and a wealthy, upon a defire especially and hope of advancement and honor, which at Tarquini (where he was born, although descended of for raign parentage) he had no means to attain unto, The Son he was of D. maratus the Corinthian, who upon civil troubles and diffentions having fled his country, and by chance planting himself in Tarquinii, there married a wife and had iffue by her two ions, named Lucumo and Aruns. Lucumo, furrived his father, and became heir of all his goods. Aruns died before his father, leaving his wife behind him, conceived with child: neither lived the father Dema atus long after his ion, who not knowing that his daughter-in-law and fons wife was with child, made no mention at all of his Nephew in his Will, and to departed C this world. Whereupon the child after his Grandfires decease being born to no part of his goods, for his poor condition, was called Egerius. But Lucums on the other fide the fole heir and inheritor of all, as he began by his wealth to be haughty enough, and to look aloft, fo he grew much more proud for his marching in marriage with Tanaguil, a dame of a right noble house delicended, and who could hardly bear a lower estate and degree then that wherein the was born. When the was once married, and faw the Tuscansto disdain Lucumo, for that his father was a stranger and banished person, she could not endure that indignity. But forgetting all kind of affection to her native country, to she might see her husband railed to high promotion, she resolved and plotted to leave Tarquinii and depart. To which purpose and design, Rome seemed a place most fit and convenient of all others. For thus the projected and discoursed . That in a City lately founded, where n all kind of Nobility suddenly cometh up, and ariseth from vertue and prowess, her husband a valorous and industrious man must needs have place, and be entertained: that King Tatius a Sabin born, had raigned there: that Numa was from Cures fent for thither, and called to the Crown: that Ancus also a Sabin by his mothers side, had the only image of Numa to shew for his Nobility. Thus the foon pertwaded him, as being a man ambitious and defirous of honor, and whose mother only was a Tarquinian born, and therefore he was to make less (cruple of abandoning the place of his Nativity. Thereupon they removed with all they had to Rome. And it fortuned that to Janiculum they came. Where, as Tarquinius lat with his wife in the chariot, behold an Eagle came gently flying downfrom aloft, and took up his bonnet from his head, and foaring over the chariot with a great noise, and clapping of her wings, as if the had been sent from Heaven to do E this feat, fet it gently and handsomly on his head again which done, she mounted on high, and flew away. Tanaguil, as they lay, embraced this Augury with great joy, being a womanskilful, as commonly all the Tufcans are, in fuch prodigious fights and apparitions from heaven; and therecommonly at the runaus are in men proving our signs and appartitions from neaven s and incre-with taking her husband about the neck, willed him to be of good cheer, and to hope for great matters and high preferments : faying, how that bird came from such a quarter of the Heaven, addreffed as a meffenger from fuch a god, and shewed a divine token and presage upon the highest part of man, even the top of the Crown, and lifted up the ornament that flood upon his mortal head, to give it him again immortal, as from God above. In these hopes and cogitations which they entertained by the way, they entred the City: where they took an house, and from thence forth he wascommonly called L. Tarquinius. Now within a while both his new coming, and his r wealth withal, made him well known: and himfelfalfo befides, fet forward his good fortune by courteous and fair speech and affable language to every man, by friendly enviring, and liberal feathing, and by making what friends he could by gifts, favours, and good turns; fo far forth, as the fame of him came into the Kings Court: where, by his willing service and fingular dexicity, in thort time he had not only access to the Kings knowledge, but also entredinto familiar acquain-tance and friendship with his Highness. Insomuch, that both in private Councels and publick confulrations, as well at home as abroad, he was always prefent, and barea great stroak. And having in all kind of offices carried himself with credit, was in the end by the Kingalast Willand Testa. ment made Tittor or Protector of hischildren: Thus raigned Anous 24, years, for glory and repu- The end of tation of his lage government, as well in war as in peace, equal to any of the former Kings his Ancus. c predecesfors. "the first that any man should be offended, or make any wonder but the third alien that in Rome H "affected and aipired to the Kingdom : rhat both Tating, not of a forraigner only, but of an ene-"my became King: and Numa likewife, a man unacquainted with the City and matters of State, "was without any fute or or feeking of his part, by the Romans fent for, & advanced to the crown. "As for himself, he alledged and said, That from the time that he was at his own liberty and dispose " of himself he with his wife & all that he had removed and came to Rome and of that age wherin "men are employed in civil affairs, he had speut a greater part in Rome, then in his own ancient "country. Moreover, that he was trained up both at home in the City and in war abroad, to the "knowledg of the Roman laws, orders, and customs, and that under no mean person but an ex-"cellent matter, even King Ancus himself. And finally, for faithful service and diligent attendance I "about the King, he had endeavoured to pais all others: and for liberality and courtefie towards " all others, he had striven to go beyond the King. These and such like allegations, as he laid forth and pleaded, and that right truly; the people of Rome with exceeding great content elected him their King. Who being a man otherwise of singular parts and of great worth, as he was ambitious in feeking the kingdom, fo continued he still, when he ware the crown: and minding no lets to establish his own state and throne, than to maintain the good estate of the Common-weal, headvanced one hundred more to the order of Senators, who afterwards were called Minorum Gentium Farres, as a men would fay, Senators of a later fort, and meaner quality. A faction, no doubt to take part and fide with the King by whose means they had been admitted into the Senate. The first war he made, was with the Latins : from whom by force he won the town Appiola: from thence ha- K vine brought away a greater pillage in proportion, than the war imported in brute, he set forth gamings and plays more stately and with greater furnitureand provision, than the other Kings before his time. Then was the plot or compats of ground first iet out & appointed for the lists or theater, called now * Circus maximus wherein were affigned feaffolds for the Senators, and for the Gentlemen or Knights severally by themselves, called Fori, where they might make them places to see the passimes at their ease and pleasure. And in this manner stood they to behold: namely, upon scaffolds born up twelve foot high from the ground with forked perches or props. The gamings were running of horses, and fighting at fists and buffets: for performance whereof, there were champions sent for of purpose, especially out of Tuscan. These sports continued afterwards from year to year in great tolemnity, and named diverly, either the Roman games, or the great Games. This I. King moreover affigned certain places about the Forum or common place for private men to build in where the galleries and shops were made. He went in hand likewise to wall the City about with a stone wall, but the Sabin war staid him in the beginning, that he went not forward with that work, This came so suddenly upon him, that the enemies were passed over the river Anio, before the power of the Romans could meet them, and make head against them. Whereupon great fear there was at Rome. And at the first a capiel conflict there was, and much blood shed on both parts. but no appearance of victory. But after the enemies were retired once into the camp, and that the Romans had time to gather fresh forces, Tarquinius supposing his only want was in his cavalry, determined to join unto the Rhamnenfes, Titienfes, and Luceres, which Romulus had ordained other Centuries or Cornets of horsemen, and them to leave unto the posterity after him, bearing his M own name. Which because Romulus had done aforetime by the counsel and advise of Augurs, Accius Navius renowned and famous in those days for his skill that way, opposed himself and gave out plainly that there might be nothing changed or newly ordained in that behalf, unless the birds first approved and allowed the same. Whereat the King was wroth, and in scorn and derision of his art, as they fay: Come on Sir Soothfayer (quoth, he) areed, and tell me by the flight of your birds. whether that may possibly be done, which I now conceive in my mind. To which demand Navine, who had first made proof therof by his learning, answered resolutely, that it might in very deed be effected. Why then (quoth he) I have imagined in my conceit, that thou shalt cut a whetstone afunder with a raior: Heretake them to thee, and dispatch that which thy fowls foreshew may be done: then as the report goeth, without more ado, he cut the whetltone quite in two. And in that N very place where this feat was done, the Statue or Image of Accius, was erected, with his head covered, even in the Commission, at the stairs therof on the left hand of the Curia or Council house. It is reported that the whetftone also was set up in the same place, for a memorial to all posterity following, of that miracle. Certainly, both Auguries, and the Priesthood and Colledg of Augurs from that time forward was so highly honored, and had in such reverence, that never after was there ought done, either in war abroad, or in peace at home, but by their counsel and advise. Assemblies of people jummoned were difmiffed, armies levied and ready to take the field were discharged, yea, and the greatest affairs of State, were given over and laid afide, when the birds allowed not thereof. Neither did Tarquin for that tims alter the Centuries of the horsemen any whir, only he redoubled the number, so that in three Centuries or Cornets there were 1300, horse: and those O later fort who were added to the others, bare the names of the former, which at this day, because they be double, are called the fix Centuries, Tarquin thus having encreased that part of his power, bade the Sabins battel the second time. And over and besides, that the Romans army was in frength well amended, he devited also privily a subtilestratagem, and fet certain men to set on fire a mighty flack of wood, lying upon the bank of Anis, and so to cast it into the river: the wood burning still by the help of the wind, and most of it being driven against the piles of the bridge,

A and there sticking close together with the boats and planks, fired and confumed it clean. This accident both terrified the Sabins in their fight, and when they were discomfitted, troubled them much, and hindred their flight: so that many a man having escaped the enemy, yet perished in the wery river. Whose armor and weapons floating downthe 'yeer, were known at Rome, and brought news thither of this victory, in manner before word could be brought thereof by land. In this conflict the horsemen won greatest price and praise. For being placed at the skirts of both the wines, at what time as the main battel of their own footmen, were now at the point to retire, they charged fo forcibly upon the enemy (as it is reported) from the flanks where they were marshalled, that they not only stayed the Sabin Legions pressing hard and stercely upon those that be-

B gan to shrink and give back, but all at once put them to fight. The Sabins ran amain towards the mountains, but few gat thither: for the greater number, as we faid before, were by the horsemen driven into the river. Tarquinius thinking it good to take the time, and follow hard upon them whiles they were frighted; after he had fent to Rome, the booty with the prisoners, and burned on a great heap together (as 160 had vowed to Vulcan) the spoils of the enemies, marched on still forward, and led his army into the Territory of the Sabins: who albeit they had already fuffained an overthrow, and could not hope for better fuccess, yet because they had no time to consult and advise with themselves, with such a power as might on a sudden in that stir be raised, met with him. Where they once again were defeated and vanquished, and in the end being in despair to make their part good, they fued for peace. Then was Collatia, and all the lands about it taken from the Sabins, Egerius the Kings brothers ion, was left with a garriion at Collatia to keep that place, And The form of fire. las I find upon record) the Collatins were yeelded into his hands, and the manner of their furrender went in this order. First, the King demanded thus and faid: Are ye Embassadors, or deputed affigns fent from the people of Collatin to make furrender both of your felves and the Collatines? We are (quoth they.) And are the people of Collaria in their own power, and at liberty to do what they will? They are (fay they.) Do we also render up your selves, the people of Collasta their town, their territory and lands, their waters, their limits, their temples, their houshold ftuff and implements, and all thing elfe, as well facred as prophane, unto my power and the peoples of Rome, We do yeeld (fay they.) Then (quoth he) do I accept thereof, and receive all into my trands. The Sabin war thus finished, Tarquinius returned to Rome in triumph. After this, he warred to upon the old Latines, but they never proceeded fo far on any fide, as to join iffue in a general bartel, and one fet field for all. But bringing his power first to one town, and after to another, he made a conquest of the whole nation of the Latins. So as these towns, Corniculum, old Fielding, Cameria, Crustumerium, Ameriola, Medullia, Nomentum, were recovered from the old Latines, or from those that had revolted unto them.

After all this enfued peace. Then was he more earnestly beneto go forward with his works begun in time of peace, then he was before builed in managing of his ways: infomuch, as he gave the people no more repose at home, then he had in wars abroad. For besides that he prepared to compais the City (which as yet he had not fortified) round about with a flone wall, the beginning of which piece of work was by the Sabin war interrupted and broken off: he devised allo certain E draughts or vaulted finks from aloft into the Tyber, whereby he drained and kept dry the base City, or lowest grounds about the market place, and the other vallies between hill and hill, for that out of the plains and flats, they might not easily make riddance and conveyance away of the water. Moreover, he levelled a large court or plot of ground, ready for the foundation of the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol, which he had vowed in the Sabir war, his mind even then giving hims that one day it should be a stately place. Arthe same time there hapned in the court a wonderful strange thing, both in present view, and also in consequence. For as the report went, a young lad, whole name was Servin Tulling as he lay affeep, in the fight of many perfons had his head all on a light fire, And upon an outery raifed arthe wondering of to great a matter, the King arole and when one of the houshold brought wa-E ter to quench the flame, he was by the Queen flayed. And after the flir was fomewhat appealed. The forbade the boy to be disquieted, until such time as he awoke of himself: and within a while as the fleep departed, the blaze likewise went out, and vanished away. Then Tanaquis the Queen raking her his band ande into a fecret room; "See you this boy (quoth the) whom we so homely request the leekep, and in so poor and mean effects bring up? We well this, and know for certain, that he will generate the seed of the seed "offe day be a light to direct us in our dangerous troubles and doubtful affairs she will be the chief er pillar and fuctions of the afflicted flate of the Kings house; Let us theffore therish and foster with ce all kindriefs and indulgence the linb ject matter of lo great a publick and private ornament. Wherupon they began to thake much of the boy, as if he had been one of their own children, and to infitted and train him up in those arts, whereby forward wits are stirred to great enterprises, and to C. archieve high place of wealth and honor. And foor came to that pais, which pleafed the almighty gods. For he proved a young man indeed of princely nature and cowardness in such fort, that when there should be a son in law sought out to match with Tarquinius his daughter in marriage, there was not one of all the young gentlemen of Rome to be found comparable to him in any respect. So as the King affirmed his daughter unto him. This fogreat honor whereunto he was advanced upon on whatfoere cause or or casion it was induced me to think he was not the son of a bondwoman, nor that he served whilst he was a little one, as a slave, I am of their mind rather, that report thus:

known by the wailing and lamentation which grose in the Palace, that the King was departed, Ser. Service Tallies visus accompanied with a strong guard, shewed himself, and was the first, that without the electi-

When Corniculum was won, the wife of Servius Tullius, a great Lord and principal personage of that City, and there slain, was lest great with child: and being among other captives known whose wife the was, in regard of her rare nobility only, was by the Queen preferred from tervitude, and at Rome in Priscus Tarquimus his house, was delivered of a child:upon which so special favor, there grew more familiar acquaintance between the two Ladies, the Queen and her felf; and the child also brought up of a little one there in Court, was both tenderly beloved, and also highly regarded, But his mothers fortune, whose hap was after her country was loft, to fall into the hands of enemies, caused men commonly to think that he was the son of a bond-slave. Now in the 28th, year almost, after that Tarquinius began his reign, was this Servius Tullius in right great estimation and credit, not only with the King, but also with the nobility and commons. Then the 2, sons of An- I em, who as they always before disdained in the highest degree, that they were by the deceitful practife of their guardian, fo unworthily put by the inheritance of their fathers Kingdom, and that a stranger raigned at Rome, one who was not descended of any neighbor, house thereby, no nor so much as of Italian blood: to now they began much more to take figmach and indignation, in case that after Tarquinius, the Kingdom should not return unto them and their line, but should still run on end, and headlongwife fall unto such base variets: That in the same City, 100. years almost after that Romulus the fon of a god, and a god himself, raigned therein, (during the time he remained here upon the earth) a very bond-flave and no better, and one born of a bond-woman should be possessed of the Crown and that it would be a foul stain and dishonor generally to the name of the Romans, but most especially to their house & family, if whilst the issue Male of Ancustived, the K Kingdom of Rome should lie open, and be expoted, not to strangers alone, but which is more, to very bond-men and flaves. This ignominy therefore, and open wrong, they refolve by meer force to put by and avoid howbeit, the grievance of this injury done unto them, fet them on against Tarquinius himself, rather then Servius Tullius; both for that the King if he lived Itill, would be a more sharp revenger of the murder, then a private person: and also if they should happen to kill Servius, whomsoever bendes, the King would rouchfafe for his fon in law, him was he like to make heir apparent, and inheritor also of the Kingdom. For theie considerations they lay wait for to murder the King himself in this manner: There were for the purpose to do this feat, two pasfing flout and flurdy herdmen choien, who having fuch ruffical iron tools about them, as they were wont both of them to occupy, and made a great shew of a most tumultuous brawl and fray in the F. very porch of the Court gate: by which means, they drew all the Kings officers, fergeants, and guard about them : then as they called with a loud voice, both the one and the other upon the King, in fuch wife, as the noise was heard within the palace, they were convented before his Highness. At their first coming they cried out both at once, and interrupted one another in all outragious manner, so as by a sergeant they were fain to be restrained and commanded to speak by turns, until at length they gave over their confused brawlings. Then one of them on set purpose, as it was before agreed upon, began his tale: and while the King as wholly bent to give ear turned afide towards him, the other lift his Ax aloft, and struck the King on the head, and leaving it sticking there still in the wound, they whipt out both of them together, and ran their ways. And whilf they that flood next about Tarquinius, took him up ready to die, the fergeants made after them that were M fled, and apprehended them. Wherupon an outery arole, & a great concourse of people, wondring what the matter might be. Tanaquil in this hurliburly caused the Court gates to be shut, and commanded every one to avoid the place : and at one instant with great diligence provideth things requifice to cure the wound, as if there were some hope of life : and withal, if that should fail, she prepareth other means and remedies against the worst that might happen. Sending therefore in all speed for Servius, when she had shewed him her husband half dead, and already blood es she took him by the right hand, and befought him not to suffer, either the death of his father-in-law unrevenged, or his wives mother to be a laughing flock unto the enemies. Thine is the kingdom O Ser-" vius by right (quoth she) if thou be a maniaud not theirs, who by the hands of others have com-"mitted a most shameful & villainous fact. Take a good heart therfore, and arm thy self, and follow N "the guidance and direction of the gods, who long fince by a divine and heavenly flame burning "about thy head, foreshewed that one day it should be highly advanced. Now let that heavenly " blaze raise thee up: now awake in every deed: what man! we also being strangers have born the "Scepter:confider with thy felf who thou are now, and not from whence thou are descended. And "if in so sudden an occurrence, thine own wits be aftonied, and to seek, then follow my rule, and be "advised by my counsel. In this while the noise and violence of the people was so great, that it " could not well be suffered. Then Tanaquil from the upper lost of the house, out at a window that openedinto the new street (for the King kept his Court hard by the Temple of Jupiter Stator) spake unto the people, willing them to be of good cheer. "The King indeed (quoth she) was amafed and iw ooned at the indden firoak, howbeit it went nothing deep: for now is he come again o alive, and Servius to mighty, retired themselves as banished persons to Suessa Pometia. And Servius now fought means to make himselfstrong, as well by private helps, as by publike. And lest peradventure the children of Tarquinius should another day be as ill affected against him, as the chil-Bdren of Ancus were against Inquinius, he gave in marriage his two daughters to Lucius and Aruns, two of the Kings sons late deceased. Yet could not he with all the policy of mans wit flay the fatall necessity, nor stop and divert the course of the destinies; but that the envy that followeth a Kingdom bred all diffrust, disloyalty, and malice, even among those of his own houshold, for all their alliance and affinity. Howbeit in very good time, and fitly for the quietness. of the present state, was the war with the Veientes (for now was the term of the truce expired) and other Tuscans, taken in hand. In which war, both the valour, and also the good fortune of Tullius was well seen and greatly renowned. Who having discomfitted a mighty host of the enemies, as undoubted King in the conceit and judgment as well of the Senators as of the Commons, if their hearts had been founded returned to Rome. ty forever after might report and record, that Servius was the founder of all diffinction and order; whereby between degrees of worship and wealth, there might be seen due difference, and regard of worth. For he devised and ordained the Cenie, to wit, the Assessing, and Taxation of the Citizens: a thing most profitable to that state and government, which was like in-time to come to amount of the grow some of thepengrow so mighty. By which Cenle, the charges and contributions, either in war or peace, was not levied by the poll upon the Citizens, as aforetime, but according to the valuation of their wealth and ability. So he erected certain Classes and Centuries, and appointed their degrees, according to Asor Ame, a the affeffing, and valuation, meet in decent manner to ferve in war, and meet to be employed in coin, obsq. Eng. D peace. And first of those who were rated at an * hundred thousand Asses and above, he ordained his so Centuries; 40 of the elder fort, and as many of the younger: and all joyntly were counted the fleting. first Classis. The elder were charged to be in readiness at all hours, for defence of the City: the younger to follow the wars abroad. These were bound to find harness, for defence of their own bodies, an headpiece or morion, a shield, greeves, and corselet, all of brass: and for offence of the enemy, a javelin, and a fword. To this Classis were adjoyned two Centuries of Carpenters and Smiths, or Enginers, who were in wage, and served without armour: and their charge was to find the Campe Engines of battery and artillery. The second confisted of those that were valued between 100000 and * 75000 Affes. And of this fort both young and old were enrolled twenty * 214lib 7.th. Centuries: who were enjoyeed to provide for their armour, a target or buckler inflead of a E shield; and excepting only a corielet, in all points as the former. The third he would have to be of those that were effected worth *50000 Asses, and asmany Centuries of them, and with the *15616.566. same distinction of age. Neither concerning their armour was any thing altered: only for their fletch greeves they were dispensed with. In the fourth Classis were those that were affested in the Subfidy book, between 50000 and * 25000 Affes, and of them were formany Centuries. Their ar- *7816.2.16.6.d. mour was changed, having no more but a spear and a casting dart, with a loop called Vernium. The fifth was greater, containing thirty Centuries. These carried with them slings and stones to sling afar off: among whom were reckoned the beadles or criers, together with the trumpeters and cornettiers, who were divided into three Centuries. This band stood of them that were affested from 25000 unto * 11000 Affes. The valuation under this comprised all the rest of the multi- #34lib7.sh.6 d. E tude. Whereof arose one Century, freed and exempted from warfare. Thus having furnished and disposed the forces of the Infantry, he enrolled besides twelve Centuries of horsemen, and those out of the principall men of the City: and fix other Centuries likewise, to those three that Romelus instituted, retaining the same name still that they in their first solemn institution had. These horsemen for to buy their great horses had * 10000 Asses out of the chamber of the City *31 lib 5 sh. a peece : and for to find and keep those horses were the rich widdows set yearly at * 3,000 Asses a *6,110,5 fb. peece. Thus were all these charges and burdens shifted from off the poor mens shoulders, and laid upon the rich. And therefore afterward was their dignity and honour so much the more. For in the grand-leets and folemn elections of Magistrates, every man had not prerogative alike, nor equall authority, as Romules first ordained, and the other Kingscontinued, when they gave their G voices by the poll indifferently, one with another: but there was diffinction made, and certain degrees, but to, as neither any one was excluded or thut out, and yet the whole rested and lay in the power of the richer fort, and chief of the City. For first the horiemen were called: afterward, the eighty Centuries belonging to the first Classis, of the principall tootmen: who if they dilagreed, and hapned to be at any difference, then the Centuries of the lecond Classis were cited.

And never went they likely so low as to the last of all. Neither ought any man to marvell, that this order in these daies, after five and thirty tribes compleat, agreeth not with the Centuries of the

elder and yonger fort, according to the computation fet down by Servim Tullim, confidering their H number is now doubled. For having divided the City into four Wards, according to the quarters and hils; those parts which were inhabited he called Tribes, of the word Tribute (as I suppose,) For he it was that devised and brought up the manner of equal contribution and paiment, proportionably to the affeisment and rate of mens goods. Neither were these Tribes any waies at all respective to the division or number of the Centuries aforesaid. When this Levy and taxation was finished, which he dispatched the sooner, by reason of the peoples sear of an act by him made, concerning those that should not come in to be registred and enrolled in the Subsidy book; he published an Edict, under pain of imprisonment and death, that all Citizens of Rome, as well horsemen as footmen, should the morrow after at the break of day, every one in his own Century, I shew himself in Campus Martius, i.e. in Mars field. There after he had mustered and embattelled the whole Army, he affoiled and purged the fame with the facrifice of a Swine, a Sheep, and a Bull. And this was called Conditum Lustram. Which was the very closing up and accomplishment of the affeliement. In this Lustrum there were numbred and affelied 80000 Citizens, Fabius Pictor, an off ancient writer faith moreover, that so many there were of able mento bear arms. For to contain this multitude, it was thought good the City should be enlarged. Whereupon he adjoyneth unto it two hils more, to wit, Quirinalis, and Viminalis. After this, he proceeded to augment the mount Efquilie: and to grace that hill, and make it of more reputation, there he dwelt himfelf, and had his Court. He cast a trench and ditch, and raised a rampire about the City, and then walled it: by occasion whereof, he set out the Pomozry further, Pomozrium, according to the E-K tymology and literall fignification of the word, is as much to fay, as Postmarium, or the Arriermure, that is, a plot of ground behind, or without the wall. But indeed it is rather a space about the wall on either fide, which the Tulcans in old time, when they built their Cities, used by advice of Augurs, to hallow and consecrate in certain bounds and limits, all along where they minded to fet the wall: that neither within, the houses might joyn upon the wall (whereas now adaies they build close to) and without also there might be a void piece of ground, lying common, free, and unoccupied ofmen. This vacant space, that neither might lawfully be inhabited, nor yet eared and plowed, as well because it was without the wall, as the wall without it, the Romans called Pomarium. And ever as the circuit of the City was made larger, look how much the walls should be fer our further to far those hallowed and consecrated bounds of the Pomerry were extended. L Thus the City being much increased in compass of building, and all things disposed in good order, requifite as well for war as peace; to the end, that he should not alwaies seek to purchase wealth and puissance by war and martiall prowess only, he attempted to amplifie his dominion by policy, and with all to best ow upon the City some glorious ornament to be autifie the same, And even at that time was the Temple of Diana at Ephelus of great fame, and much renowned: which as the report went, was built in common by all the states and princes of Asia. When as therefore Servius would use highly to praise and commend unto the Lords and heads of the Latines (with whom of purpose he had both in publike and private, mutual entertainment and tamiliar acquaintance) that generall agreement of the Princes of $A \rho a_0$, in matters of religion, and in the uniform worship of the same gods: at length, by much iterating and following still that theam, he prevai- M led with them so far, that the nations of the Latines, and the people of Rome together, built at Rome a Templeunto Diana: which was a plain confession, and clear case, that Rome was now the imperiall feat, for which they had so often warred, This quarrell, abeit now the Latines all in a manner had neglected quite, and made no care at all thereof, feeing they had so often attempted it by force of arms, and specifo badly: yet fortune seemed to one only man to cast a favourable aspect, and yeeld good hope, by his private policy and industry, to recover again the imperial dignity unto the Latines, A certain houtholder forfooth, of the Sabins, had, as they fay, a cow bred with him of a wonderfull bigness, and faire withall, (for a memorial) of which fo rare and wonderfull beast the horns were fet up, and remained fast fixed in the porch of Dianas Temple, many a hundred years after:) this was supposed (as it was no lesse in very deed) a strange and prodigious thing : and the N wife men or wizards prophefied, that the loveraignty and Empire thould be letted and established in that State, whereof any one Citizen factificed that cow unto Diana. This prophesic came to the convenient day for facrifice, drives the cowto Rome, and leads her to the Temple of Diana; and there presented her besore the Altar: where the Roman Priest wondring to see so huge a beast, whereof there had been so much speech, and calling to mind with all the foresaid Oracle, spake to the Sabin in this wife. My friend (quoth he) what mean you to factifice fo uncleanly unto Diana, and do not rather purifie and wash your self all over in some running stream, before you come hither? Lo where Tyber runneth in the valley beneath, The stranger then, moved with some scruple of confcience, who defired not hing more, than that all should be well and orderly done, that an O happy success might be correspondent and answerable to so prodigious a beast, forthwith went down to the Tyber. In the mean while, the Roman killed the Cow in honor of Diana. This thing pleased the King and the whole City wonderfull well.

Servius, albeit he were now without all question by so long continuance, fully and really invefled in the Kingdomiyet because he heard say that young Tarquinius otherwhile gave out speeches of hims that he raigned without the nomination and election of the people: therefore after he had

A first wanthe hearts of the Commons, by dividing among them every one certaine lands gotten by conquest from the enemies, he adventured to propound unto the people, and put it to their suffrages and voices, Whether their will and pleasure was, that he should raign over them. Thus was he declared King with as great consent, as never any before with the like. But Tarquinius for all this, had nevertheless hope to aspire and attain unto the Crown: nay, rather so much the more because he understood the taid division of the lands among the Commons, was a thing concluded and pasfed against the will and mind of the Senators. Taking therefore occasion thereby to accuse and blame Servius before them, he supposed he had good means offered to wind himself into favor with the Lords of the Senate, and so to become strong in the Council-house. Over and besides, he was B both himself a young man of great courage and hot stomack, and his wife likewise at home, dame Tullia, lay ever upon him, and pricked forward his diffempered and troubled mind : for you must think, that the royall Court of Rome also hath brought forth and afforded one example of a tragicall and horrible act: that by a weariness and loathing conceived against the Kings government, liberty and freedom might the fooner enfue; and that raign be the last, which was by milchief gotten first. This L. Tarquinius, whether he were the son or nephew of Priscus Tarquinius, it is not very clear howbeit, I would rather think with most writers, that he was his son. A brother he had-Aruns Tarquinius, a young gentleman of a mild nature. These two (as is aforesaid) had married the two Tullia, the Kings daugnter, and they also themselves were in conditions far unlike. And happily it so tell out that two froward and violent natures were not coupled together in wedlock: such C was the good fortune. I believe, of the Roman people that thereby the raign of Servius might contime the longer, and the City brought and tetled in good order. The younger Tullia, aftout dame and a proud grieved and vexed much that her husband had nothing in him, no metall or matter at all either to cover and defire, or to enterprise and adventure : her mind was fully set upon the other Targain, him the efteemed highly, and had in admiration, him the faid to be a man indeed. and defeet ded of royall bloud. As for her fifter, she despited and the ked her, for that she having a forward and valorous Knight to her husband, fat still, and seconded him not in audacity and boldneis, as a woman should do. Well, in short time likeness and disposition soon brought them together, and as it is commonly seen, Naught will to naught, and fort best together. But the mischief and troublethat brought all up-fide down, arole from the woman. For the using to have fecter D conference with her fifters husband, never ceafed to speak badly, and to rail of her own husband unto his brother and of her fifter unto her husband, "Affirming in good earnest, it were better "both for her self to be a widow, and for him to live single, and without a wife, than so to be mis-"matched as they were, and through the craven cowardife of others to languish and come to no-"thing. As for her felf, if the gods had given her an husband according to her own quality and "worthinels, she doubted not to see and that very shortly, the Crown in her own house, that now " she seeth in her fathers. In this manner possesseth she quickly the humorous young man, and filled his head with her own rashness and follies. Now when Aruns Tarquinius, and the elder Tullia, who died just in a manner both at one time, had well rid their own houses, and made way and overture for a new marriage, it was not long but they were married, with Servius his leave and con-E nivency, rather than his good liking. But then every day more than other began Tullius to be a continual mote in their eies, his old age hatefull, and his raign more odious: for now the woman minded nothing but one mischief upon another: and would not suffer her husband to be at rest night nor day, lest peradventure the former murders done and past, should serve to no purpose, and mils the effect of their defignments. And thus she brake out and faid, That she wanted not be- Tullis to her fore one that carried the name of an husband, with whom the ferved, and kept her felf quiet and husband. faid nothing," But she had a want of one, that thoughthimself worthy of a kingdom, that remem-" bred he was the son of Tarquinius Priscus, that loved better to be seiled of a Crown and scepter "indeed than hope for a kingdom, and hear thereof, But fir (quoth she) if you be the man to whom "Itake my felf wedded, then I call you both husband and king: if not, then is our case changed for F" the worle, in that cowardliness is accompanied now with wickedness. Why resolve you not? " why arm you not your felt, and go about this business? you need not go fo far as to Corinth or "Tarquinii for to feek and compass forrain kingdoms, as your father did. The gods of your own "houle and native country, the image and example of your father, the Kings Palace, and therein "the royall feat and throne of estate, yea, the very name of Tarquin, createth, nameth, and saluteth " you King, But an it your heart will not serve you to these designs, why bear you theworld in hand "and deceive them? why take you so upon you as you do, to shew your self as a kings son? Get "you hence to Corinth again, away to Tarquinii, turn backward to your former flock and condi-"tion, more like to your brother than to your father. With these and such like motives, by way of reproof the checked the young man, let him on, and pricked him forwards, and the her felt for her G part could be at no repole, for thinking that Tanaquil, an alien and stranger born, could contrive in her head, and effect fogreat a matter, as to make two kings together, one after other, namely, her husband first and afterwards her fon in law: and sheher own fels, a Kings daughter, could bear no stroke either in giving or taking away a kingdom, Tarquinius kindled with these furies and temptations of a woman, went about, laboured, and made court to the Nobles, especially those that were Minorum gentium: oftentimes putting them in mind of the pleasures and favours that his father had done them, and requiring now of duty the like good turn at their hands. The young men, the flower and manhood in generall of the City, he wrought and won to himself with gifts: and so H partly with great promiles, what wonders would he do, and partly with railing flanders upon the King in all places, and charging upon him odious crimes, he grew very great and mighty. At the laft, espying a convenient time to set on foot, and put in execution his intended projects, with a flrong guard of armed men, he entred torcibly into the Forum or common place of affembly, wherear the people all insprized with great feare, he fat him down upon the Kingsthrone, even at the entrance of the Curia or Senate house, and there, by the voice of the crier summoned the Senators to counsell before King Tarquinius. Who forthwith there assembled together: Some thereto made and prepared aforehand others, for fear left their not coming might turn them to displeasure. And as they were altonied at this strange and wonderful fight, so they thought Servius utterly un- I done, and his case desperate, There Tarquinius began an invective inspightful & reproachful terms, touching the first pedigree or parentage of Servins: faying, that he being a slave, &born of a bondwoman, after the cruel and shamefull death of his father Tarquin, shurped the Kingdom: not by "means of an Interregn, as the order was aforetime, nor by a folemn aftembly, and the free voices " of the people, nor yet by the affent of the nobles, but only through the wile and fraud of one wo-"man, And as he was (quoth he) thus born and thus created King, io hath he been a partial favorer ever of the baleft lort, even such as himself; and in hatred of the noble birth of others hath divi-"ded amongst the vilest persons, lands taken from the chief men of the City; and all such burdens "and charges, as had been in time; paft common to all, he hath cast upon great perionages of quali-"ty and worth and fet up an affesting or taxing, that the state of the wealthier persons being made K ty and worth and let up an attenting of the might bring them into difference with the people, and befrow their shown and expoied to envy, he might bring them into difference with the people, and befrow their goods upon the pooreft and needieft at his pleafure. Amide this Oration of his came Servius in place, advertised of the matter by a fearful mellenger in all halte. And presently began to cryout with a loud voice, at the very porch or entry of the Curia: What is here ado, quoth he Jand what "meaneth this O Tarquin how darest thou during my life, affemble the Senators or fit on my leat? Whereunto he floutly made a proud answer, that he did but keep his fathers throne, and being "as he was, a Kings fon, he deemed himself more worthy to be inheritor of the Kingdom than a "bondflave: and as for him, he had been fuffered long enough to play with his good Mafters, and to infult over his betters. With this arose a great clamour from the partakers and complices of both sides the people they ran from all parts to the Councill-house, and like it was, that the stron-I. ger should be King, Then Tarquinius being put to his shifts, and forced to try the utmost seeing no other remedy, took Servius by the middle, as being himself much yonger and stronger far, carried him out of the Council-house, and threw him downfrom the stairs head to the foot, and so returned again into the Senate-house, to get the Senators together. The Kings Officers with the guard attending upon him, fled. Himself well near dead, with certain of his courtiers and train, breathless also for fear made speed, and retired towards his Pallace, as far as to the top of Cyprius street, where he was overtaken by them that werefent by Tarquinius, and so slain outright. And it is verily thought that this was done by the suggestion and procurement of Tullia; so little disagreeth it from other wicked pranks of hers, But this one thing is known for certainty, that the came riding in her coach into the common place of affembly, and nothing diffusied or abashed at the presence M offo many men, there met together, called forth her husband out of the Senate-house, and was the first that stilled him with the title of King. By whom she being willed to depart away out of that throng and uptore as she returned homward as far at the pitch of Cyprius street, where was of late a place confectated unto Diana, called Dianium, the coachman that had the guiding and driving of the fleeds as he turned the chariot on the right hand up to the cliff Virbins, for to pais up to the hill Elanilia, fuddenly staid for fear, and reined in his horses, and shewed unto his Lady and Mistris Serviss lying there murdered. And hereof followed (as the report goeth) a beaftly part, and beyond all sense of humanity, which the very place doth witness still at this day, called thereupon Sceleratus Vicus, i.e. the wicked fireet: wherein the raging and frantick woman Tullia, hurried with the furies, and haunted with the ghofts of her fifter and husband, caused (men say) her chariot to be N driven over her fathers dead corps; and being her felf besprinkled and beraied with the bloudy chariot, carried home with her some part of it in token and witness, that her hand was in this parricide and murder of her own father: to the end, that the might provoke her own domefticall gods and her husbands to wrath and displeasure: and so consequently, as they entred their raign with milchief and wickedness, they might soon after be turned out thereof with shame and infamy, Servius Tullius raigned four and fourty years, in such wife carrying himself, as it were hard, evenfor a good and staid Prince that should succeed him, to follow his steps. This made moreover for his glory and fame, that together with him died all right and lawfull government of Roman Kings, And even that regiment of his, so mild, so gracious, and temperate as it was: yet because it refled in the absolute power of one man, he was minded; as some do write; to have forgone and O given over had not this wicked intelline practile from his own family come between, to prevent and cut off his good designs and intent to set his country free.

After him began to raign Tarquinius, for his infolent acts furnamed Superbut, i.e. the proud. For he would not fuffer his wives father/unkind fon in law he) to be interred: faving oftentimes in jibing manner, that Ramulus alfo died and was never buried. Moreover, the principal heads of his Peers and Nobles, fuch (as he thought) had favoured Servius his proceedings, and took

A partwith him, those he made away and slew. Afterwards, searing upon the guilt of his own conscience, that he had given an ill precedent for others, to take vantage against himself, attaining to the Crown so lewdly; he retained therefore a guard of armed men about his body: and in very truth, fetting only might afide, no other right had he to wear the diadem, as who raigned neither by peoples election nor Senators approbation, Over and befides all this, to the end he might fit fafely in his leat by servile sear and dread, who reposed no trust nor hope in the love of his subjects; therefore to firike the greater terror into them, and hold them in a we, he by himself alone without affiltance of any countell, fate upon all matters of life and death: by means whereof he was able to kill, banish, and condemn in forfeiture of lands and goods, not those only whom he suspected and hated, B but aifo them, from whom he could look for nothing elie but spoil. Thus when he had decated the number of the nobles especially he purposed to chuse nonew in their place, for to make supply: to the end, that the fewer they were, the more contemptible the whole order might grow; and with lels discontent put up the indignity, that they were not employed in the State, nor ought done by their advice. For this King was the first that abolished the custome received and continued by all others afore him, of consulting with the Senate in all matters, & managing nothing without them. He governed the Commonweale by himself, and after his own waies: with whom it pleased him he made war and peace league and tociety, even of his own head: & would break the tame as himfelf thought good: thus he did and undid all at his pleasure, without regard of the peoples mind, or the Senates authority. Above all, he fought to win the hearts and good wills of the Latine na-C tion, that by support of forrain power also, he might be more secure and safe among his own people: neither entertained he with their Prin es friendship and amity only, but entred asso into alliance and affinity with them. For unto Oft. wiss Memilius a Tuft ulan he gave his daughter in marriage. This Mamilius was of all Latines the principall and noblest person, lineally descended (it we may believe the common bruit and report) from Ulyffes and Gree, By this marriage he gained many kinsfolk and friends of his new fon in law. So that now Tarquin as was in great authority and reputation among the Lords and Barons of the Latines. Whereupon he gave them knowledge, and proclaimed, that upon a certain day they should all meet him at the sacred grove of Ferritina, to treat and commune together about matters concerning the common good of both States. Thither relorted they in great number betimes in the morning. And Tarquinius himself tailed not for his D part to keep the very day appointed but it was funietting well near before he came. There, in that affembly all day long, before his coming, was much talk and reasoning, pro & contrastouching him. Turnus Herdonius of A cold , had inveighed spightfully against Tarquinius in his absence (for his Turnu Hello being away) faying, "It was no marved indeed that he was at Rome furnamed Superbus (for even nim his Ora-"then commonly they termed him fo, although fecretly; and in whilpering wife.) For could there tion against * be (quoth he)a prouder part plaid, than thus to mock delude and abuse the whole state of Latiwam, that when their princes and nobles were cited there to appear, far from the Cities and dwel-"ling houses he only should be absent that summoned the assembly? Which verily was but a de-"vice of his to try their patience, that if they once took the yoke, he might keep them still under -"as his vaffals: for who feeth not what he reacheth at? even to command and Lord it over the E "Latines, And in case his own Citizens have done well, in trusting him in the sule over them (if a man may lay they trutted him, and not rather that he came foulely and forcibly by it even with "fhameful murder) the Latines also may put themselves into his hands with security. And yet I see "not why they should so do, on sidering he is a meer stranger and alien. But how and if his own "subjects repent, and are disontented with him, being one after another by him murdered bani-"Thed deprived, and spoiled of their goods? What better dealings may the Latines hope and look " for? Therefore if they would be ruled by him, they should depart home every man, and not keep "the day of the Diet no more than he doth that published and proclaimed it. Whilest this seditious and dangerous perion, who by their and such like factious courses was grown to be a great man and powerfull in his country, stood arguing thus, inforcing and following hard upon other F points, tending to the same effect in cometh Tarquinius. Whereupon he brake off his speech, and all was husht. Then turned every man to falute and welcome Tarquinus: Who after filence made (being advised by some of his familiars that were next unto him, to excuse himself for coming at that time of the day) faid that he had been taken to be an arbitrator or daisiman between the father and the fon: and because he was desirous and carefull to procure an attonement between them and to make them good friends: he made the longer flay and came the later. Which occafion or business seeing it had disappointed them of that day, therefore the morrow after he would deliver that which he had in purpose and intended to move unto them, But Turnus (as they fay) could not hold, nor put up so much as this with silence: but brake out and said again, there was no speedier deciding and taking up of any matter, than between the father and the son; a thing that G might be dispatched in few words: for if he would not obey and give place unto his father, he should abide the smart of it-with a mischief. And thus the Arreive having girded as it were, and glanced at the Roman King, departed out of the Assembly. Which thing Tarquinus taking more dispeasantly a good deal than he mide semblance of, forthwith devised and practited to bring Turnus to his death, that he might strike the same terrour into the hearts of the Latines. wherewith he had kept under his own subjects at home. And for that he had no absolute power to cause him openly to be flain, he framed most fallely a criminall action against the guiltleis man; thereby wrongfully to work his destruction. By means of certain Aricians of a contrary faction, he H wrought a bondslave of Turnus with a fum of money, to suffer a number of swords privily to be conveyed into his Masters Inn or Lodging: which being done in that one night accordingly, Tarauinius iomewhat before day, sent for the chief Lords of the Latines to come unto him; and pretending as though he were frighted by some strange accident, said, "That his long tarrying the day "before, (by Gods speciall providence, as it were, so appointed) was for the safety of him and them "all. For he was informed that Turnus contrived to maffacre both him and the heads of their na-"tion, to the end that he alone might raign over the Latines: That he minded yesterday to have " put this plot in execution, even in the very affembly; but the deed was deferred, for that him-"self (the principall author of that meeting) whose life he sought for above all other, was not in f "place; and hereupon it was (faith he) that he fared so as he did, and railed against him so bitterly "the day before in his absence; for that heby his long tarrying had put him by his hope and the "effect of his designs: and if all were true that was told him, he nothing doubted but early in the "morning at break of the day, so soon as they were set in Councill together, he would come ar-"med and well appointed with a crew of his adherents and fworn confederats: for reported it is, "(quoth he)that a number of (words & other weapons are brought into his lodging, which whe-"ther it be so or no might soon be known. And therewith he desired them to take the pains to go with him thither, And verily, confidering the proud nature and haughty spirit of Turnus, together with his yesterdaies Oration, and the long stay of Tarquinius besides, for that the pretended maipregnant. Thus go they with minds verily somewhat enclined and disposed to believe all, and yet fo, as they would think all the rest but tales and lies, unless they found the swords aforesaid. Being come to the house, and Turnus awakened out of sleep, certain warders were set to keep him on every side: and when they had laid hold upon his servants, who for love of their Lord and Master began to make resistance, the swords were brought forth out of all the blind corners of the hostelry openly to be seen: then was it a clear case and past all peradventures: and Turnus was apprehended and irons clapt upon him. And immediatly in all haste the Latines assembled together to councill in that great tumult and uproar: Where, upon bringing forth the swords in fight before them all, they were so incensed and deadly bent against him, that he was not suffered to answer down, and a hurdle done aloft upon him, and great stones heaped thereon, and so after a new kind of death stifled and drowned. Tarquinius then, after he had called the Latines again to the place of councill, and much commended them for duly executing Turns, who practifing thus to alter and trouble the state, was detected of a manifest intended murder, made this speech unto them: "I "might/quoth he)if I would, by vertue of ancient rites alledge and plead, that for a fmuch as all the "Latines are descended from Alba, they are comprised within that consederacy and league, "whereby in the raign of Tullus the whole Commonweal and State of Alba, together with their "inhabitants, became incorporate into the Empire of Rome, Howbest, in regard rather of the com-"modity and weal-publike of all, I judge it requifite, that the league were renewed, and that the "rather than evermore to hazard and suffer the destruction and desolation of their Cities, with "the spoiling and wasting of their lands, which first in Ancus daies they tasted, and after in my fa-"thers time they had abidden & fuffered. The Latines were hereto foon perswaded. And although in that league the preheminence and foveraignty rested in the Romans, yet they saw well enough that both the Heads and Rulers of the Latine Nation flood with the Roman King, and were wrought unto his hand, to fide with him: and also Turnus unto them was a fresh precedent and facre feemed thereby to have been put off and prolonged, the matter became very suspicious and K Turnus Herda- and plead for himself, but was presently at the source or spring head of the Ferentine water plunged L Latines might enjoy and be partakers of the prosperity and happy fortune of the people of Rome, M example, to teach them what danger might betide every one that should make a part against him and cross his intention. So the alliance was renewed and proclamation made according as it was capitulated, that all the serviceable men of the Latines should at a day appointed repair in good number with their armour unto the grove of Ferentina, Who when they were theremet together N from all parts according to the Edict of the Roman King, to the end they should have no Captain of their own to lead them, no privy watchword or regiment by themselves to direct them. nor private enfigns diffinct from the rest to keep them together; he shuffled or mingled the bands and companies of Latines and Romans one with another, making one of twain, and two of one: and when he had thus doubled the bands, he fet Centurions over them. And albeit he was in peace an unjust Prince, yet was he in war no bad Captain; nay, for martiall prowess he had been equall to the former Kings, had he not failed and degenerated in other things, and thereby flained and hurt his glory even in that behalf. He was the first that warred upon the Volscians, which war Suessa Pometia after his time lasted more than 200 years: and wan from them by force Suessa Pometia. Where having made portfale of the pillage and raifed as much gold and filver as amounted to *40 talents, O he conceived in his mind to build so stately a Temple of Jupiter as might beseemthe soveraign King of gods and men, become the noble Empire of Rome, and answer the Majefly also of the very place where it was to stand. And for the rearing and finishing of this Temple, he laid that money apart, that came of the spoil atoresaid. But presently upon this was he surprised with a war that held longer than he hoped it would. For having made one affault in vain upon Gabii, a neighbour City to Rome, and despairing also of any good success by beleaguering the town, A for that he was valiantly repulled from the wals, at the last he devised and resolved to get it by wile and deceit: a course that Romans had not usually practised. For making as though he had given over and abandoned this war, as being now earnestly bent and busity occupied about laying the foundations of the Temple, and following other publike works in the City: Sextus his fon the youngest of three, fled on purpose to Gabii, complaining of his fathers intollerable rigour and cruyounger of this laying. "That now he had turned his accustomed pride from strangers upon his Sexus Tenjul"own bloud, and was grown to be weary of so many children: that as he had made good hand "size to the Ga"interest the stranger of "and clean riddance of his Nobles, and left the Senate defolate, so he might bring it to pass in his bians, "own houses to leave behind him no issue nor inheritor of the Kingdom, And for his own person B "verily, he was eleaped from among the pikes and twords of his father, and was perswaded fully, "he might no where befure in fafety, but with the capitall enemies of L, Tarquinius. For to put "them out of doubt, and that they might be no longer abused, the war continued still against "them, which feemed in outward flew given over and laid away: and his father would not fail, "but whenfoever he could fpy his vantage and fit opportunity comeupon them at unawares. But "in case there were no place of refuge and protestion for poor & humble suppliants amongst them, "he would wander & travel all over Latium and if he might not rest there he would from thence "go to the Volscians, Æquians, and Hernicks, untill he came to them that knew how to fave the "children from the cruelty and inhumane perfecution of the fathers. Perhaps he should find "means to flir coals and kindle war, yea, and perform himself good service against that most proud C "King, and that most flout and insolent people. And seeming withall in great anger and discontentment, (if they wouldnot regard his complaints) ready to depart and go his waies, he was kindly entertained and friendly entreated by the Gabians: " who willed him to be of good chear and The Gabins to "not to marvell at all, that Tarquinius became now at length foill affected against his own chil- Sexua Tarqui-"dren, like as he had tyrannized already upon his subjects and consederats: for he would no doubt nim. " in the end exercise his fell stomack even upon himself, for want of other subject matter to work " upon. And as to him, right welcome he was to them, affuring themselves that within a while it " would so come to pass, that ithe with them would fet to his helping hand, they should remove "the war from the gates of Gabii unto the very walls of Rome. After this was he admitted to fit with them in common counsell. In which he used of tentimes to say, "That in other matters he Sex. Tenguinius n "gave place, and referred himself to be advised by the ancient Gabins, as men more practised and to the Senaexperienced than himself but for the war, which ever and anon he perswaded them unto himself tors of the "took upon him a speciall insight and skill therein, as he that knew the strength of both nations, Gabins, "and was fully perswaded in his conscience, that the Kings pride must needs be odious to his sub-" jects, which his very own children could not brook and endure. Thus whiles by little and little he follicited the principall Citizens to rebell, and went himself daily in person with a crew of the most forward and able young men, forraging spoiling, and making rodes into the Territory of the Romans, and that now through his words and deeds, which tended to fraud and deceit in the end, they began more and more to give credit unto him that one day would deceive them, he was at last choien Generall for the war. And having made certain small skirmishes between Rome and Ga-E bes, in which for the most part the Gabins had the better (whiles the simple people, God wot, saw not his drift and how he carried the matter:) then all the Gabins from the highest to the lowest, thought verily and in good earnest, that Sextus Tarquinius was lent them by speciall grace even from God above to be their Captain and Protector. But with the fouldiers, what with attempting painfull enterprizes and performing dangerous fervice, and what with dealing prizes liberally amongst them, it passed how he grew into credit, and how dearly he was beloved; insomuch as Tarquinius the Father was of no greater command at Rome, than Tarquinius the Son at Gabes. Thus when he faw he had gathered itrength fufficient, and was fully furnished against all assaies; he disparched unto his father at Rome, one of his trufty fervants with credence, to know his will and pleature, feeing that the gods had done him this grace, that he at Gabes was able to do all in all. To F this message made the King no answer at all by word of mouth, taking the man belike, as I verily think, for one hardly to be trusted. But as one musing with himself and in a deep study what answer to shape, he went into a garden on the back side of the house, and his sons messenger followed after. There walked he up and down, and faid never a word : only with his rod or walking staff, as it is reported, he knapt off the uttermost heads and tops of the poppies. The messenger weary with calling for an answer, and waiting such attendance returned to Gabes as wile as he came, and without effect of his errand. He reported what he had faid and feen, namely, how the King, whether upon anger or hatred, or pride ingraffed by nature attered no speech at all. But Sextus knowing by these mysticall and secret circumstances, his fathers will and direction, made no more adobut slew the chief of the Citizens : some by acculations unto the people, and others by reason of disgrace G they were already in and thereby exposed unto violence, were foon overthrown. Many of them were openly executed, and fome, whom there was little apparance or colour of justice or none at all to accuse, were secretly murdered. Divers of their own accord sled into voluntary exile, or else they were forced into banishment; whose goods as well as theirs that were put to death, were divided among the people. By sweetness of this largels of spoil, by the profit and wealth that grew to Gabii surrenprivate persons; the publike woe and calamity was nothingfelt and seen: untill such time as the deed to Tata Gabins whole estate, despoiled of counsell, bereft of aid and succour, yeelded without dint of sword quinimes

Tarquinius having thus gained the town of Gales, made peace with the nation of the Equians, H and renued the league with the Tuscans, After this he converted his mind to the affairs of the City, among which this was the principall, to leave behind him the Temple of Jupiter, upon the mount Tarpeius, for a monument and memoriall of his raign and name. That of two Tarquins, Kings both, it might be faid another day, that the father vowed it, and the fon finished the same. And to the end that the floor and plot of ground, freed and exempted from all other kind of religions, might wholly be dedicated to Japaier and his Temple, there to be built: he determined to exaugurate and to unhallow certain Churches and Chappels, which having been first vowed by King Tarius, in the very extremity of the battel against Romulus, were after by him confectated and hallowed. In the very beginning and founding of which work, it is faid, that the divine power and I foveraign deity moved the gods to declare the future mightine is of so great an Empire, For when as the birds by igns out of the Augurs learning, admitted and allowed the exauguration and unhallowing of all other cels and chappels befides, only in that of Terminus, they gave no token to confirm the unhallowing thereof: which was taken for an ominous prelage, and thus interpreted. That feeing the feat and house of Terminus was not flirred, and he the god alone that was not difplaced and called forth of the limits to him confectated; it shewed that all should remain there firm and stable for ever. This divine token of perpetuity being received for good and current: there followed another strange and prodigious sign, portending the greatness also of the Empire. For as they digged for the foundation of the Temple, there appeared (as they say, a mans head, face and all whole and found: which fight imported no doubt, and plainly foretold that it should be K the chief Castle of the Empire, and the Capitall place of the whole world. To this effect prophefied the wizards as well they of the City, as those whom they tent for out of Tufcan, to know their opinion and judgment. Thus was the Kings mind all wholly let upon sumptions building and spared for no cost, So that the pillage taken at Pometia, which was laid by for the accomplishment of the whole work, would hard and scant serve for the very foundation, And therfore I would rather give credit unto Fabius Pictor (to fay nothing that he is the more ancient author of the twain) that there were but *40 talents, and no more, than to Pijo, who writeth, that there was *40000 7300 li. terl. pound weight of filver fet by for that tile. Which fum or mass of money could never belooked for to arise out of the saccage of one only City in those daies: and must needs exceed the charges of the foundation of any of thesestately and magnificent buildings in this our age. The King being L thus wholly minded and bent to the finishing of the Temple, and sending for Carpenters, Masons, and other workmen, out of all parts of Tuscan, employed not only the Cities money and stock thereabout, but also had the work and labour of the common people with all. Which was no small toil of theirs, confidering the travell of warfare befides: yet were they less agrieved and discontented therewith, fo long as they founded and reared with their own hands the Temples of the immortall gods. But afterwards were they employed and fet to other works, which as they were less in shew so were they more painful and of greater trouble, namely, the making of scaffolds or standing-places in the Cirque or Theater; and to the conveyance of amighty great finke or vault under the ground for to receive and carry away all the filth and corruption of the City. To which two pieces of work, carcely is the magnificence of our new modern buildings, in any respect com- M > frontier towns for the defence of the City by sea and land. Whilest he was busied in these affairs, there appeared unto him a strange and fearfull sight, namely, a ferpent gliding down a pillar of wood, which having put the beholders in great fright, and caused them to flie into the Kings palace, did not so much amaze the Kings heart with sudden and momentany fear for the present, as fill his head with perplexed cares what the thing might portend. Whereas therefore the manner was to use the Calchars and wise men of Tuscan about N publike prodigious tokens only: he being much troubled in spirit, and terrified at this fearfull fight, being domesticall, and as it were touching and concerning his own person: purposed to fend out as far as Delphi to the most famous and renowned Oracle in the world. And for that he durst not put any other in trust with the answers that should be delivered by the fatall lots, he addressed two of his sons to take a voyage through unknown lands in those daies, and more unknown leas into Greece. Titus and Aruns were they that went this journey, having to bear them company all the way, L. Junius Brutus. This Brutus was the fon of Tarquinia, the Kings fifter, a young gentleman of a far other nature and disposition than he seemed in outward shew and semblance. He having heard say, that certain principall Citizens, and his own brother among, had been by this his uncle put to death; to the intent that himself might have nothing left, either in O the parts of his mind for the Kingto fear, or in his outward state for him to covet and defire: refolved under the cloak of base contempt to save himself, since that in right or justice he might repose small or no safegard at all. And therefore composing and staming himself of purpose to counterfeit a noddy and a very innocent, as suffering himself and all that he had to fail into the Kings hands as an eicheat, he refused notto be misnamed Brutus, a name appropriate to unreasonable creatures ; that under the shadow & colour of that surname; that courage of his lying close hid, parable. Having in this wife held the commons in continual labour, because he thought that a multitude of people would but over-charge and peffer the City, when they were not employed fome way or other, and also minded by erecting Colonies, to enlarge the Confines of his Dominions, he therefore fent part of them to inhabit and people Signia and Circeii, two strong forts and

A which should one day set free the City of Rome, might abide the full time and appear in due season. This Brutus being by the Tarquins brought to Delphi, as their laughing stock to make them passime by the way, rather than a meet mate to accompany them, carried with him (as men say) partities the way stated an incential of a company term, varied wan min (as men may) forto offer and prefere time A pollo a golden rod within a staffe of cornell wood, made hollow for the purpole: the very type and refemblance by fetret circumflances, of his natural disposition, Thither being arrived, the young men having done their fathers commission accordingly, were very desirous and earnest to inquire and learn of the Oracle, which of them should be King of Rome. And from the bottom of the deep Vault, this answer, as men say, was delivered in their hearing: [Which of you (Oyoung men) shall first kis your mother, he shall bear chief and soveraign rule in Rome.]

B The Tarquins then intending that Sextus their brother who was left behind at Rome, might neither know the answer, nor yet obtain the kingdom, willed the matter should by all possible means be carried to secret as might be and concealed from him. They themselves agreed upon this together, to draw lots whether of them twain, when they were returned to Rome, should first kits his mother, But Brutus supposing the speech of Apollo his Priest, tended to another sense, made as though hestumbled forward and took a fall, and so couched the ground with his mouth and kissed the earth, thinking this with himfelf, that she was common mother of all mortall men. Then returned

they to Rome, where they found great preparation for war against the Rucilians

The Rutilians then were Lords of Ardea, A people in those parts, and for those times, very rich Ardea befored and wealthy: and that was it that gave the very occasion and was the first motive of war. The by the Romans - C Roman King was desirous both to enrich himself, as having about the sumptious building of publike works emptied his coffers : and ano by tome spoil, to mollifie and win again the hearts of his naturall lubjects : being much discontented (bendes their generall mislike of his pride otherwise) at his manner of government; and diddining greatly that they were by the King made labourers, to serve carpenters and masons, and held so long to servile toil and painfull labour. The Romans affaired at the beginning to surprise and win Ardea by affault: but when that way sped but ill, then began they to annoy and diffress the enemies by laying siege, by casting trenches, raising forts, and fabricks about the town. During this fiege, and the standing camp lying there, (as it falleth out commonly, when the war is rather long and late than hot and cruell) there were granted large licenses and pasports to and fro between the Camp and Rome, with much liberty: and

D yet more to the Principals of the Army than to the common Souldiers. And the Kings fons had otherwhile good leifure to feast and banquet one with another. Upon a time it hapned whiles they were drinking and making merry with Sextus Tarquinius in his pavilion, where Collatinus Tarquinius the fon of Egerius fat at supper; there arole among other good table-talk, some arou-Ingabout their wives: whiles every man highly praifed and wondroully commended his own.

And growing to iome heat and contention thereabout: There need not many words for this matter, quoth Collatinus, for in few hours it may be known how far my Lucretia surpasseth all the rest. The story of And therefore if there be any lustiness and courage of youth in us, why mount we not on horse-dame Lacretia, back, and in our own perions go and see the natures and dispositions of our wives? And as they thall be found and icentaken of a fudden, and not looking for their husbandscoming, fo let eve E ry man judge of them, and fet that down for the only triall of this controverse. They had all taken their drink well, and were prettily heat with wine: Mary, content say they all, and to horse they go, and away they gallop on the spur to Rome. Thirther were they come by the shutting in of the evening when it grew to be dark; and so forward without any stay to Colluin they ride. Where they find dame Lucretia, not as the Kings fons wives, whom they had suprifed and seen white they find the time away in feating and rioting with their minions and companions: but fitting up far within the night in the midt of her house among ther maidens, hard at woollwork by candle-light. Whereupon, in this debate about their wives, the entire praite and commendation rested in Lucretia: Her Husband and the Tarquins had a loving and courteous welcom at her hands. And he again for joy of the victory, invited the Kings ions kindly and made F them friendly cheare. There at that instant Sextus Tarquinius was bewitched and possessed with wicked wanton luft, for to offer violence and villany unto Lucretia: her passing beauty and her approved chassity set him on fire and provoked him thereto. But for the present, when they had disported themselves all night long like lusty and pleasant youths, they returned betimes in the morning to the Camp, A few daies after, Sextus Tarquinius, unwitting to Collatinus, attended with one only mancame to Collatia, where he was again in good and friendly fort received by them in the house, that suspected nothing less than that whereabout he was come. And being after supper brought up into the guest chamber, when he thought all about him fure, and that every body was fast asleep, all set on fire and burning in love, he steppeth with naked sword in hand to Lucretia, as the lay fleeping full foundly, and bearing down the womans breft with his left hand, Peace (quoth G he) Lucretia & not a word: I am Sextus Tarquinius. I have my drawn Iword in handif thou once speak thou shalt surely die. The filly woman thus starting out of sleep, was sore astright, as seeing no remedy but in a manner present death, in case she had cried for help. Then uttered Tarquinius and confessed his amorous passion, fell to entreat and entreat again, and with his prayers intermedled threats, and went every way about her, not ceating by all means to fift, to found and tempt the womans heart. But when he faw her obstinate and invincible, and (to diefor it) not relenting one jot; then, besides the sear of death, he presented unto her dishonour and shame:

pretending that after he had maffacred her, he would lay by her fide in naked bed, her own man-H fervant with his throat cut; that it might be voiced abroad, that she was taken and killed in filthy Lucretia forced adultery. For lear of this reproach and infamy, see how sinfull lust gar the victory, and conquered constant chastity and Tarquinius in great pride and jollity, that he had by affault won the fort of a womans honour departed thence, But wofull Lucretia, ali forrowing for to heavy a mitchance, dispatched a messenger to her father at Rome, and so forward to her husband at Ardea, with this errand: That they should come unto her, each of them with one faithfull and trusty friend, and hereof they must not fail, but make all the speed they could for that there was befallen a grievous chance and horrible, So there repaired to her Sp. Lucretius her father, accompanied with P. Valerius the fon of Volesus: and Collatinus her husband, with L. Jun. Brutus. Who both together by I chance going back to Rome, encountred in the way his wives messenger. Lucretta they found fitting alone in her bed-chamber, all heavy and fad: and she at the coming of these her dearest friends, thed tears and wept apace. How now my dear (quoth her husband) is all well? " No God wot fir, "(quoth she again:) For how can ought be well with a woman that is despoiled of her honour

But give me first your right hands, and make faithfull promise that the "adulterer shall not elcape unpunished. Sex. And never shall there by example of Lucretia any unhonest woman or wanton haror live a day: & thus having faid, with a knife which she had close hidden under her loaths, she "fabbed her felt to the heart, and finking down forward, fell upon the floor ready to yeeld up the " ghoft, Out alas, cried her husband and father hereat : and whileft they two were in their plaints and moans, Brutus drew forth the knife out of the wound of Lucretia, & holding it out afore him, L all embrued and dropping with bloud," Now I fwear (quoth he, by this blond, by this most chaste and pure bloud before the villany wrought by the Kings fon, and here before the gods I protell, whom I call to witness, that I will by fire and sword, and with all my might and main persecute "and drive the country of L. Tarquinius the proud, and his ungracious wile, and the whole broad " of his children, and suffer neither him nor any else for his sake to raign as King at Rome. Then gave he the knife to Collatinus, and so to Lucretius & Valerius, who greatly amazed at this so strange occurrent, and wondring how it came to pass, that Brutus should of a sudden be so changed, and become so flour of flomack and couragious, took the same form of oath that he sware afore and to leaving their wailing and lamentation, and wholly fet upon anger and revenge, they followed Brutus as their Captain and Leader to put down and overthrow the government of Kings, and ut- M terly to root out their race. The dead corps of Lucretia, was had out of doors, brought into the market place and there shewed And thither, what with wondring (as the manner is)at so strange a fight, and what with the indignation of so unworthy a fact, they raised much people together. Every man for his part was ready enough to complain of the wickedness and violence done by the Kings bloud. The forrow of Lucretius the father on the one fides the resolution of Brutus on the other fide, who rebuked and blamed all vain weeping and foolish moaning, moved and perswaded all that were present, that like men of valour, like true hearted Romans, they would take arms against them that demeaned themselves no better may, worse than ordinary enemies, And presently, the bravest and tallest young men shewed themselves forward, ready in armour, and voluntary, The rest of the youths followed streight after. And having left at Collatia the one half of their forces in N garrison, toward the gates, and set certain watches, that no man brought tidings or news unto the King and his fons of this rifing and commotion, all the other were appointed in warlike manner, followed their leader Bruns-from thence directly to Rome Arthe fudden coming thither of this armed multitude: no marvell if all the way whereas they passed and marched, there arose a fear and trouble among the people. But when they perceived the most substantiall and principall Citizens in the forefront, they judged whatfoever the matter meant, it was not for naught, And verily this hainous fact disquieted the minds of men no less at Rome, than it had before at Collaria. Therfore from all parts of the City there was flocking and running into the market place. And being thither come, the Bedell or common Crier, summoned the people to appeare before the Tribune of the Celeres or Captain of the guard: which office haply Brutus bare at that time, Where O he made an Oration not proceeding from that spirit, nor resembling that quality of nature which unto that day he had pretended and made shew of unto the world, for he inveighed against the violence and filthy lust of Sextus Tarquinius; the shamefull villany and not to be named, pleagainst the done upon the body of Lucretia: "he discoursed of her lamentable end and pitious death, and " the desolate case of Tricipitinus, berefe now of all his children: who accounted the occasion of "his daughters death a greater indignity, and more pitifull, than her very death. Moreover he

A "laid abroad the pude of the King himfelf; the miferies, the infinite toile and pains of the Com-"mons, buried as it were under the ground, with cleaning and cafting of dirches, voiding and far-"ming of the finks, Saying, that the men of Rome which were the conquerers of all nations about "them were now of warriors become quartiers, hewers of shone and day-laborers. He reckoned "up also and put them in mind of the unworthy death and exuell murder of Servius Tullius: and "how his daughter (oh abominable act !) rode over the corps of her father in her curied chariot: "And herewith be calleth on the gods that are revengers of outrages and wrongs done to parents. Thus rehearing these and other matters, much more grievous and horrible, (I verily believe) according as the prefent indignity at the very time doth minister and give utterance for, not so easily B penned and fet down by writers that come after, he fo mightily inflamed the multitude, that he cansed them to depose the King, to deprive him of his royall state and dignity, yea, and to decree and enash, that L. Tarquinius with his wife and children should be banished for ever. Himself having selected and armed the younger gallants, who offered their service, and willingly entred their names, let forward in person to the Camp lying before Ardea, for to excite the Army there against the King: leaving the government of the City unto Lucretius, who had before been appointed Deputy and Lieutenant there, by the King, In this time of garboile, Tullia left the palace and fled, and all the way as the went, both men and women curied and cried out upon her, and befought the ghoftly spirits and suries of parents to be avenged. When news hereof was brought into the Camp. and that the King upon these strange tidings made haste towards Romes, to stay and suppress these C broyls: Brutas having intelligence of his coming, turned another way because he would not meet with him, And fo at one instant in a manner, by contrary journies came Brutus to Ardea, and Tonquinius to Rome. But the gates were shut against Tarquinius, and instead of entrance, warned he Tarquinius was, and commanded into exile. The whole Camp received with joy Brutus the redeemer of their City. From thence were also the Kings sons driven: two of them followed after their father and departed into banishment unto Cere, a town of the Tuscans: as for Sextus Tarquinius, he retired himself to Gabes as it were into his own Kingdom: where he was murdered in revenge of old quarrels, upon malice and hatred of the people which he had brought upon himself in times past, L. Tarquinius Superbus raigned 25 years. Thus continued the Kings Regiment at Rome, from the foundation of the City, unto the freedom and redemption thereof 244 years. Then in a folemn rs affembly and election by the Centuries, held by the Provost of the City, according to the ordinance of Servius Tullius in his Commentaries, two Confuls were created: L. Junius Brutus, and co

BRutus rook an oath of the people that they flould not fuffer any to raign King at Rome. He compiled his fellow Confull Tarquinius Collatinus, a suspected man to take part with the Tarquins, by rections of the affinity be had with them, to give over the Confulfing, and to depart the City. The goods of the King and his sons he commanded to be stated upon and wise. A field of theirs he consecrated to Mats, which was named afterwards Campus Martius, or Mats field. He beheaded certain young Genp tlemen of the Nobility together with his own and his brothers fons, for conspiring to receive the King and his Complices again into the City. Unio the bondstave Vindicius, that bewrayed the complot, he gave his freedoms of whom Vindicta took the name. Having led ar Army against the King who had assembled a power of Veientians and Tarquinians, and made war, he died in bastoll together with Aruns, the son of Superbus : and for his death the dames of Rome mourned one whole year. P. Valerius the Conful propounded and made a Law concerning Appealing unto the people. The Capitoll was dedicated. Porferan King of the Clutins, warring in the quarrell of the Tarquins, and being come tashe Janiculum, was by the values of Cocles Horatius, empeached that he passed not the Tybett who alone, whiles others beweed drawn the Sublician bridge, with so of the Tuscans: and when it was broken down, least armed as he was into the river, and smam over to his fellows. Another example of manhood is reported of Mutius, G who being entered the Camp of the enemies with full intent to kill Porsena, and having flain his prinopail Secretary, whom he took for the King, was apprehended: and thrufting his hand into the fire of the Alars, whereupon they had hurwed facrifice, fuffered it there to fry untill is was confumed: and faid withall, that there were behind him three hundred more besides, that had sworn the death of the King himself. Who wondring at their resolution, was driven to offer conditions of peace, and upontaking of hostagesto give over war: among st whom, one virgin Clorlia, beguiled her keepers, made an escape, and fwam over Tyber to her friends: and being rendred again, was by Porlena fent honorably home, and had her statue or image on horseback fet up for a memoriall. Ap. Claudius abandoned the Sabins, and fled H. to Rome, of whom the Tribe Clausia took the name, and was added to the rest. The number of tribes was encreased to be one and twenty. Against Tarquinius Superbus, who with a power of Latines waved war, A. Potthumius the Diftator, obtained a profesent battell at the lake Regillus. The Commons rifing, for being enthralled unto their Creditors, retired themselves into the mount Sacet, and were by the policy and counfil of Menenius Agrippa, reclaimed from their fedition, and appealed. The same Agrippa being deceased mas by reason of his poverty, buried at the Cities charge. There were created five Tribunes of the Commons. Cotioli, a town of the Volicians, was taken by the valour and industrious means of Cn. Martius, who thereupon was surnamed Coriolanus. T. Latinus, a mean Commoner, was warned in a dream to make relation to the Senate of certain religious ceremonies: and for neglecting the same, lost his son, I and fell himself to be lame of hislimbs, and being brought in the Senate in a chair, after he had declared the same, returned found on his feet home again, Cn. Martius Coriolanus, after he was banished, became Generall of the Volicians, and with an Army of enemies approached the City of Rome: unto whom, fi ft Emlaffadors were of purpose sent, and afterwards the Priests and whole Clergy perswaded with him, not to make war against his native Countrey, but all in vain. Howbeit Veturia his mother, and Volumnia his wife entreated him and obtained, that he should depart back again. The Law Agraria; concerning division of lands among the poor Commons, was now first put up and proposed. Sp. Castu; an Alderman, after he had been Conful, was condemned for aftering to be King, and fuffered death therean Ausmanysper to emuces companyed to the fore. Oppia at Fifth and Fifth Names to inself buried guick, Againft the Vicintians near enemies and ill neighbors, set indeed troublessome rather than noisome and dangerous, the bouse alone of the Fability requir K redto be employed in service; and set out three hundred and six armed men to the field, who every one were by the enemies stain near the river Cremera, and left but one only at home alive of that name, under fourteen years of age. Ap. Claudius the Consul having fought unfortunately against the Volscians, and that, by means of the stubbornness and unruliness of his Army, cudgelled every tenth man of his louldiers. Over and besides (this book) containeth the exploits against the Volicians, Equians, and Veientians, and the feditions discords between the Nobility and Commons.

The Second Book of T. Livius.

Ow will I definibe from henceforth, the acts both in war and peace of the people of L. Rome, a free thate now from this time forward: their yearly Magistrates and Governours: the authority and rule of Laws, more powerfull and mighty than that of men. Which freedom of theirs, the last Kings pride made more acceptable and welcome. As for the other Kings before him, they raigned (6, as that they might be conned all of them, and that worthily, builders of fundry parts of the City one after another, according as they every one by himself added still one new place or other, for the multitude by them encreased to inhabit. Neither is it to be doubted, but that even the very fame Brutus, who deferved so great honor and glory for expelling the proud King Tarquin, should have done the same to the exceeding danger of the weal publike, if for defire of unripe and untimely freedom, he had wrested the royall cignity and government from any of the former Princes. For what would have come of it, if that communalty M consisting of herdmen and sugitive strangers, resorting out of their own countries there to dwell, having under protection of a fanctuary and priviledged place gotten liberty, or at least wife impunity; being now freed and past fear of a royall Majesty, had begun to be troubled and disquieted, with the ruffling ftorms and feditious tempefts of the Tribuns? and in a new and strange City fown debate, and entertained variance with the Nobility, before that the furest pledges of wives and children, the dearest affection of the very place and foil, which requiresh long time of liking and loving, had united and knit their heartstogether? Certainly, the state not yet come to full growth and maturity, had by discord faded and come to nought, which a peaceable and gracious government cherished and fostered, and by cherishing and nourishing brought to that pals, that now being come to ripeness and perfection of strength, it might be able to bring forth and bear N the good and whollom fruits of liberty.

The beginning of this freedom you must account in regard hereof, That the Consulary regiment was annual, and from year to year, rather than that the royall power and jurisdiction that the Kings had, was any whitabated and diminished. For the first Consuls had the same absolute authority, held all the former royalties, and retained still the regall enfigus and ornaments of supreme dignity. This only provided that they should not both have the rods born before them, for avoiding a twofold fear and dread of their Majelty. Bratus with the good liking and confent of his companion in office, had the preheminence and pretogative of that honour to be done unto him alone: who had not been aforetime a greater instrument, and more forward to procure and recover the liberty than he was afterward a fure maintainer and protector of the same. And first above O all other things, whilest the people were yet greedy of this new freedom, for fear lest they might any time after be won by entreaty or moved by gilts on the Kings part, he cauled them to fwear that they would never suffer any to be King at Rome. After this, because the Senate might be of more power and greater reputation by the frequent company of that degree and order: he encreafed their number (which had been impaired much by maffacres, committed by the faid King) to the full complement of three hundred: by chusing the chief and principall of the degree of

A Knights or horsemen. And hereof came, as they say, this custome, to admit into the Senate both them that were before time of the ancient Nobility, and also those that were newly chosen for the fupply: naming these that were last entolled, the new Senate. And a wonder it was to see, how much good this did to the concord of the City, and to the knitting of the hearts of Nobles

This done they went in hand with Religion and Church-matters ; and for that there were certain publike facrifices that had been usually executed by the Kings themselves in their own perfons: left therefore they should not find the mils of Kings in any respect, nor long after them again they create of purpole a King-Priest or facrificer: which facerdotall dignity they ordained to B be under the Arch-Prelate, left that this new addition and title of honour, might prejudice their freedom any jot, whereunto they had then a speciall regard above all other things. And I wot not well, but I think verily they went beyond all measure, and were over-precise in the maintenance and frengthening thereof every way, even in the smallest trifles, and toiles of no moment. For when as nothing else was offensive unto them, the name for footh of one of their Confuls became suspected and odious unto the City, without any other scandall whatsoever. And thus they murtered and faid," That the Tarquinis had raigned over-long, and too much already: that Prifcus first "began, and when after him succeeded King Servins Tullius, Superbus Tarquinius not having in that "time and space between, forgot the Kingdom, as seeing another invested therein; by wicked " practice and violence claimed and recovered the fame again, as the inheritance properly to his "house belonging. And now that Superbus is driven out and gone, the rule and government is de-"volved unto Collarinus, and there refleth. These Tarquins belike (fay they) cannot skill how to "live as private, men: giving out among, that the very name was dangerous to a free State, and in "one word, they could not endure it. These and such like speeches at first were whispered abroad throughout all the City by them that under-hand founded by little and little the hearts and diffiofitions of men: and when these surmises & suspitions were once buzzed into the Commons heads, and they thereby disquieted, Brutus called them to a generall assembly. Where first and formost he reciteth the oath of the people, That they should suffer none to be a King nor ought else in Rome, from whence might artie any danger to their liberty. "This oath is the thing (quoth he) that Brutus the "with all diligence, & by all means possible is to be maintain'd, & nothing thereto appertaining Consulperis to be despised and lightly regarded. As for me, I am unwilling to speak in respect of the per- sweden Tar-

Now (quoth he) L, Tarquinius willingly of your own accord rid them " of their fear. We remember well, we confeis and acknowledge, you it was that expelled the "Kings, Finish therefore and perfect this great benefit of yours: take away from hence the Kings "name also. As for your goods and substance, your Citizens and Countrimen, if they will be ad-"vised by me, shall not only yeeld unto you again, but if ought be short and wanting, shall by my

E "consent supply the same to the full right liberally. Depart I say, and friendly take your lowe: deli-"ver the City and disburden them of this their fear, that peradventure is but vain and needless: "Howbeit, this their minds give them, that together with the flock and house of the Tarquins, the "Kings rule and government will likewife void and depart for ever. The Conful at this fo ffrange and fudden a motion, first wondred much, and was not able to open his mouth. But afterwards as he addressed himselfand began to make a speech, the heads of the City came about him, and with many prayers belonght the same at his hands. As for all the rest, they prevailed full little with him. But after that Sp. Lucretius, a more grave and elder man than himself, of greater worth aforetime, and his father in Law befides, took him in hand and dealt with him fundry waies, one while by way of intreaty, otherwhiles by periwafions and reasons, that he would condescend into that F which the City in one general confent required: then the Conful fearing left hereafter being once out of his place and a private man again, he should chance to be forced thereunto, with the loss of his goods and some diigrace perhaps besides; resigned up the office of the Consulthip, and removing all that he had away to Lavinium, quit the City and departed. Then Brutus by an act and decree of the Senate proposed unto the people, That all the race and linage of the Tarquins should be exiled. And in a generall Session of the Centuries, he created for to be his Colleague in government, P. Valerius, by whose affistance he had driven out the Kings. No man doubted now that the Tarquins were about to take arms: yet that war hapned not so foon as men looked for: but fee (à thing that no man feared) they had like by fraud and treason at home to have lost and forgone their freedom again. There was of the flower of Rome, certain A conspiring G youths, & those of no low degree nor base parentage descended, who in the Kings dates had lived of the construction of the construction like young Princes more loosely and at pleasure, as companions and plaifellows with the young Nobility, Tarquing, the Kings fons: who feeking to enjoy the same licentious life still, in this equality of estate wherein all others then lived, made moan and complained one to another. That the liberty of others turned to their servitude. "The King, say they, is a man, at whose hands one might ob-" tain somewhat, as need required, were the cause right or were it wrong: where a man might find "favour and frienship, as who could both be displeased and angry, and also forgive and remit a

"fault, and knew wellhow to make difference between a friend and a foe. As for laws, they are H "things deaf and inexorable: more wholfome and commodious to the poor than to the rich and "mighty affording no release nor pardon if one chance to trespais and transgress: And a ticklish " point it is and perilous for a man among fo many errours whereto our frailty is subject, to bear "himself only upon his innocent life. Being thus of their own accordalready discontent, suddenly unlooked for there came Embafladors from the Kings, who without any mention at all of return, demanded only their goods again. Upon their message being delivered and heard in the Senatehouse, this debate and question held them for certain daies in councill, fearing lest that the goods not restored might minister occasion of quarrell, and being rendred, yield maintenance and nonrishment of war. In the mean time the Embassadours dealt and treated with divers persons di-I verfly: in open shew claiming only their goods, but secretly and under-hand, contriving how to compais the Kingdom for their Masters. And under colour of procuring friends for the accomplishment of that which they pretended, and was in question, they sounded oftentimes the minds of certain noble young Gentlemen, how they flood affected to their defignments. Whose words and reasons were of them gently entertained: and thereupon they delivered unto them letters from the Tarquim, and withall conferred together, and practifed the receiving of the Kings privily by night into the City. The execution of this plot was principally committed to certain of the Vitellii and Aquilii, that were brethren. A fifter of the Vitellii was married unto the Conful Brutus, by whom he had two fons that were youngmen, Titus and Tiberius, whom their uncles by the mothers side made partakers with them likewise of their counsell. Besides, there were divers K young Gentlemen (whole names long time hath worn out quite) made acquainted therewith In this mean feason, their opinion in the Senate-house prevailed, who thought it best that the goods should be restored: and the Embassadours upon that occasion made stay in the City, for that they had gotten time of the Consuls to provide carriage for to have away the Kings stuff, and other movable goods. All that time spent they in consulting with the Conspirators, and so importunately laboured them, untill they had procured their letters also unto the Tarquinis: for otherwise (fay they) how will they believe but that their Embaffadours make wrong report of matters fo important. The giving of those letters in pledge of their truth and plain meaning, proved to bewray and reveal their purposed enterprise. For the day before the Embassadours were to take their leave, and return to the Tarquins, they fortuned to sup with the Vitelii: and whilest the conspira- L tors there, werein fad and close talk together, conserring at large about this new devised practise, and no man by but only themselves (as the manner is:) a certain bonds ave chanced to overhear them, one that before had an inckling whereabout they went, but waited the opportunity when the letters should be given to the Embassadours, which being found upon them, might directly prove the treason. This slave after he understood the letters were delivered, gave intelligence of all unto the Confuls: who immediatly departed from their houses to take the Embassadours, and the Conspirators in the manner, and without any stir or tumult light upon them unawares, and dashed all. But of the letters they had a speciall care, that they should be forth-coming and not The confpiramiscarry. And committing the traitors forthwith to prison, they made some pause and doubt about the Embaffadors, what to do with them. For albeit they feemed to have deferved no lefs M but to be used as enemies, and to have no favour at all, yet had they regard to thelaw of Nations. Now concerning the Kings goods, which they thought meet before to be restored, the matter came about who ly in question again before the Senators: who being overcome with ire and indignation, denied flatly the rendring of them, yea, and forbad they should be confiscate and converted to the common treasury: but they were given away among the Commons to make spoil and havock thereof: to the end, that they having one touched or feifed on the Kings goods as a booty, might for ever after bepaft all hope of any peace or favour with them. The field of the Tarquins lying between the City and Tyber, was confectated unto Mars, and after called Campus Martili.e. Mars field. It happed (as men say) that there was at that time standing corn there, now ripe and ready for the harvest: which crop of ground, because they made some scruple of consci-N ence otherwise to consume, therefore it was cut down, corn, straw, stubble and all, and a great number of people sent thither at once to carry it away in baskets and skeps, and pour it down the Tyber, running then but shallow, as it useth to do in the midst and heat of Summer. And so the heaps of Corn, together with the mud fluck fill and refted in the ebbe places and foords of the river: and by little and little encreased with one thing or other that came down the stream, until it became an Island, Afterwards, I suppose, there were dams and piles made thereunto, and by mans and put to death. Which suffering of theirs was the more notable, for that the father by his place O & vertue of his office was bound and charged to see execution done upon his own own children: and he who otherwise ought not to have been a spectator and looker on, even he (such was his fortune) was forced of necessity to be the principall actor in this tragicall execution. Then stood these most noble youths bound fast to a stake. But among all, the Consul his children, turned upon them the eyes of every man, from all the reft as unknown persons and of no reputation; all men pitted them, not so much forbeing punished, as for deserving by their fact to be hand it grew so high, and so firm a piece of ground, that it was able to bear even Temples and stately Galleries that stood thereupon. When the Kings goods were thus spoiled, risled, and made away, the traitors were condemned A punished: That they could find in their hearts and once let enter into their thought, to betray into the hands of Tarquinius, fometimes a proud Prince, and then a cruell enemy, and banished rebell, their native countrey, lately and in that very year fet free from capcivity: their naturall father who let it tree: the Consulfhip sprung first out of the family of the Junu: the Nobles, the ther who let it tree: the Community prung introduction of inclinating of the James. This was the first man, as they say that was made free by the rod Vinditta: for that the party his name was Vinditius, from whence, as some think, the word Vindicta was derived: after whom, this was observed. That whosoever in that fort got their freedom, were supposed withall endepized

When tidings hereof came to Tarquinius, with the manner of proceeding in every circumstance, he not only grieved that so great hope of his was frustrate and come to nothing, but C also was let on fire with hatred and indignation: and seeing the way that up and stopped against ~ all deceitfull courses, he thought there was no dealing now but by meet force and open war. Whereupon he went up and down, follicited and made humble fuit unto the Cities of Etraria, and befought the Veientians especially, and the * Tarquinians, that they would not suffer him, being come of their own bloud, a binished man, forlorn, poor, and needy, dispossed to lately of Tarquinii.

These suggestions moved the Veientians, and every man for himself muttered and gave out in threatning wife, that now at length, having a Roman Captain especially to be their Leader, they were to do away the foul dishonours sustained, and win E again what by former war they had loft. As for the Tarquinians, they were foon incited in regard of name and contanguinity, and thought it was a godly matter and an honour unto them, to have of their own name and house to be Kings of Rome, Thus two armies of two Cities banded with Tarquin, for to restore him to his Kingdom again, and to make sharp war upon the Romans: who being entred the Territory of Rome, were met with by the Roman Confuls. The footmen marched under the conduct of Valerius, marshalled in a battallion four iquare. Brutus with the horse went before to espy and discover the coasts: In like fort the men of arms of the enemies rode formost under the leading of Aruns Tarquinius the Kings ion, and the King himself in person sollowed with the Legions. Now help ye gods that are revengers of wrongs done to Kings: and therewithall fet spurs to his horse, and ran amain with full carreer upon the Consul his own person intending certainly to speed him. Brutus perceived likewise that he made directly roward him: (Now was it a noble and worthy fight for the Captains themselves to begin the battell.) Whereupon with resolute courage he encountreth him. And so fiercelythey charged one another, and to deadly were they bent, that neither of them had regard to fave himfelf, to he might wound and mischief his enemy, but were both with a counterpush that quite pierced their targets run into the fides, and thrust through, and so having one anothers lance sticking in their bodies, G fell from their hories ready to dye. Herewith began on both fides the other horiemen to fight, and within a while the footmen also seconded them. And so equally were they matched and the battell so indifferently fought, that it was very doubtfull whether side had the better. For on both parts the right wings got the upper hand, and down went the left. The Veientians, unto whom The Veientians it was no news to be overcome of Romans, were discomfitted and put to flight. fell such a fear and terrour upon Tarquinius, and the Tuscans, that both Armies as well of the Vei-H entians as the Tarquinians, gave over their enterprise with doing just nothing, and by night diflodged and departed every man to his own home. This battell was more notable by reason of certain miracles that men report: namely, that in the dead time of the night next following, when all were at rest, there was heard a mighty voice of Sylvanus (as men thought) out of the wood Arfato utter theie words.] That there was flaine on the Inscan part more by one, and that the Romans non the field.] Thus verily and no otherwise departed they alunder: the Romans as winners, and the Tulcans as having the worle. For the next morrow, so soon as it was day, and that none of the enemies appeared in fight, P. Valerius the Conful gathered up the spoil together, and returned from thence with triumph to Rome, and performed the funerals of his brother Conful, in all fump- I tuous manner and solemn pomp, as possibly at that time he could devise, But, that which did him the greatest honour after his death, was the publike forrow and heaviness of the City, in this refreet above all fingular and memorable, for that the dames and Matrons of Rome mourned a whole year for him, as for their own father, in that he had been fo sharp a revenger of violence done to the chaffity of women.

After this, the Confulthat survived, presently upon the great liking and favour that he was in (see how wavering and unconstant theminds are of the common people) was not only envied, but also suspected, yea, and charged with an odious and horrible crime. The voice went and bruited it was abroad, that he aspired to the Crown, And why? because, for sooth, he had not chosen unto him a new fellow Conful in the room of Brutus: and began to build aloft on the top of Velia, K where (faythey) in an high place and strongly scituate he may make a Castle impregnable. These things commonly spoken and credited too, vexed much, and mightily grieved the Consui in his very foule, as a great indignity offered unto him. Whereupon heaftembled the people together & cauling the rods to be held downwards to the ground, went up into the pulpit to make an Oration unto them. That fight pleafed the people paffing well, taking it for a plain demonstration, that the marks and ensigns of rule and government lubmitted unto them, was a very acknow-P: Valerius the ledging and confession that the people was of greater majesty and powerthanthe Conful. Where after silence made, and commandment to hearken and give ear, "the Consul began highly to ex-"toll the fortune and good hap of his Colleaguedeceased, who having with great honour set his "Country free, ended his daies, fighting manfully in defence of the Weal-publike, even in the L

After this were laws enasted, which not only acquit the Conful and cleared him of all suspicion of affecting to the Kingdom, but also contrariwise wrought such effect, that he became ex-N ceeding popular again, whereupon, he was furnamed Publicola or Poplicola. And first and formost the Statute passed as touching the appeal unto the people, against the Rulers and Magistrates. Item, concerning the curfing and condemning of him both body and goods, that should intend or plot to nsurp Princely dominion over them. These acts the Commons liked well of, Which when he had alone ordained, that all the thanks and praife might be his therefore, then affembled he a generall Session for the substituting of another Consul unto him, in the room of his Colleague departed. So, Sp. Lucretius was created Conful: who being an aged man and of great years feeble withall, and not able to execute the office and function of a Coniul, within few daies paid nature her debt and died. And in place of Lucretius was M. Horatius Pulvillus chosen. In some ancient writers I do not find that Lucretius was Conful. For immediatly after Brutus they make O mention of Horetius. But I think verily because no act of his made his Consulthip memorable, thereupon he was forgotten and left out. Now as yet was not the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitoll dedicated And when Valerius and Horaius the Confuls, call lots whether of them twain should perform that duty, the chargefell unto Horatius, and Publicola went forthto the Veientian war. But the kinsfolk and friends of Valerius took it more grievously and impatiently than reason was, that the honor of the dedication of so famous a temple, was given unto Horatius.

A Deviling therefore by all means possible they could, to impeach it and seeing they had assaid all in vain and nothing took effect: even at the very inflant, whiles the Conful was holding a post of the Temple, and in his folemn prayers to the gods, behold they brought unto him heavy and wofull news, that his fon was dead, and that he might not lawfully, whiles his houshold mourned and was polluted with a dead corps, confectate the Temple. Whether it were that he gave no credit to the messenger, or rather was of heart so stout, neither is it for certain reported, nor easie for a man to divine. But for all these tidings, never a jot was he turned from his purpose, nor said ought else to the messenger, but willed that he should bid the corps to be had forth to buriall, and to holding the pillar or post still said out his prayer, and dedicated the Temple. These were the acts B done both at home and abroad in the first year after the expulsion of the Kings.

Then were P. Valorius the second time, and T. Lucretius created Confuls. By this time were the Tarquins fled for succour to Lartes Porsena King of Clusium: "where, by many reasons and rea monstrances, intermingled with prayer, one while they befought him not to suffer them deteen-"ded from the Tulcans, of the lame bloud and name, to live needy and forlorn in perpetuall exile: cotherwhile they advised and warned him not to put up without revenge this new fashion of "expelling Kings, now comming up. Saying, that liberty in it self had sweetness enough: and un-"less Kings would defend and maintain their Crowns with as great might and main, as Cities ." defired to enjoy freedom, there would be a general confusion, and all things turned upside down: " neither would there be in States and Common wealths any thing aloit and eminent above o-C " ther endured: whereupon would iffue a finall end of Kingly regiment, a thing with God and

"man of all other most excellent and beautiful. Porfena supposing it would be an honourable matter unto the Tufans, both to have a King at Rome, and a King too of the Tufans line, came with a cruell army against Rome. Never was the Senate at any time afore put in such fear: to mighty in Portenabetholed ites was the pullance of Clusium, and the name of Porfena fo renowned. Moreover, they flegeth Romi feared not their enemies only, but also their own subjects at home, left peradeenture the Communalty of Rome for fear of war should receive the King into the City, and accept of peace though it cost them their liberty. During which time the Commons were entertained of the Nobles with all kindness, and many favours and courtefies they had at their hands. And above all things order was taken for provision of grain and victuals. And for to purvey store of corn, some were

D fent to the Volfei, others to Cumes. Over and befides the licence of felling falt, because it was fold at an exceeding high price, (was taken from private falters, and was undertaken by the City. with all the cost and charges thereto belonging by them defraied, and salt delivered out to the people at an easie reckoning.) The Commons were also freed of portage, tollage, and tribute; and rich men that were able to bear the burthen were affessed at all paiments and contributions: the poor were thought to be charged enough with the bringing up of their children. This kind, n dealing and indulgency of the Nobles kept the City afterwards (notwirh@anding their hard diffress of siege and famine) in such concord and unity, that the meanest as well as the highest abhorred and detefted thename of KK. And never after was there any one private perion, to popular. so devoted to the people by crasty means and indirect courses tending to their particu-

E lar designs, as the whole Senate was at that time, by their good government of the Commonweal. Now when the enemies approached near at hand, every man made thift for himfelf, for-fook the Country and came into the City. Which they fortified with strong guards round about: so that what with wals and bulwarks on the one side, and what with the Tyber on the other side; it feemed fure enough, and fufficiently defended. The wooden bridge had like to have given the enemy entrance, had not the valour of one man been, even Haraius Cocles (who that day by the Tha rare forgood fortune of the Romans was a fortress unto the City of Rome.) He as good hap was, ap- titude of Hapointed to ward and keep the bridge, seeing the Janicle by a sudden assault won, and that the energy ratios coeles. mies ran down to furiously from thence upon him, & contrariwife, the multitude of his own companies for fear, to forgo their weapons, break their arraies, and to be gone: took hold of every man,

F opposed himself against them afront: and calling God and man to witness, protested, shewed and declared unto them, that for laking and abandoning thus their quarter, all their flying was but in vain: for if they left the bridge on their backs, to yield passage to the enemies, there would anon be more of them in Palatium and the Capitoil than in the Janiele; and therefore he willed and commanded them, yea, and gave them direction to break down the bridge; by hewing, by firing, or by what means they possible could : affuring them for his own party to much as the body of one only man was able to do, he would receive, and withit and the violence of the enemies. Then advanceth he himself unto the first entry or soot of the bridge, and all goodly to be feen, amongst those that would in no point fight, but the wed their backs, he so bent his sword and target in their very faces, resolute to encounter with them hand to hand, that even with his G wonderfull hardiness and incredible courage, he aftonied and amazed his enemies. Howbeit, two there were that for very shame tarried still and stood to him, namely, Sp. Larging and Tit, Herminithrave men both, as well for noble birth as worthy deeds. Affilted for a while with their gallants, sustained he the first storm of danger and most cumbersome push of the skirmish. But as they that were having down the bridge called upon them to come back, he conftrained thole two also to retire and save themselves, whiles some jurie part of the bridge was left behind free and uncut. Then casting all about in menacing manner his fiery and terrible eyes towards the Captains, and principals of the Tuscans, one while he challenged them one by one to single fight: other-H whiles he rated them all in generall calling them the hirelings and flaves of proud Kings and tyrants; who forgetting and making no reckoning of their own freedom, were come to oppugn and impeach the liberty of others. The enemies flood at a bay and in suspence a good while, looking about them one upon another who should first begin to fight. At last, very shame made the whole troup to fir and come forward, and to letting up a loud cry, from all fides they let flie their javelins at him one man alone and their only enemy All this while bare he off their shot which light upon his target, and there fluck, and nevertheless with full resolution kept the bridge Hill, walking his stations, and stalking like a giant. Then assaid they with all their force to bear the man down and to turn him over into the water: but by this time the crack of the bridge broken I under him, and the shout withall of the Romans, for joy that they had finished their work, staid with sudden fear their violent assault. Then praied Cocles in this wife: "O father Tiberinus quoth "he) O facred river, with devout heart I thee befeech, receive with thy gracious and merciful ftream this harness, these weapons, and this thy souldier. And so all armed as he was, he leapt into the Tyber: and albeit many a dart was flung from aloft and light upon him, yet he swam over and escaped safe to his fellows. A brave adventure for all posterity another day to talk of, rather than to beleeve for this so great sortitude and resolution of his, the City was thankfull, and in token thereof his Image or Statue was fet up in their common Hall, named Comitium, and as much ground given him in compass, as he was able with a plough to break up in one day. Amongst these publike favours and honours done unto him, the kind affections and good wils of private persons K also well appeared: for in that extream want and scarcity that then was, every man out of his house-store and provision spared from himself and for to give him one thing or another destraided his own belly his Porfena with the repulte of this his first enterprise, changed his mind from affaulting to belieging of the City: and after he had placed a garrion in the Janiculum, he planted himself and encamped on the plain; even upon the banks of the Tyber. And lending for boats and craiers from all parts, both to stop the mouth and passage of Tyber, that no corn should come in and be conveyed to Rome: and also that the louldiers, as they faw occasion, might cross the river, and fetch booties in divers and fundry places at their pleasure, in short space he brought the whole countrey about Rome to such fireights, that not only other things were brought in, but all their carrellallo wasfain to be driven out of the fields into the City, and no man durft put any creature L forth out of the gates. The Tuscans were permitted to be thus bold, not so much for fear as for a policy: for Valerius the Conful, waiting for fome vantage and opportunity, fuddenly to fet upon many of them at once and at unawares, as they fragled abroad dilorderly, making little regard to revenge fmall matters, kept himfelf to be revenged of them throughly, and to pay them home one time or other. To the end therefore he might draw forth these forragers, and toll them abroad; he gave his men in charge, and proclaimed, That the next day in great companies they should put their cartel forth at the gete Efquilina, which was farthest from the enemies: inpposing that they would have intelligence thereof, by reasonthat in this extremity of long fiege and pinching huns ger; some false knaves and disloyal rogues would flie unto them. And so fell it out indeed; For they had knowledge thereof by a fugitive flave. Whereupon they in far greater multitudes pais M over the river, in hope to make a general spoil and havock once for all. Then Valerius commanded T. Herminius with a sufficient company to lie close in ambulliat two miles end, in the Sabird high way, and Sp. Largins with a power of lufty tall fellows lightly armed, to keep the gate Colina, untill the enemy were gone by and past: with direction, then to put himself between the river and them, and fo to intercept them in their return. The other Conful T. Lucretins Mued forth with certain bands of footmen at the gate Navia: and Valerius himself in proper perfon fet forth from mont Capus certain entiens of his best and choice fouldiers. These first were descried and discovered by the enemy. Herminius to foon as he heard some noise and fir, arose and ran at once our of the ambush, and whilest the Tuscans turned to set upon Lucretius, he charged them luftily at their backs: fo that on every hand from the gate Collina on the one fide; N and from the gate Newla on the other, the allarm was given. Thus the robbers were flain and the in pieces in the midft of them : both for that they were overmatched in fight, and also became all the waies were ftopped up, that they could not estane by way of flight. And never after durft the Tukans range about the countrey fo and actioning. Howbeit, the stege continued nevertheless, with great farcity of corn, and exceeding dearth within the City. And Persons had good hope by fitting fill, to force it in the end, and be mafter thereof. At what time one C. Mutius a noble young gentleman, who thought it a dishonour and foul shame, that the people of Rome, who all the while they were in bondage under Kingsi were in no war nor by any enemies beleaguered, fhould now being the same fill in time of their steedom be of their Tucans besieged, whose armies they often had deseated and slipposing that by some hardy and adventurous piece of service O this reproachfull indignity was to be revenged, devided a full on his own head to enter into the enterine Camp: but fearing afterwards to go without commission from the Contain and the knowledge of any other perion, left peradventure the might be taken by the watch of the Romans, and brought back for a traiterous runnagate, at such a time especially, when the hard estate of the City was enough to bring him into a deep suspition, and to be reputed for no better: presented himself before the Council into the Senate house: "I am right willing, and I have a purpose

The Senators gave their confent, and approved his defignment. Then with a skein, hidden under his garment he fettethforward. Being thither come into the Camp, he preffeth in the thickest throng to stand near the Kings Tribunal. It fortuned that then and there the fouldiers were receiving their pay. Rome, Emballadors from Porfena; and so much troubled in spirit was he, both for the danger past of the first assault, (from which nothing preserved him but a final arrow and overlight of the assailant) and also for the hazard to come, (for look how many conspirators remained behind to give the like attempt, to often stood he in jeopsedy of his life) that of his own accord he offered the Romans conditions of peace, And among other capitulations, he flood hard upon this article (but Fallin vain) of reforing the Tarquini into their Kingdom. This point the King arged instantly, ra-sher because he could not well himself deny the Tarquini to much, than for that he was ignount, that the Romanswould never yield thereto. But another article he got granted namely, the reliention of the Veientians lands again ; and the Romans were driven of necessity to give him hostages; in case they would have the King gazrifon to quit the Janiculum. Upon these conditions Peace between peace was concluded, and Perfena withdrew his forces from the Janiculum; diflodged and deparsed out of the territory of Rome. The Senators bestowed trankly upon Muting as a religionnial of his valiantness, a piece of ground lying beyond Tiber, which was akerwards called Mutia prad, z.s. Mutius his meadows.

o lapon this honourable regard and reward of werene, women were likewise provoked and en-G souraged to enterprize worthy acts in the service of the Common-weal. rest. he made no great account of them : but afterwards, upon further consideration he admired H the enterprise, and plainly said, it surpassed far all the adventures of the Coclines and the Mutis: 10 as he pretended that if the maid were not rendred again, he would take the league as broken, and being yielded, he would fend her back to her friends, undefiled, and without any abuse or violence done unto her. On both parts was promise faithfully kept: For both the Romans restored the pledge of peace according to covenant, and feen also it was, that vertue was not only secured fale. but also highly regarded and honoured with the Tuscan King. For after he had commended and praised the damosel, he promised to give her part of the hostages, chuse whom she would. And when they were all brought forth before her, the made choise (they say) of those young boies that were under 14 years of age: which was not only most besitting her virginity, but also by the accord of 1 the holtages themselves best approved: namely, that that age especially should be delivered our of the enemies hands, which was most subject to injury and taking wrong. The peace thus renewed and confirmed, the Romans rewarded this rare valour in that lex, with as new and strange an honour, for, in remembrance of her, in the top of Via facra, there was erected her statue, | A maiden

There remaineth yet even unto our daies amongst other solemn ceremonies, this one custome received from our ancestors, far differing and disagreeing from this peaceable and friendly departure of the Tuscan King from before the City of Rome, and this it is: In the portsale of goods they use to proclaime first aloud, The fate of King Portena his goods. This ceremoniali custome must needs either begin in time of war, and so was not afterwards forgotten in peace: or else arose from some κ more gratious and gentle occasion at the first, then this title or outward form pretendeth, of selling goods by way of hostility, and after the manner of enemies. But the likeliest conjecture and nearest to the truth of all those that are given out is this: that Porfera dislodging from the Janiele, gave freely unto the Romans, (the City at that time being after long liege distressed and in great freights) his rich Camp furnished with victual and provision, conveyed thither out of the plentifull countries of Herraria near adjoyning which goods, for fear there should have been some havock and spoil made thereof in warlike wife, in case the people had been let loose to the rifling of the tents, were after fold, and called Porlena his goods: which title fignified rather their thankfull acceptation of the gift, and remembrance of the giver, than any open and overt fale of the Kings goods, which were not so much as in the Romans power, nor at their disposition,

Thus Porsena having given over the Roman war, because he would not seem to have brought an host of men into those parts, and performed no exploit, sent his for Aruns with part of his forces to surprize and assault Aricia Ar the first this sudden and unexpected enterprize much troubled the Aricins, but afterward when the had gotten aid both from the Latine nations & alfo from Cumes, they took such heart again, that they durst enter into the field & bid the enemy battel. In the beginning of the conflict, the Tuscans charged them so hotly that at the very first encounter, they brake the arraies of the Aricins But the troups of the Cumans fetting policy against force, went a little afide,made way and gave forme ground, and when the enemies had outstripped them. & were rashly and disorderly passed beyond them, they turned their enfigus, and it upon their backs: 10 were the flucans, being in the very train of their victory, befer round about, and flain in the midft M between fonly a small remnant of whem after the loss of their Captain, because they had no other place of refuge nearer, were fain to trudg to Rome without weapons and difarmed, like suppliants both in deed and shew. Where they were kindly entertained and bestowed in everall lodgings. After this, were P. Lucretius and P. Valerius the third time created Coff. In that year, for a small end, there came Embassadours from Porfena, to treat about the restoring of the Tarquiss into their Realm: to whom this aniwer was returned: that the Senate would fend Embafadors w to the King himself, whereupon there were immediatly addressed unto him in Embafa the most honourable petforages of all the Nobility, who in the name of the people of Rome delivered this speech: That the chief of their Nobles were sent, rather than any dispatch given by Word of mouth unto his Embassadours at Rome; not for that they could not have shapen them Embagadours this short answer. "They would no Kings have: But to this end that for ever after there should be no fuir renewed of that matter, not in fo great mutual benefits, and favours passed between "them, some discontent arise on either side, whiles he might be thought to request that "which was regugnant and prejudiciall to the liberty of Rome, and the Romans again, unless they would be executors of their own wrongs, and feek their own mischievance, to make "denial unto him, whom by their good wils they would not feem to deny ought for any thing in O the world But as to the inbstance in the matter, this was the point : namely, that the people of "Rome were not under the regiment of a King, but were a free state: and fully setled in this pur-" pose To set open their gates to the enemies, sooner than to Kings: and were all generally of this " mind and refolution. That look when the freedom of that City had an end then should the "City come to an end also. To conclude therefore, they were to entreat him that if he tendered

Let them from henceforth feek some other place of exile, either for peace or war, as they shall think more expedient, khat there may be nothing to let and hinder the free cour e of "amity, and alliance between me and you. To these good and kind words he joyned better and more friendly deeds. For all the hostages that remained in his hand he fent home: and the Veienrians lands which by the covenants indented at Janiculum, were taken away, he restored to the B Romans again. Thus Tarquin feeing all hope of return cut off-removed unto Tusculum to his fon in law Mamilius Octavius, there to live and ipend the rest of his daies in banishment, So there continued faithfull peace between the Romans and King Porfena. Then were Cost. M. Valerius and P. Posthumius. In that year the Romans fought with the Sabins fortunately, and the Confuls triumphed. But afterwards the Sabins made greater prepara-

Valerius the fourth time, and T. Lucreirus the second time created Cost. But among the Sabins there grew fome civil differed between that part that would have war, and the contrary that fought peace: which gained the Romans some strength even from thence. was admitted into the number of the Senators, and not long after advanced to be one of the chief men and heads of the City. The Coff, went with a strong power into the Sabins land, where after they had first wasted the Country, and after in battell abated the strength and puissance of the enemy; fo, as for a long time after they needed not to fear any rebellion from thence, they returned D to Rome in triumph. The year following, when Agrippa Menenius and P. Posthumius were Coss. P. Valerius ended hisdaies in great glory, reputed the only fingular man in those times, by all mens judgment, for skill and knowledge as well in martiall feats, as in civill affairs : but fo poor was his estate, that he skill and knowledge as we'r in matitan reats as in a win aman's one for the Cities charge right had not wherewith to defray his funerall expences, and was therefore at the Cities charge right of P.P. attriug. honourably enterred. And the Dames of Rome mourned for him as they did for Brutus. The same year two Colonies of the Latines, Pometia and Cora, revolted to the Auruncans, The

Romans first began to war upon the Autuncans. And after they had discomfitted a great host of them, who met with the Consuls as they entred the borders, and fiercely made head against them, then all the Auruncan war was driven and translated wholly to Pometia. The slaughter and execution E was no less after the conflict, than during the fight: for whereas there were many more of them flain outright in the place than taken prisoners, those also that were prisoners, they spared not, but murdered every where as they went: neither staid the surious rage of war therewith, but even the very hostages whom they had received, to the number of 300, they put to the sword. In this year allo was a triumph at Rome.

The Confuls Opiter Virginius, and Sp. Cassius, that followed the next year, assailed Pometia, first by meer force to scale the wals, after with pavoises, mantelets, platforms, and other fabricks, raised against it. Upon whom the Auruncans sallied forth, rather of a cankred and malicious hatred than for any hope or vantage given them of good exploit the greater part of them furnished better with fire-works than armed with sword and spear, killed and burned all afore them: and having F thus fired their fabricks aforefaid, hurt and flain a great number of their enemies, one of the Confuls also (but his name precisely is not by any author set down) was sore wounded, strucken down from his horse, and well-near slain. Whereupon the Romans returned back to Rome thus unhappily deseated, leaving the Consul behind them amongst many that were hurt, like to dye. Soon after, and no longer than whilest their wounds might be healed, and a new supply of souldiers made, they came against Pometra, in more surious manner than before, and also with a stronger power, And when by making of new mantelets and other warlike instruments of assault, they were proceeded thus forward that the fouldiers were ready to scale and get up the wall, then they within yielded: and notwithstanding the Town was thus furrendred up, yet there was no more mercy shewed unto it, than if it had been forced by affault. The chief and principal Citizens shamefully G lost their heads, the rest of the inhabitants were fold at the spear in open market like slaves. the

together, and made a riot, grew to words, and from words to brawls, infomuch, as they went to- H gether by the ears, and made a fray in manner of a battell: upon which small occasion there was a rebellion like to enfue. Over and besides the sear of the Latines war, (for to encrease their troubles the more Inews came, and it was certainly known, that by the folliciting and practife of Oftavius Mamilius, there were already thirty nations banded together against the Romans. The City thus being perplexed for the event and expectation of their to great occurrents, there arose the first occasion and mention made of creating a Dictator. But neither in what year, nor in what Confuls time (for that it can hardly be beleeved, that they should be of the Tarquins faction, and yet that also is reported) nor yet who was first created Dictator, is it certainly known: Howbeit, in the most ancient writers I find that T. Largius was created the first Dictator, and Cneus Cassius Gene- I rall of the horsemen: and Consular men(i.e. such as had been Consuls afore) they were that elected him: for so the law provided that was enacted, concerning the creation of a Dictator. And this induceth me the rather to beleeve, that Largius an ancient man, and one who had been Confulbefore, was appointed as a Controller and Matter over the Confuls, and not M. Valerius the fon of Marcus, and grandson of Volesus, who as yet had not attained to the Consuls dignity. For if these Consular men aforesaid had been minded to have chosen a Dictator out of that house above all other surely they would have made choice rather of his father M.Valerius, a noble personage, of approved prowels and valour, and one befides that had been Conful. When the Dictator was once cholen at Rome, and the axes were feen born before him, the Commoners flood in great awe, and took better regard to be obedient at every beck and command. For neither could they make ac- K count of any help (as they might under the Confuls, who were both in commission alike, and of equall authority, when they had recourse from the one to the other) nor yet appeal unto the people: no nor look for fuccour at all, but in their own double diligence and care of obedience. The Sabins likewise were afraid of the Dictator thus created at Rome: and so much the more, because they were verily perswaded he was made of purpose for them : and thereupon, they sent Embassadors to treat for peace, who beseeching the Dictator and the Senate to pardon so small a fault, and being but a trick of youth, received this answer: That youth indeed might well be pardoned, but fuch old babes as they might not, who never refled to fow debate, and minister occasion of one war after another. Howbeit, they sate in consultation about a peace, and obtained it had been, if the Sabins could have found in their hearts and condeicended to make good and repay the expences I. that the Romans had disburfed about the war: for that was the thing demanded at their hands, So, defiance was fent and war proclaimed. And yet for that year all was quiet, as it were in time of a secret truce, during the Consulship of Servius Sulpitius, and M. Manlius Tullus, in whose year there was nothing done worthy of remembrance.

After them were T. Ebutius, and C. Vetusius. In their time * Fidene was besieged, * Crustumeria won, and Prenesse revolted from the Latines unto the Romans. And the Latine war, which had been a breeding and budding for certain years, was no longer delaid, but brake forth, A. Posthumins the Dictator and T. Ebuius Generall of the Cavalry, with great power of foot and horie, fet forward and advanced as far as the Lake Regillus in the Territory of Tulculum and there encountred the Army of the enemies in their march. And because they heard say that the Tarquins were M in the host of the Latines, they could not for anger forbear any longer, but presently fell to it, and began battell. This field was fought right fiercely, and coft more bloudshed a good deal, than others ulually before: because the Generals and chief Commanders were there present, not only togivedirection by their counsel and advice, but also in person themselves hazarded their own bodies, and fought bravely in the medley. And not one almost of the principall leaders escaped out of the skirmish, either of one side or of the other, safe and sound, save only the Roman Dictator. For as Posthimius was encouraging his men, and setting them in array in the vanguard, Tarquinius Superbus (albeit he was now very aged and unweildy, and not able to bestir himself) let spurs to his horse, and ran full butt against him. But having caught a thrust from aside, was rescued by his men that came about him, and retired to a place of fafety. And in the other wing, Ebutius Generall of N the horsemen, set upon O. Mamilius: but he, the Captain I mean of the Tusculans, was well ware of him, and espied him coming, and ran his horse with full carreer likewise upon him, and so desperately they bear their Lances one against the other, that Ebutius was run quite through the arm, and Mamilius wounded in the breaft, whom the Latines succoured and received into the middle ward. As for Ebuius not able any longer to bear his staff, with his arm fore hurt, withdrew himself out of the battel. The Leader of the Latines nothing dismaied for all his hurt maintained fight still: and seeing his souldiers somewhat distressed, he sendeth for the Regiment of the Roman exuls, that were under the leading of L. Tarquinius his ion: who sticking more couragiously unto it for anger that their goods were spoiled and they driven out of their own countrey, renewed the combate afresh for awhile. And as the Romans from that quarter began to O recule and give ground, M. Valerius, the brother of Publicala, elpying young Tarquin vaunting himself gloriously in the fore-front of the exuls, inflamed also with a desire of domesticall glory of his house: that the same family which had the praise of expelling the Kings, might likewile win the honour of killing them, spurred his horse, and with deadly speer ran against Tarquinius. who giving way to his mortall enemy, retired back to his own Regiment. But Valerius by this time was disbanded from his company, and rashly ridden into the battell of the exiles,

A and there a common fouldier happed to charge upon him a flank, and run him through. The horse staid not a jot for all the rider was wounded, and so the Roman Knight ready to die, fell to the ground with his armour upon his body, and paid nature her debt. Post humius the Dictator, after he perceived so valiant a man faln, and the banished man advancing lustily forward with full trot, and his own fouldiers diffressed, and ar point to turn their backs, gave express commandement unto his own band, which he had about him of choien tall men for to guard his perion, that as many of their fellows as they saw flie, they should take them for enemies, and kill them in the place. Thus by reason of a counter-sear the Romans made head again and renewed the battell. Then began the Dictators cohort to fight, and coming with fresh bodies and couragious stomacks, charged upon B the wearied exiles, and killed them on every fide, Wherupon began another combate also between the Colonels and Captains of quality and mark. The Generall of the Latines feeing the battalion of the banished well near environed round by the Roman Dictator, speedily taketh with him into the forefront of the battell certain squadrons of those that were appointed in the rear-guard to fuccour and aid: whom T. Herminius, a lieutenant, espied to come marching in good order, and knowing amongst them Mamilius by his gorgeous harness, and goodly coat-armour, with far greater violence than the Generall of the horiemen a little before encountred the Colonell of his enemies so hotly that both he ran Mamilius through his sides, and slue him outright, and also whilest he was disarming and rifling his body, he was wounded himself with a short javelin, and being brought back with victory into the Camp, and at first dreffing yeelded to nature and died. Then C rode the Dictator apace to the horsemen, and earnestly cried unto them, that seeing the footmen were toiled out and wearied, they would alight from their hories, and take the matter into their hands The horsemen soon obeyed, leapt from horseback, and set forward, as if they had flown, to the forefront, where they exposed their targets in defence of them that fought before the enfigns, Whereat presently the Infantry began again to take heart, seeing the principal men of arms, and noble young Gentlemen in the like kind of service, exposed to the same danger, and ready to take part with them. Then at the last were the Latines put back, and their whole battel began to shrink-The Gentlemen had their horses brought to them again, and they mounted on horseback to purfue their enemies. The footmen likewite followed after. There the Dictator omitting no help of God and man, vowed, as men say, a Temple to Castor, and openly promised and proposed rewards D to that fouldier that made either first or second entry into the enemies Camp. Whereupon they bestirred themselves so couragiously, that the Romans at one brunt both vanquished their enemies, and also were possessed of their tents. This was the noble field fought at the Lake Registure, The Dictator and the Generall of horsemen returned into the City with triumph, For three years after there was neither affured peace between them, nor yet professed war.

Consuls were Q. Clalius, and T. Lartius. After them A. Sempronius, and M. Minutius. Whiles these two were Consuls, the Temple to Saturn was dedicated, and the feast called Saturnalia inftituted. After them succeeded A. Post humius, and T. Virginius. And in this year and not before, I find Saturnalia. in ome authors, that the said battell was stricken near the Lake Registus, and that A. Postbumius instituted, suspecting the fidelity of his brother Consul gave over his place, and so was made Dictator. The E account of times doth fo vary and is so intricate and confused, whiles writers diversly set down the chief Magistrates, that in so great antiquity, not of acts only, but also of authors, a mancannot orderly and directly diftinguish, according to some writers, who were Consuls, and what was done

Afterwards were Ap. Claudius, and P. Servilius created Confuls. This year was famous for the news of Tarquin his death. He died at Cumes, to which place after the defeature of the Latines pow- Tarquinius Su er he went to Aristodemus the Tyrant At which tidings the hearts of the Nobles were well light-popus dieth. ned the Commons also began to look up. But the joy in the Nobility was above measure too exceffive and licentious. For why? the great men began now to wrong and wring the communalty, whom untill that day they had favoured and pleasured to their full power. In the same year the F Colony Signia, which King Tarquinius had erected, was now stored again the second time, and the number supplied with new inhabitants. And the tribes or wards at Rome were now made up Wards 21. 21. The temple of Mercury was dedicated in the * Ides of May. With the Nation of the Volicians * 15 of May. in the time of the Latine war neither was there peace nor war : for both the Volscians had levied a power for aid to fend unto the Latines, if the Roman Dictator had not made good speed; and alfo the Roman Dictator hastned the more for fear he should in one battell have to deal with Latines and Vosscians both at once. Upon this quarrell, the Consuls led forth their Legions into the Volicians Country The Volicians fearing no revenge for their defignment (that was intended only, and nevercame in action) were much troubled with this sudden and unlooked for occurrent. Not minding therefore to make refistance, and forgetfull of warlike prowels, they delivered G 300 of their Noblemens children out of Cora and Pomesia for hostages. Whereupon the Roman Legions from thence without any fight were withdrawn. But not long after the Volscians being fomewhateafed and delivered of their fear-came again to their old biace &returned to their wonted nature and lecretly under-hand made preparation anewfor war, joyning with them as confederates in this quarrel the Hernikes. arms, that they could not forbear the very Embassadours, but offer them abuse. They apprehended H therefore the Volicians, conveyed them to Rome, and delivered them to the Confuls : where they revealed and gave intelligence, that the Volscians and Hernicks were out in arms, ready to war upon the Romans, Which being reported unto the Senators, they were so well pleased and contented therewith that they fet at liberty 6000 Latines, pri'oners, and fentthem home. And concerning a league to be concluded with them, which was like before to have been denied for ever, they referred the consultation thereof, unto the new Magistrates that should next enter. And in good footh pleasent & glad were the Latins then for that they had done, and the authors of peace were magnified and had in great reputation. They fend moreover a Crown of gold into the Capitoll, for a present to Jupiter. With these Embassadours and the present, those prisoners which before were I setfree, came in greater number. Who repaired straight waies to every man his house, where they had been prisoners, yielding them great thanks for their kind plage and friendly entertainment in time of their calamities and miferies, and promifed therewith the like countefie and mutuall hospitality. Never were the Latines at any time afore, both publikely and privately, united more

But as the Volcian war was now at hand, fo the City was at discord among themselves. The Senators and Commons hated one another at the heart, and all this arole by occasion especially of certain persons that were indebted, and in danger of their creditors: who muttered and gave ont in murmuring wife, how that abroad they adventured themselves and fought for the liberty oppressed : saying that the freedom of the Commons was more safe intime of war, than of peace. among the enemies rather than their own fellow Citizens, This inward grudge and heart-burning, which of it ielf fill kindled more and more, the notable calamity of one man above all others set on a light fire. A certain aged person chan ed to break prison, and with the arms, badges, and ornaments of all his ancestors, ran into the market place. His apparrell was all to tattered, foule, and loathsome, but the habit or plight of his body much more filthy: so pale, so wan, so lean withall, as if he had been over-pined and starved, his io, gide beard and hair of his head so overgrown, that they made his vitage and countenance wild and gaft.y. Howbeir, for all he was thus disfigured by this deformity, he was a man well known, and as some faid, he had done good fervice in the wars, had been a chie Centurion, and had the charge and leading of bands in the L field: and the common people; as pittying his effate, and to move compassion, recounted many worthy exploits of his, to his great credit and fingular commendation. Himfelf likewise shewed the fears of wounds, which in his breast and fore-part of his body in divers places he had received that might testifie his valiant service. The people slocking about him as it were in a common affembly to hear a folemn Oration, enquired of him, how he came to be in that taking, fo poor to disfigured and deformed? He answered, that whiles he ferved in the Sabine war he by reason of the continual forraging, and watting of the Territory, not only lost the revenews and encrease of his lands, but also his Mannor-house was burnt, all his goods ransacked and spoiled, his cattell driven away: and when a levy and tribute was exacted in a time when he ill might he was driven to take up money and ru in debt; which growing more and more by paiment of in-M terest, first he was constrained to sell his land, that his father and grandfather had left him, and to turn himfelf out of all, by making a clean hand of the rest of his goods: untill at length his body also began to winder way in a consumption. Complaining moreover how by his creditor hewas not only brought into bondage and thraldom, but also impresoned, and whipped, and tormented in most cruell and butcherlike manner. With that he shewed before them all, his back lately scourged, with the fresh wales of the lashes newly given him. At the fight and hearing hereof, there arole a great outcry of the people, so that anon the uprore kept not within the compass of the mar-ket place, but spread over all the City: in such sort, that as well they that were bound, as they that were loofe, came forth from all parts into the open streets calling the Quirite and the people pitifully to help. In no corner wanted any companions to take part willingly in this feditious rout, and N every where in all the fireets they run by companies into the common place. Those Senators who chanced to be abroad, at their no small perill light upon this multitude: and had not the Consult P. Servilius, and App. Candius, made the better speed, and come upon them to appeale the commotion, there would have been some knocks, for hardly could they have held their hands. At whose comming the multitude turned unto them, shewing their irons and all their other shamefull misulage and misery, saying, This is all the good we have gotten for our warfare: upbraiding every man the services they had performed, some in one place, some in another, requiring them in threatning wife, rather than by way of supplication, to call the Senate together, and they the while flood about the Curia, as if they would be judges and moderators of their publike counfell. Very few of the Senators, fuch only as by chance came that way, could be brought to re-O pair to the Confuls: as for the rest, they were afraid not only to come into the Conneill-house, but allo to venture abroad into the market place, to that by reason of their small assembly, there could be nothing done nor determined. Then thought the people indeed they were mocked and dallied withall and driven off with delaies, furmiling, that the Senators which were away, abiented themselves not by chance, nor for fear, but only to hinder the proceeding of their

neerly to the Roman Empire. and dominion of the City, and at home by their own neighbours they were held prisoners and K cause: and that the Consuls themselves did dissemble and shrink, and without all question

A made but a foorn and game at their miferies. This broil so increased, that hardly could the reverence and Majesty of the Consuls restrain the peoples rage. But the Senators standing in doubtfull tearms, whether to tarry behind or to come forward would be more dangerous, at length they resolved to repair into the Senate, and being now at last a full and to fit. ient house gathered, neither the Lords there aftembled, no nor yet the Confuls, could well agree among tthemselves what to do in this cale. Applies a man of a hot spirit, was of opinion to order the matter by Divers opini-Consular authority and commandment, laying, That if one or two of them were laid hold on, the nate house. rest would be quier. But Servilus more inclined to mi d and gentle remedies, thought it a more tafe and easy course too, rather to bend than to break their angry and sell stomacks. But amidst ~

B these troubles there hapned a greater and more tearful occurrence: For certain Latins on horseback rode in post, and brought news in halfy and tumultuous manner, that the Volicians were coming with a mighty and cruel army against the City to affault the same. Which news being heard (see how discord had of one City made twain) wrought far other effect in the Nobles, than in the Commons. The comminalty lept for joy, and faid the gods were now come down from Heaven to be revenged of the Senators pride, and encouraged one another not to take prestmony, or to enter their names in the Mutter-matters book, faying that they had rather dye at once with all, than perish alone and none but they: "Let the Nobles (quoth they) serve as souldiers; " let them take weapon in hand, and abide the brunts and hazards of war, who receive the pro-"fits, the prizes and rewards thereof. But contrary-wife the Senate pensive and surcharged with

C this twofold fear, as well from citizen as enemy, belought the Conful Servilius (a man by nature more affable and popular) That he would provide for the fafety of the Common-weal, belief as it were round with to fearful perils. Then the Conful dismissed the Senate, and came forth into the affembiy of the people, where he shewed what care the LL, of the Senate had for the good of the commons: "But whiles they were (quoth he) buly in consultation for the greatest part "(I confels) of the City, and yet in truth no more but a part, it fell out so in the mean while, "that of necessity they must see to the whole body of the Common-wealth, whereof they stand "in exceeding fear. Seeing therefore the enemies were almost hard at the gates, they could not " possibly do or intend any thing before war. Neither (if there should be any respite and leasure "eranted) were it either for the commons credit and honelty, not to fight for their Country, D "unless they had their pay before hand; nor well beleeming the Nobles and for their reputation, to look unto and take order haltily, to redress the miseries and calamities of their citizens " upon lear, rather than afterwards with good deliberation, for love and of willing mind. This speech of his he confirmed with an edict, by vertue whereof, he gave freight commandment: Imprimes, that no man should keep bound or in priton, any citizen of Rome, but that he might be enrolled before the Confuls. Item, that no perion should hold in possession, or fell the goods of any fouldier, fo long as he abode in the camp, nor arrest his children or childrens children. This edict being once published and proclaimed, not only the enthralled debtors there present, were immediately by name enrolled, but also from all parts of the City, they leapt quickly out of their houses, seeing that now their creditors had no right nor power to detain and arrest them.

E and ran into the market place for to take a military oath of alleagean e, to be true fouldiers and faithful to the State. A number there was of these: neither was there any that more manfully behaved and quit themselves or took more pains in the Volkian war. Then the Consul led forth his power against the enemies, and within a little of them incamped himself. The nightfollowing, the Volkians prefuming upon the variance and discord of the Romans, assailed the tents, if haply in the night leason any of them might have been wrought to abandon the camp and come to them, or to practile any treason. But the Sentinels descried them, and upon allarm given, the whole army arose, and every man made hast to his weapons. Thus came that enterprise of the Volkians to nothing. The rest of the night both parts rested, and were quiet. On the morrow by break of day, the Volkians having filled up the trench, assaulted the bulwarks and rampiers. F And by that time they had on every fide plucked up the fences, pallifadoes, and other fortifications, the Conful, who for all he was called unto instantly on every hand, but of the debtors aforefaid especially above the rest, to give the signal, and to sound the battel, made some stay on purpose to try the courage of his men: and seeing well now their forwardness and their stomacks, at length gave them a token to rush forth, and so letteth them loose, as eager to sight as might be. So at the very first onset the enemies were presently discomfitted and put to flight: the footmen followed hard upon them in chase, and as they could reach, wounded them behind on their backs, and killed them: the horsemen likewise pursued them even to their pavillions, who still feared exceedingly what might become of them: and within a while their very campallo, environed about with the legions, and abandoned of the Volscians themselves for fear, were forced G and rifled. The next day following, the legions marched to Sueffa Pometia, for thither the enemies were fled: and within few dayes the Town was won, and put to the fack, and the spoil and pillage given away: whereby the needy fouldiers were somewhat refreshed. The Consul in great glory and honour brought back his victorious army to Rome. In his way homeward the Ambassadors of the Eretrian Volscians distrutting their own State, upon the losse of Pometia, came unto him. To whom after consultation had with the Senate, and a decree passed, peace was granted: but they were fined to part with their Lands. Immediately upon this, the Sabins also put the

Romans in a fright, and in every deed it might be called a tumult, rather then a war. For word H was brought in the night leafon, that an army of the Sabins were come in a rode, as far as the fiver Anio robbing, spoiling, and burning all the villages and hamlets as they went. Forthwith was sent thither the whole power of hories under the conduct of A.P. fluming, who in the Latin war had been Dictator, After him followed the Contul Serviling with a cholen regiment of footmen, Moft of the enemies as they ranged abroad a forraging in feattering wife, were by the horsemen surprized and inclosed. And when the Infantry bendes marched against the Sabins legion, they were not able to refilt: for being tired our, partly with their long journy, and partly with plundring all night long, and many of them having overcharged themselves with meat and wine within the villages, had hardly frength enough to run away. Thus the Sabin war in one night was heard of and end- I ed. The day following, when as now the Romans were in good hope, that they had peace on every fide, behold the Awuncan Embaffadors came into the Senate proclaming war, unleis they would forgo the Volkian lands, and reftore them to their rightful owners. And even at one time with the Embassadors was the army also of the Auruncans abroad, and had taken the field. The news whereof, and namely, that they were now in fight not far from Aricia, railed up the Romans in so great a broil and hurliburly, that the Senators could neither be consulted with, and deliver their opinions in order, nor yet give a peaceable answer to those that came as it were with weapon in hand, being thus forced to take arms themselves. So to Aricia directly in warlike manner they march, and not far from thence they joined battel with the Auruncans, And in one day that war

Thus when the Roman fouldiers had gotten victory within so few days in fo many places, and had now defeated the Auruncans, they looked for the promile of the Conful, and the faithful performance of it by the Senate. At what time Appins both upon a proud fromack, and arrogant spirit of his own by nature, and also to discredit and disanul the word of his fellow Consul, in all actions of debt proceeded, and gave judgement with rigor against the debtors. Whereupon. both they that had been before imprisoned, were delivered again into their creditors hands and other also became prisoners anew. Whereat when as a souldier, whose case it was thus hardly to be dealt withal, called upon the Conful his fellow for help, they ran all at once to Servilius, at his hands they claimed a promite: every one upbraided and reproached him with their service in war, with their fears there gotten, requiring that he would propose the matter again unto the L Senate, and as a Consul, succour and protect his Citizens; or like a General, maintain his souldiers. These matters no doubt, moved the Conful: but so stood the case that he could neither will nor chuse, but dissemble, deal double, and temporize with them: so sully bent, and wholly wedded to the other part, was not only his colleague, but also the whole faction of the Nobility. Thus by bearing himself as a Neuter, and going as they say, between the bark and the tree, he neither avoided the hatred of the Commons, nor yet wonfavour with the Nobles: whiles the Nobles took him for a foft and base minded Conful, seeking to please all parties, and the Commons for as crafty and false dissembler: infomuch as within a short time it appeared he was as much hated of the people as Appius. For, the Confuls hapned on a time to fixive, whether of them twain should dedicate the Temple of Mircury. The Senate put over the deciding of this matter from M themselves unto the people: and decreed withal, that to whether of them the dedication of the Temple was by the peoples election granted, he should over and besides have the charge to purvey corn and victuals, he should erect and institute a Colledge or fellowship of Merchants, and he in stead of the high Priest, should undertake the solemn feaths or settival days. Then the people gave the dedication of the Temple to M. Lettorius, a principal Centurion of the vanguard: which as it easily appeared, was done not so much to grace the man, as who had an higher office beflowed upon him, then was fit for one of his degree and calling; as to disgrace and deface the Consuls. Hereat. one of the Consuls, yea, and the Patricii stormed and sumed exceedingly against the Commons, But the Commons took heart unto them more and more, and began to proceed far otherwise, and to take another course then they purposed at the beginning: for despairing of N the Consuls and Senats help, when they saw a debtor fined and brought to the bar, they would run flocking from all parts together, so that the Consuls sentence and decree could not be heard for the noise and clamour. And decree or judge what he would, no man would obey. And so violently they went to work, that in presence of the Consul, the creditors were singled out evil entreated, and missiled of the Commons, being many together. So the whole tear and hazzard of the main chance, even of liberty it felfe, was now altogether translated from the debtors to the creditors In the very neck of these troubles, there arose a fear of the Sabin war, and when it was determined, there should be a muster of souldiers, no man would answer to his name and be enrolled, All this while Appius raged and took on, " inveying bitterly against the nicety and popuround, Anthus winne Appear raged and took on, incrying outerly against the meety and popularity of his brother Consul, who with his keeping silence for displeating the people, by his fost O gainst his sel- 'carriage of himself, had betrayed the Weal-publick, and over and besides that, he had not mini-" fired juffice for the loane of money, nor dealt according to law in that behalf, he had brought "the matter foto pass that he could take no musters by vertue of the decree of the Senate How-"beit (faith he) the Common-wealth is not wholly forfaken and forforne, nor yet the Confular "authority utrerly cast down and trodden under foot for he would himself alone, if there were "no more but he, defend and maintain both his own place and the Senators dignity. When as the

A multitude therefore flood thus malapertly, as their daily manner was about the bar he commanded one principal Captain of fedition to be attached and had away; and as he was haled to prilon by the Sergeants and Lictors he appealed, Neither would the Conful have given place to the appeal (for all he knew the people how they were bent, and what their doom would be) had not his obfinate diffness with much ado been overtwayed more through the diffret advitess authority of the chief nobles & Lords of the Senate, than by the clamorous noise & menaces of the multitude: so resolute was he, and his heart so couragious, to undergo their ill will and heavy displeasure. Thus grew the mitchief more & more daily, tellified not with open mouth & broad speeches only but also (which was more pernicious and dangerous) by conventicles, secret meetings, and conseren-B ces. At length these Cost, so odious unto the Commons, went out of their office, to wit, Appin, a man wonderous well affected of the Nobles, Servilius liked neither of them nor the Commons. After whom A Virginius, and 7 Verusius entred their Consulship, But then the Commons not knowing what manner of Confuls they should have began to assemble together by night some in Elanilia, others in the Aventines to the end they might not be unprovided and to leek upon a juddain, whatto do in the common place, nor manage their bufiness hand over head, and at a venture. Which the Confuls supposing (as it was indeed) a perilous example, and of ill consequence, propounded the matter before the Senators: but when they had proposed it, they could not orderly ask their advise what was to be done they took fo on, and kept such outcry and clamour at it, on all hands fretting and fuming, that the Coniuls should lay upon the Senate the burden and heavy C load of that, which properly they by vertue of their authority and office should execute and perform themselves: and surely, if there were any Magistrates in the City(say they) there would not be thus suffered in Rome any other counsel but publick whereas now the State is divided into a thoufand Courts and conventicles: whiles some have their meetings and assemblies in Esquilie, others in Aventine: Assuredly one only man indeed (for that is more than a Consul) such a one as Appins Claudius was, would foon dispatch, and in one minute of an hour scatter these their unlawful affemblies. The Confuls upon this rebuke and check, replyed again and demanded in this manner: And what would you have us to do (quoth they) for we are resolved to do nothing slackly and coldly but with as great courage and diligence as shall be well liked of the Senators, Whereupon an order passed, that they should take muster, and levy souldiers with all rigour and severity; adding n moreover, that the Commons with idleness and ease were grown over-malapert and too licentious. And when the Senate was difmissed, the Consuls went into the Tribunal & took their places. and tummoned by name all the *youngerfort to appear: and none making answer to his name, the *From 17 multitude standing about as it had been to hear some publick Oration, said plainly, that the Com- years of age to mons from thenceforth would be no longer deluded, and that the Confuls should never get so 47. much as one fouldier, unless they would stand to their word, and make good the promise that publickly before was made, and restore to every man again his liberty, before they caused them to take weapon in hand: to the end, they might fight for their country and country-men, and not for their Lordlike Malters. The Confuls faw well what they had in commission from the Senate & that of all those who within the Councel house walls spake so stoutly & gave out so great words, there F was not one present to take part of this odious malice of the people. And like they were to have a bitter fit and cruel broil with the Commons. They thought good therefore ere they tried the worst, and dealt by extremity, once again to ask advise of the Senate, and to confer with them, But then all the younger fort of the Senators, approached by multitudes, hard almost to the Confuls feats, willing them to give over their Consulfhip, and to refign up their rule and authority, to the maintenance whereof they lacked courage. Now when the Confuls had sufficiently weighed and maintenance whereorthey acked courage. Now when the common on is toward, a fed ion be, tried both wayes, thus at length began they and faid. A great fedicion and common on is toward. A fed ion be, my LL. To the end therefore that we pretend not ignorance, and fay another day ye were not foretweenthe Contold of it, there is a great fedition and commotion toward. We require therefore that they who fuls and the find greatest fault with our remisseness and lack of courage, assist us and sit with us while we take people. F the musters : and since you will needs have it so, we will execute it according to their minds, that are most earnest and severest. Then come they back again unto the Tribunal, and commanded on fet purpose, one of them that were there in fight to be cited and called by name. But he flood still and held his peace, with a company of men gathered round about to guard him, for fear he should have some harm or violence done unto him. The Consul then sent a Sergeant to attach him, who being repulled off, then those Nobles which fate there on the bench to affift the Confuls, cried out upon the shameful indignity, and said it was intollerable, and so ran down in hast from the Tribunal leat, for to aid the Sergeant. But the violent rage of the multitude, who let the Lictor alone, and only stayed him from laying hold on the man, turned upon the Patritians. So that the Cost, were fain to step between and then the fray was appealed. In which, there being G no stones slying about their ears, nor weapon drawn, there was more clamor, brawling and chafing than any hurt done. Then was the Senate house called in a great hurry : and with more confusion fat they there in Councel: whiles they that pretended how they were beaten and missied, required that commissioners should sit upon this riot and make due inquisition: and the stoutest

ed upon reason. At last, when the tempest was overblown and their heat allayed, and that the Coss, hit them in the teeth, and reproved them, saying there was a little discretion and gravity in their Court and Councel-house, as in the common Hall, they began in the end to consult orderly H and three opinions there were amongst them, P. Virginius would not have it a common and general case (to wit, that all debtors should be released from their creditors) but his advise was, that they should only be considered, who relying upon P. Servilius the Consul his word and faithful promite, had ierved in the wars of the Volkians, Auruneans and Sabins. T. Largius, he supposed and thought this, that it was not a time then to make amends only for good deferts, and to respect them alone that had done well, and to recompence good fervice: but for as much as the whole commonalty was deeply engaged and plunged in debt, unleis they were all provided for and good order taken for them every one, there would be no quietness nor end of troubles: yea, and (that which more is) in case they be not all alike regarded, but some debtors in better condition than I others, the discord would rather be more kindled than quenched. Appius Claudius a man both of natural disposition sierce and cruel, and also by occasion made more outragious, netled with the Commons hatred against him on the one side, and tickled with the praise and confinendations of the Nobles on the other fide, who ever magnified him and lift him up to the skie, spake to this effect: "There io great flirs and mutinous hurliburlies, my Masters (quoth he) is not long of the "milery and calamity, but only of too much liberty of the Commons: who rather upon fatness "are grown wanton and unruly, than for any want uppatient and discontent : and all this mischief "no doubt is fpring of this, that they have liberty to appeal. For folong as it is in their power to "flie for help unto those that have erred as well as they, well may the Consul threaten and give " out menacing words: as for any rule else or command they shall have none among them. Come K on therefore, let us create a Dictator from whom they cannot make their appeal. Then shall "this furious rage, which now fetteth all on a light fire, be foon husht and quite extinguished. Let "me see then, who dare beat a Lictor, when he shall well know, that he alone whose honor "and Ma jefty he shall offend and abuse, hath power to scourge him and take away his life. Many men thought this sentence of Appius to be very hard and cruel; yea, and dangerous withal, in regard of the late precedent of Virginius and Vetusius. That other likewise of Largius was thought inconvenient, in taking away all keeping of credit with the creditors. The opinion and advise of Virginius was supposed as well in one respect as in another most indifferent and mean between both. But by reason of the saction and regard of private benefit, which alwayes hath done hurt and ever will, to publick Counfel, Appins prevailed, and he miffed very little but he himself had I been made Dictator. Which if it had come to pais, it would firely have estranged and alienated quite the hearts of the Commons, in that most busy and dangerous time: when it happened that the Volicians, Æquians, and Sabins, were all up at once in arms. But the Confuls and elder Senators, had great care and copfideration to chufe fuch a one, as might by mildness of his own nature allay and qualify the exceeding rigour and sternness incident to Soveraign and absolute authority. They elect therefore to be Dictator, Marcus Valerius the ion of Volesus. The Commons albeit they saw well enough this Dictator created for to curbe them, yet having got by his brothers law, the benefit of Appeal, they feared no severe and insolent proceeding from that house and name. The Edict besides, that the Dictator set sorth, which was welneer all one with that other of the Conful Servilius, much confirmed and setled their minds. For supposing now, they M had more hold both of the man, and also of his authority, and that they might with more confidence rely themselves on the one and the other, they gave over all debate, and entred their names into the muster book: so there were enrolled full ten legions. The like army for number was neverlevied afore. Of which legions, the Confuls had the conduct of three a piece, and the Dictator commanded the other four: and high time, it was: for the war might not be deferred and longer. The Æquians had already invaded the territory of the Latins, and their Embaffadors were petitioners to the Senate, either to fend fuccour, or to give them leave to put on armor themselves for the desence of their confines, and frontiers. It was thought the safer and surer way, that the Latins without arming themselves should be defended, than to permit them again to take weapon in hand. So the Conful Vatufius was fent thither, and he stayed them from fur-N ther foraging and wasting. For the Equians were departed out of the plains, and trusting rather in the vantage of the ground, than in their weapons, flood upon their guard, kept themselves safe from danger, upon the high tops of the Hills and Mountains.

The other Consul who was gone against the Volscians, because he would not also lose any time, drew the enemy forth (by wasting the country especially) to encamp himself neeret, and io at length to fight a field. Now was there a plain in the mids between both camps: where each army stood before their rampiers, embattelled, and ranged in array, with banners displayed ready to fight. The Volkians were somewhat more in number, whereupon they began battail disorderedly and as if they fet light by the enemy. But the Roman Conful neither advanced forward, nor fuffered his men once to (hour and answer again, but charged them to fland fill with their jave-O lins fast in the ground, until the enemies were come within the reach of hand fight, and then to lay about them luftily with their fwords, all that ever they could. The Volicians out of breath with running and shouting, charged the Romans, who seemed for sear to stand associated but after they once perceived that they were horly reencountred by them again, and faw their fwords glittering in their eyes, they were troubled therewith, as if they had been entrapped and fallen into some trains layed for them, and so turned their backs. And by reasonthey came running before

A to battail, their strength would not hold out now to run clear away: The Romans contrarywife, because against the beginning of the fight they had stood quiet, were fresh of body, and soon overtook them thus overtoiled, won their camp by force, and after they had driven the enemies out from thence, chased them into * Velitre, and entred the Town pelmell one with another in a * Britists. medley the Victor together with them that were vanquished. More bloudshed there was by execution of them one with another, of all ages and fexes, as they came in their way than in the very battail. A very few, even such as without weapon yeelded themselves, were spared and pardoned. Whiles these things were a doing amongst the Volscians, the Dictator discomfited and put to flight the Sabins, with whom he had much cruel war: yea, and forced them to abandon and R quit their camp. For having fent his horsemen into the main battail of the enemies, which they had but flightly strengthened within, and bestowed the ranks there very thin, and all to stretch out the wings on both fides more at large, he brake their arraies: and when they were once difordered, the footmen came in upon them: and in the tame brunt were they Masters of their camp, and so the war ended. There was not in those dayes a braver battail fought and more renowned, fetting afide that only at the lake Regillus. The Dictator rode in triumph unto the City. Over and above the accultomed honors, both he and his posterity after him, were allowed a certain place in the great Race or Theater, called Circus, for to behold at ease the solemn games, and there was fet the Ivory chair of effate, called Sella curulis. The Volicians thus vanquished, lost the territory about Velitre, and new inhabitants were sent thither from the City to C people and to till the grounds, fo that it became a Colony.

Somewhat after this, there was a field fought with the Equians, but in truth, full against the Conful his will, for that they were to climb up a fleep Hill (to their diadvantage) for to meer with the enemy. But the Souldiers blaming him for trifling out, and making delayes, to the end that the Dictator might be out of Office before they made return to the City, and so his word and promise, like the Consuls before him, should come to nothing; drave him perforce to lead up his army, rashly and at adventure against the Hills. This being an enterprise ill ordered, and an error elcaped, fell out not withflanding very well through the cowardile of the enemy: who before they were come within thot and the darts cast, amazed at the venturonsness of the Romans, for look their holds which they had in most defensible places, and leapt down into the valleys over against them. There was booty & pillage good enough, and a bloudless victory. Having sped thus fortunately abroad in three several wars, the Senators and Commons were not careless of home-affairs, what would be the iffue thereof. The Bankers and Uturers, what with favor, and what with fubtil and cautelous policy, had devifed aforehand and wrought such means, as might frustrate and disappoint not only the Commons, but also the Dictator, and put them by their expectation. For Valerius, after the return of Vetufius the Conful, dealt first and above all other matters and causes at the Councel table, in the behalf of the people that had The speech of atchieved such victories, and propounded to know their minds, What should be done with those District in endebted, endangered, and imprisoned persons. "Which motion of his being disliked and re- the Senate, " jected: I see well (quoth he) that I cannot please you, so long as I perswade to concord and

E unity: with ye will (trust me truly) e're it be long, that the commonalty of Rome had more Patrons and Advocates like myself. As for me, I will neither bear my citizens any longer in "hand to deceive them, nor be a Dictator in vain, to effect nothing, Civil dictord at home, and forrain war abroad, caused the State to have need of this office. Now, when peace is gotten without, behold it is croffed and hindered within: yet had I rather be present at the fight of a et mutiny and insurrection when I am a private person, than whiles I am a Dictator. Thus went he out of the Councel-house, and yeelded up his Dicatorship withal. The Commons saw plainly what the matter was, and how upon a discontenument and grief that he took in their behalf, for very pitty and compassion of them; he gave over the place; and therefore, as if he had fully discharged himself of his faithful word to them given; (for that there was no default in him, but it F had been performed indeed) they accompanied him along home to his house with hearty affection, praifing and commending him all the way they went. The Lords of the Senate began then to fear, left if the army were broken up and discharged, there would be some secret conventicles, and new conspiracies contrived : therefore, albeit the musters were taken by the Dictator: yet because the fouldiers had fworn alleageance to the Confuk, supposing they were still bound to warfare by werene of that outh, and pretending a colour that the Equians renued war, they commanded the legions to be led forth of the City.

This haftened the fedition the fooner and fet it forward. At first, as men faid, they complotted and laid their heads together about murdering and making away the Confuls, to the end they might be acquit of their oath unto them : but afterwards being better schooled and advised that G no mans conference can be cleared of feruple; and discharged of an oath once taken, by committing a finful act and working mischief; they withdrew themselves out of the way by the perswasion of one Sicinius, and without conge of the Confuls, departed as far as Mount Sacer, on the farther fide of the River Anio, three miles from the City. This is the more common report, and goeth The first remore current, than that whereof Pifo is the Author (namely, that the commons retited themfelves to Aventine.) There, without any head or Captain, they encamped and fortified them. Rome into harm; as having caried with them such things only as were necessary for the suffenance of their H life. Great fear there was in the City, and in this mutual and reciprocal fear, all men were perplexed and to feek what to do. The Commons forlorn of their fellow Commoners doubted the violence of the Senators: the Senators again flood in fear and jealousie of the Commons that remained ftill behind; and were in suspense whether it were better they abode ftill among them, or followed after their fellows. For how long trow ye, will a multitude once disbanded i reft in quiet? Again, in case any forrain war should arise in the mean time, what might ensue thereupon in the end? In conclusion, there was no hope behind to be looked for, but in the concord of citizens: and therefore the commons one way or other, either by reasonable conditions or unreafonable, were to be reconciled again and reduced into the City, there was no remedy. So it was I thought good and agreed upon, that one Menenius Agrippa (a lair spoken and eloquent man gracious withal and well-beloved among the commons, for that he was from them descended) should be sent as an Orator to treat with them. Who being received into the camp, after that, old and harsh kind of eloquence in those dayes, spake as men faith to this effect, and told this tale and parable: "Upon a time (quoth he) when as in mans body, all the parts thereof agreed not, as now his Oration to they do in one, but each member had a feveral intent and meaning; yea, and a speech by it felf: the Commons. "they do in one out each member had a leveral member and meaning, year and a several member of the Commons." for it befel, that all other parts befides the belly thought much and repined that by their careful-"nels, labor, and ministery, all was gotten, and yet, all little enough to lerve it: and the belly it self " lying fill in the mids of them, did nothing elfe but enjoy the delight some pleasures brought un-"to her. Whereupon they mutined and conspired altogether in this wise, That neither the hands K "Thould reach and convey food into the mouth, nor the mouth receive it as it came, nor yet the "teeth grind and thew the same. In this mood and sit, whiles they were minded to samish the « poor belly, behold the other limbs, yea, and the .whole body befides, pined, wasted, & fell into an extreme confumption. Then was it well feen, that even the very belly also didgo fmallservice, but "ted the other parts as it received food it felf: feeing that by working and concoching the meat. es throughly, it digesteth and distributeth by the veins into all parts, that iresh and perfect blood "whereby we live, we like, and have our full strength. Comparing herewith, and making his application to wit, how like this intestine and inward sedition of the body, was to the sell stomack of the commons, which they had taken and bornagainst the senators, he turned quite the peoples hearts. Then began some treaty of unity and concord; and among other articles it was conditioned 1. and granted schat the Commonalty should have certain sacred and inviolable Magistrates of their

During this indurrection and revolt of the commons, of Coffine and Post humins Cominius entered their Confellhips. In whose time a league was made with the people of Latinm. For the estabishing whereof, one of the Confuls stayed behind at Rome: the other was sent unto the Wol- M scian war, who discomfreed and put to flight the Volscians of Aminm, chasing and driving them sage the Town Longula, which he won. cers unto them. Of whom Sicinius, the Author of the ledition or infurrection was one, who were

There was in camp then among the flowne of gallant youths, one Caius Martins, a Noble yong Gentleman, right politick of advise, active besides, and tall of his hands, who afterwards was farnamed Coriolanus. Whiles the Roman armylay at fitge before Corioli, and were armized was intimuted corresponding which whom they kept faft thus py, and feared no prefent danger at all from any fortain war without; behold, all on a inddain, the Volkian legions that came from Amium, affailed them: at which very inftane the enemy also fallied out of the Town. Which Martins feeing, who by good hap quartered and warded there, with a lufty band of elect men inot N only repressed and stopped the violence of those that issued and brake upon him; but also whiles the gate (tood open, fiercely sushed in himself: and having made a foul fleughter of people thereby, at his first entrance into the City, and caught up fire at 4 venture flung it upon the houses that frood upon and about the walls. ...Whereupon arose a great ourcay of the solk within the Towe, together with lamentable weeping and wailing of women and children, as commonly is feen in fuch a fright. Thus were the Volicians of Antiana defeated, and the Town Carieli won. And Martins through his graite, so much obscured and stopped the light of the Consul his same, that had it not been ingraven in braffe for a remembrance and monument, That there was a league with the Latines, and O therame made by Sp. Cassius alone (for that his companion was absent) there had been no record at all, but forgotten quite it had been, that ever Sp. Cominius Warred with the Volicians,

The same year died Memericas Aerippa, a man all his life time before beloved indifferently of the Senators and the Commons: but after the infurrection, much more dear unto the Comgraps, and his mons than before. This truce maker, this mediator for civil attonement, this Embassador and Messenger from the Senators to the Commons, this reconciler and reducer of the Commons miry far more grievous entred the City. First, a dearth of corn, and all manner of victuals, by region that the grounds upon the departure of the Commons were neglected and untilled, Hereapon insued samine, even such as usually is incident to men beseged. And verity the houshold of bondiervants, yea, and the commons too, had utterly perished for hunger if the Consulsinad not R in time made the better provision: by tending purveiours all abroad to buy up corn, not only into Hetruria, by coasting along the river on the right hand from Hostia, and on the left hand by Sea, (paffing through the Volfcians Country) even as far as Cumes: but also into Sicily, there to lay for grain. Such was the hatred of the borderers, that Rome was enforced to have need of fluctor and relief from afar. Now when they had bought certain corn at Cumer, it was no fooner embacked, but the ships were stayed and arrested there, by Aristodemus the tyrant, for the goods of the Tarquins; whole heir in remainder he was. In the Volician Country and Pomptinum, they could buy none formony. There, the very Porveiors themselves were in danger of violence, by the men of the Country. Out of To fasse there came cornup the Tyber, wherewith the Commons were suffained and refreshed. And considering the streights they were in for want of it. C challs, they had been fore diffressed and vexed with wars besides, and that in a very ill time, and unseasonable for them: but that the Volicians, who now were in readiness, and upon the point to make war; had a petitlence that raigned hot among them. Which heavy crois and affliction, the enemies were fo discouraged with, that when the plague began to stay, even then they contipued still afraid:

cost to inter and bury him worthipfully.

The Romans both at Velitre augmented the number of the inhabitants and also at Norba, sending a new Colony into the Mountains, to be a Fortress and strength for all the territory of Pomptinum: Moreover, when M. Minutius, & A. Sempronius were Confuls, great store of corn was brought out of Sietly and in was debated in the Senat-house, at what price the Commons should be served therewith. Many thought the time was now come to wring the Commons, and keep n them under, and to recover again those royalties, which by their departure were forcibly wroked and dimembred from the nobility. But above all others Martin Coriolina, an utter and car contamuenpital enemy to the Tribuns power and authority, "If they will (quoth he) have their corn and "vi-tuals at the old price, letthem reftore unto the Senators their ancient right and prehemi - the Tribuna. affaved to flop and overthrow the fuit commenced; namely, by fetting their followers and re- H tainers in fundry places to deal with the Commons severally one by one & what they could to affright them from meetings and affemblies together. Afterwards, they came all forth at once into the Forum or common place. A man that had feen them would have faid they had been the parties themselves in trouble and accused, ready to hold up their hand at the bar: such praying, such a befeeching they made of the Commons, in the behalf of this one citizen, this only Senator; that if they would not in their love acquit him for their fakes, as innocent and unguilty, yet they would give him unto them as an offender and faulty person. In conclusion, when his day came, he made default and appeared not, yet continued they still in their angry mood against him. And being condemned in his ab'ence, for contumacy, departed into banishment to the Volscians, I menacing his own country as he went, and carrying even then with him the revenging from ack of an enemy

The Volcians at his coming received him courteoutly, and friendly intreated him every day more than other, as they perceived his anger more and more toward his country-men, by many complaints he made of them, and threats withal that he oftentimes gave out against them in their hearing. He made his abode and so journed in the house of Accius Tullius, who at that tiffe was a mighty great man among the Volicians, and one that ever bare mortal malice unto the Romans. And whilesthe one of them was provoked with an old cankred grudge, and the other fer on and pricked forward upon a fresh quarrel and occasion of anger, they both laid their heads together and complotted to make war upon the Romans. This only thing flood in their way to K cross their designs: They thought verily their Commons would hardly or scarcely at all be brought, to rife and take arms again, which they had fo often unhappily attempted: And befides, their courages were well cooled, and their flomacks abated by the lols of their youth in many and fundry wars often times afore, and now at last, by the late pestilence and mortality. They were therefore to go cunningly to work; that for afmuch as the o.d hatred against the Romans was grown out and worn away, their hearts upon some new anger might be chafed and galled again. There were by chance at that time in Rome, the great Games and Playes in hand, to be fet out anew the second time, the occasion whereof was this: A certain housholder one morning betimes before the shews and games began, had beaten with rods a poor slave of his under the fork which hecarried on his shoulders, and driven him along through the mids of the Circus or Thes- L tre: and with that began the playes, as if there had been no matter therein of scruple or Religi-But not long after, one T. Latinius a mean Commoner had a dream or visions. In which he thought that Jupiter complained and faid, that the Dancer beforethe playes pleased him never a whit: and unless those games were newly exhibited again, and that very stately and sumptuously, fome great danger should befall the City: willing him with al, to make relation bereof unto the Confuls, The man albeit in truth he was not without some sense and seeling of Religion and the fear of God: vet made he no fuch great scruple at the matter, but that the reverence he had of the Majefty and countenance of the Magistrates surmounted and dashed it clean: for fear lest haply he should become a talking stock in mens mouths, and be mocked for his labour. But this delay and fleeping of the matter, he bought full dear. Por within few dayes his fon hapned to dye, M And because he should be out of doubt what was the cause of this his losse and juddain misfortune, whiles he was troubled in spirit, with anguish and forrow, behold, the same vision appeared to him again in his fleep, and feemed to ask him whether he had not yet sufficiently paid for this disobedience and contempt of God? threatning moreover, that in sale he made no greater half to certify the Confule thereof, there was a greater judgment and plaguestoward, and that very neer. Now was the thing more evident than before, and past all peradventure. Howbeit he neglected and drave it off fill, until he was himfelf overtaken with a grievous disease, and brought to great weakness in all his joints. Then verily the wrath of the Gods taught him to be wifer, And being overwearied with harms path, and in lear of more prefently to guine; he con-ferred with his kinsfolk and friend; to be advised by them. When he had declared unto them hi what he had seen and heard; namely, how Jupiter had so often appeared unto him to his sleeps and that the fearful displeasure and threamings of the heavenly Gods were showed plainly by fundry mischances fallen upon him: by the full consent of all them that were about him, he was brought in a litter to the Confuls 3; into the Farum or common place; from whence by the Confuls commandment he was carried into the Councelhouse. Where, when he had made report unto the Senators of the self-same things, to the exceeding wonder and admiration of them allfee another strange miracle: He that was brought into the Senate house a lame creeple of all his lims, after he had once delivered his errand, returned home to his house (as it is recorded) sound upon his feet. Hereupon the Senate decreed, That the Games should be fet out as magnificently as could be devised.

To these solemnicies resorted , by the motion and perswasion of Accius Tullius, a great number of Volicians. But before they were begun, Tailbas according to the complot between him and Martins at home, made a Repor errand unto the Confols at Rome; faying, that he would willingly commune and treat with them apart, of important affairs concerning the State. When to the Roman the room was clear, and every man gone, he began in this wife: 5- Loth I am (quoth he) if other "wife I could chuse, to speak ought but well of my country-men and fellow citizens. Yet come I

A " not to complain of any action of theirs already passed, but to give a caveat, and provide that "nothing be practifed hereafter. As for me, I am minded prefently to go from hence home, "left I being here seen, might be thought in some word or deed accessary unto them, and so cul-" pable. Having made this speech he departed. When the Consuls had declared in the Senate this thing fo doubtful, and yet proceeding from the mouth of fo fure and certain an Author: behold, the credit of the man (as commonly it is feen) rather than the likelihood of the matter. caused them to be wery and circumspect, yea, although there was no such need or cause at all. Whereupon the Senate made an Act, that the Volicians should be jogging out of the City. And divers cryers or Bedles were fent out fundry wayes, to command them to avoid and be packing before night. At the first, the Volicians were only much affrighted, and ran every man to and iro into C his Inne to fetch away his things. But afterwards in the way homeward, they began to think more and more of it, and to grow metancholy: thinking it a great indignity, that like polluted and profaned persons, they should be driven from the Games, on festival holydayes, discarded (as a man would fay) and excommunicate out of the company both of God and man. Thus as they went along all on a row, as it were in one continued and joynt train, Tullius (who was gone afore as far as the Ferentine head) received the formost and chief of them, as every one came, and entertained them with complaints and words of indignation, and drew both them who willingly gave ear to his words so fitly framed and tending to stir more coles, and also by their means the rest of the multitude into a plain field, lying hard under the high way side. Unto whom, assembled together as it were to hear a fermon, he thus began to speak: "Admit (quoth he) you could for-D "get the old wrongs and abuses offered you by the people of Rome, the losses and overthrows of to his Coun-"the Volician Nation; yea, and all the other quarrels whattoever; how can ye put up this dayes try men. " fpightful reproach and dishonor received at their hands? who to our great disgrace and shame "have begun their solemn Games? Perceived you not how they have triumphed over you to day? " how as ye departed ye were a spectacle and pageant to all men, citizens and firangers, and to so "many neighbour nations adjoyning how your wives and children were brought as it were in a " shew to make them sport and to laugh at? what conceit was in their heads (think ye) that heard "the voyce of the Bedle? what thought they that beheld you as you diflodged? what imagined "they that happened to meet this ignominious troup as they marched? Even this & no other, that "there was some wicked sin among us, not to be named, whereby we should as male afters, have E "stayned and polluted their games if we had been present at the fight of them, & have committed " fome haynous act, that would require by some satisfaction of sacrifice to be purged? and for that " cautewere driven from having any convertation, fellowship, and society of good and godly men? "Over and besides how can you choic but think of this, That we enjoy our lives still, only be-"cause we hastned our remove, sist this may be called a remove, and not rather a plaintaking of a "flight and running away.) And yet you reckon this no enemy City, where, if ye had stayed but "one day longer you had dyed for it every one. Defiance is given already, and war denounced a-"gainst you; but if ye be men indeed of courage, to their great cost and mischief that have de-"nounced it. Thus being of themselves kindled enough with indignation, and by these words enflamed and fer on fire, they went every man his way from thence home: and so effectually sollicited F each one the people where he dwelt that in fine the whole nation of the Volicians revolted and rebelled. To manage this war, were chosen General commanders by one consent of all the Cities, Accius Iulius. and Cn. Martius the banished Roman: in whom of the twain they reposed greater hope and this their hope failed them not. So as it soon appeared that the puissance of the state of Rome consisted more in the dexterity of good Captains, than in strong armies of touldiers. For first he went to * Circuin, from whence he expelled the Roman Coloners, and delivered the City * Monte Circleer and free unto the Volicians. Then by crois wayes he passed into the Latin street, called Via cello, Latina: and regained from the Romans, these their Towns newly gotten afore, Satricum, Longu-Las not regarded non the Administration again, and to forward he forced * Corbin, * Civita inde-

Vitelia, Trebia Labicos, and Pedum. And last of all from Pedum, he marched on toward the City vina vique.

discord might arise, between the Commonalty and the Senators: which doubtless had soon covidence be-grown fo mightily had the Tribuns already by their complaints and acculations, provoked fiegeth Roman

G of Rome, and at Clubia Foffa, five miles off, he encamped and forraged the territory about, fending with the forragers certain guides, to keep them from ipoyling and doing harm in the Noblemens Lands, were it that he were more pightful to the Commons, or that thereby some the Commons forward (who of them'elves were shrewd enough) against the heads and Magistrates of the City, but that the fear of forrain dangers, the greatest bond of civil concord that can be, held them in and knit their hearts together, were they never to jealous, suspected, H and hateful afore one to the other. Herein only was all their difference, that the Senate and Consuls reposed hope in nothing else save only in war: the Commons on the other side were defirous of any thing whatloever, but war,

Now were S. Namius, and Sex. Furius Confuls: who as they were furveying and mustering the legions, and disposing of a good Corpus de guard upon the walls, and other places wherein they thought it expedient to keep a standing watch and ward: behold a mighty number called and cryed hard for peace, and with their sedicious clamors, put them in exceeding sear: yea, and afterwards forced them to affemble the Senate-house together, and to propose concerning the sending of certain Embassadors to Cn. Martius. The Lords of the Senate seeing evidently the commons I hearts to fail them, accepted and granted the motion propounded. Whereupon were Oratours fent unto Martius to treat for peace. At whose hands they received this heavy and stout answer: "If so be the Volscians had their Lands restored to them again, then there might be some parle "and treaty of peace: but if they will needs at their pleasure still enjoy that booty which by war "they have gotten, then would be in remembrance of private wrongs done unto him by his " country-men, as also of the friendship and courtely shewed him by strangers that had given him ce entertainment, do his best to make it known unto the World, that his courage and stomack is " incensed, and not abated and quailed by his banishment. Then were the same Embassadors sent again the second time, but they might not be admitted once to set foot within the camp. It is reported moreover that the very Priests in their Pontificalibus, in their rich vestiments and goodly K ornaments, went with supplication to the tents of the enemies, and turned his heart no more than the Embassadors had done before them. Then the dames of the City came slocking all about Veturis the Mother, and Volumnia the wife of Coriolanus. Whether this proceeded from any publick Counsel and was done in Policy, or came only of womens fear, I find but little in any records. But how loever it came about, this one thing is certain, they perswaded so effectually with them, that both Veturia an aged woman, and also Volumnia with her two little sons that she had by Martius, went toward the enemies camp, to fee if women by their prayers and tears, might fave the City, which men with spear and shield could not defend. When they were come into the camp, and word brought to Coriolanus, that there was an exceeding great train of women thither arrived: at the fift, he, as one that had relented, neither for that publick Majefty in the Embaffa- L dors, nor yet at the religious reverence, which he both conceived in mind, and law with his eyes The speech of in the clergy, stood much more stilly bent against the tears of sifty women. But afterwards one of his familiar friends, who had feen and known Veturia there, mourning and bewailing exceedingly above the rest, as she stood betwist her daughter in law and her little Nephews: "If mine eyes "be matches (quoth he) and deceive me not, here is your mother, your wife, and children, Where-

"at, Coriolanus, tuming like a man well near beside himself, arose from his seat, and ran to meet "his mother, and to embrace her. But the woman falling in stead of prayers into a fit of choler: "Let me know (quoth she) before I suffer thee to embrace me, whether I am come to an enemy " or to a son, whether I be in thy camp as a captive prisoner, or as a natural mother. And have I "lived indeed so long, and rubbed on still in this miserable old age of mine for this, to see thee first M "a banished man and after that to become an enemy? Couldst thou find in thine heart to waste " and spoil that countrey which bred thee, which fostered thee, and brought thee up? And be "it that thou hither marched with a cruel intent and full of threats, would not thine anger and "fell wrath flake, when thou didft fet foot within the borders and marches thereof? And being " come within the fight of Rome, arose not this in thy mind and thought, Within those walls " vonder is my house, there are my house-gods, my mother, my wife, my children? Why then, " belike if had never been a mother, and born a child, Rome had not been affaulted. And if I had 66 no fon at all, I might have died well enough in my native countrey, whiles it remained free. But "as for me, neither can I suffer ought, more for thy dishonesty and shame; nor more ro mine " own calamity and milery than this: and most wretched caitife though I be, yet long time so I N " cannot continue. But for these here, look thou well to it, I advise thee, and have pitty of them, "who if thou go on as thou beginnest, are like to feel untimely death, or endure long captivity. Then his wife and children hung about him, and clipped him: whereat the women fell a weeping on all sides, bewailing their own case and the state of their countrey. So as at length the man was overcome. And after he had taken them in his arms likewife, he let them go: and himfelf dislodged and removed his camp backward from the City. When he had withdrawn the legions out of the territory of Rome, he gat himself, men said, such hatred and displeasure for this action, that it cost him his life: and murdered he was, some report one way, some another. But I find in Fabius a most ancient writer, that he lived until he was an old man: who reporteth this of him: That oftentimes in his latter dayes he used to utter this speech, A heavy case and most of wrete ed for an aged man to live banisht. The men of Rome envied not those women their due deferved praises. So free was the world in those dayes, from depraving and detracting the glory of others. For in memorial hereof to all posterity, there was a Temple built and dedicated to Fortuna Muliebris, i. Womens fortune. After all this, the Volicians joyned the Aquians unto them, and returned into the territory of

Rome. But the Equians would no longer abide Accins to be their Commander. And upon

A this strife between the Volscians and Equians, whether of them should appoint a General over the army raised joyntly of them both, first they grew to a mutiny, and afterwards to a cruel battel. Such was the good tortune of the people of Rome, that two armies of their enemies, were thus by civil discord and contention, no less mortal than obstinate, overthrown and brought to naught. Comuls then, were T. Sicinius and C. Aquilius. To Sicinius were allotted the Volscians, and to Aquitius the Herniks (who also were out and up in arms) for their leveral Province. That year were the Herniks vanquished, but with the Volf ians they fought to, as they departed on even hand, giving and taking the like.

After them were Sp. C. flins, and Procalus Virginius made Confuls. Then was there a league R concluded with the Herniks, and two third parts of their Lands were taken from them. Whereof the one moity, Coffins the Conful was minded to distribute among the Latins, the other among the Commoners. To this donation he laid too also a good portion of ground, which being Commons by right, he found much rault, that it was in the tenure and possession of private persons. This act of his made diverse of the Senators, namely, such as were great landed men and interested therein, to startle for fear of hazarding their estate. Over and behdes, the Senators all in general were in great perplexity, lest that the Conful by this largets should rise by popular favour to luch greatness, as might prejudice their free hold, yea and endanger the very main chance of publick liberty. And this was the first time that the law Agraria was published; and The law Agrato forward unto this present hour, it was never debated of, but with exceeding great firs and ria first publi-C troubles of the State. The other Conful withflood this largels, with the general onient of the Senators, and without contradiction of some Commoners: who at the very first began to missike; on of wast and utterly abhor, that the donation was fo common, and from the natural citizens, extended to lands among their allies and confederates. Moreover, they might oftentimes hear even the Conful himfe, f the Commons, Virginisis, openly in his foleinn Orations before the people, to deliver by way of prophetie, and as it were to prognosticate, "That this was a peft len largest of his brother Conful, and that those Voginius a-" grounds would in the end enthral the thersthereof, and that it was the very high way to fet up a gainst the law "Kingdom again. For to what other intent (I pray you) were their allies, and the nation of the Latins affociate in the same? To what purpose either, was a third part of the Lands won by conquest,

" given again to the Herniks professed enemies but a while before, but that these nations might have D" Caffius to be fuch another Captain of theirs, as Coriolanus was. And thus by diffwading and croffing the law Agraria, he became now to be popular and gracious with the people. Then both Confuls flrived much, who might please and gratify the Commons most. Virginius, by giving out that he would maintain and suffer the Lands to be divided, so they were affigued to none but to the citizens of Rome: Caffins again, who in the largels of the Lands, icemed to Court and infinuate himself with the allies and thereby was of the citizens lesse regarded and reputed to the end, that by some other benefit he might regain the hearts of his country men was of opinion, and made a motive, that the mony which was received for the Sicilian corn, should be repayed unto the people. But the Commons refuted and abhorred that, as a very bribe and ready bait for a Scepter and Crown. So greatly were all his gifts, for the deep rooted suspition and jealousy E of his afpiring to a Kingdom, loathed in the conceits of men, as if they had flowed in wealth, and been rich enough. And for certain it is recorded, that follown as he left his Office, he was condemned and purto death. Some report, that his own father did the execution: and that upon sp. cassius pur examination privately had at home within his houle, he finding him faulty, whipped him first, and to death for Gebilled him and conferred the good trade house of feeking to be fo killed him, and conferrated the goods and chattels of his fon, as a Deeda id to Ceres, whereof a king Statue or Image was made, with this Inscription or Title , Given out of the house of Caffins. I find in some records (which soundeth nearer to the truth) that he was by the "Quettors of Caso Fa- + Treasurers" bins, and L. Valerius, endited of treaton, and being convicted, was by a verdict of the people con- of the City. demned, and his house by order from the whole City, rafed and pulled down. And at this day, it is the voyd yard that lieth before the Temple of Tellus. But how foever he had his tryal and F judgement, privately or openly condemned he was when Ser. Cornelius and Q. Fabius were Coninls. Long continued not the peoples anger and fpight against Cassius. So tweet was the law Agreria in it felf, that when the Author and Upholder thereof was out of the World, they longed to have it on foot again. Which defire of theirs was the rather fet on fire, through the pinching niggardife of the Senators, who having that year subdued the Volscians and Æquians, kept the fouldiers fasting and defrauded them of the spoil. For what prizes soever were gotten from the enemies, the Conful Fabius fold and brought into the Exchequer or Chamber of the City.

Now was the name of Fabias already odious to the Commonalty, for the latt Confels take: yet obtained the Senators so much, and held their own so, as Caso Fabius was created Conful with L. Amilius. This made the Common more malicious and bent to mischief. And sedition at G home caused war abroad. Fo rain war restrain'd civil discord for a while. Both Senators and Commons with one accord, under the conduct of Amilian, fought fortunately with the rebellious Volicians and Aquians, and difeated them. Howbeit more enemies perished in the chife, Temple of Cathan were flain in the battel: fo hotly the horsemen pursued them when they were once diffor- flor dedicated. fited and gave not over. The same year was the Temple of C. for, confectated in the *Ides of Quin- Disanvirs for tilis. It had been vowed ato etime in the Latins war by Posthumius the Distator. His son was de in ation of created Daumvir, for that purpose, and dedicated it. a l'emple.

This year also the Commons hearts were fet upon the law Agraria, and longed afresh after the H sweetness thereof. The Tribuns of the Commonalty graced and credited their popular authority, with propounding a law as popular and acceptable to the people. But the Senators hyppoling verily that the multitude was furious and outragious enough, and too much of themselves, without any hire and reward, flood ingreat dread and horror of these largesses, as the very allurements and provocations, of rash and heady attempts: & the stoutest champions of their side to withstand the law, were the Confuls. That part therefore and State of the City had the better hand, not only this present year, but for the next ensuing. For they choic M. Fabius Caso his brother, for the one Conful, and L. V. lerius for the other, a man of the twain more odious in the eyes of the Commons, in regard of his late acculation of Sp. Cassius. In which year also there was strife and I much adoe with the Tribuns. But both law and law-makers with their glorious bragging and vaunting of their goodly donative, which they could not effect, proved vain and came to nothing. Upon this, the name of Fabij, who after three Confulthips together one after another, by them born continually without intermission, were inured and tried in the broils and contentions of Tribuns, was in great request and reputation: and in their house and family remained still for a good while after, that dignity, as an honor well and worthily bellowed upon them. Then beganthe Veientian war, and the Volttians likewife rebelled. But for any wars abroad what soever, they had strength enough and to spare, if by jars at home among their own selves they had not abused the same.

Besides this disquietness and affliction of all mens minds, occasioned by these dissensions, there K hapned (to amend the matter well) prodigious, and strange tokens from Heaven, daily in a manner threatning both in City and Country the heavy hand of God. And when as the foothlayers and wizards were fent out unto, to learth forth the cause of Gods wrath and indignation both in publick and private, as well by inspection of the inwards of facrificed beafts, as by aspect of birds and fouls, they could affign it to nothing else but this, that there was some errour committed in their facrifices and disine liturgie. Those fearful and prodigious signs proceeded still to far, that one Oppia a vertal Nun, convicted and condemned of incest, suffered death.

After this, followed Q. Fabins and C. Tullins Confuls, In which year the discord at home was nothing less' and the war abroad far greater. For the Æquians roleup in arms: the Veientians also entred the confines, and made much spoil. And whiles they were more and more careful r about these wars what order to take, Casa Fabius and Sp. Furius, were made Consuls. By this time the Aquians affaulted Artona a City in Latium. And the Velentians having sped themselves with prizes and booties, made great cracks that they would give an affault upon the very City of Rome. There fearful news, which ought to have abated and taken down the stomacks of the Commons, made them much more fier e and fell, and they returned of themselves unto their old biass of reinfing warfare: but Sp. Licinius their Tribune, thinking now the time was come to enforce upon the Senators the law Agraria, upon this exigent and extream point of necessity, had taken upon him to flop the levying and letting out of an army. But he drew upon his own head the whole hatred and displeature of the Tribuns themselves and their authority. For the Consuls opposed themselves against him no more bitterly than his own companions in office: by whose M affiffance the Confuls went through with the Muffer. And for two wars at once, there were enrolled two armies. The one under the leading of Fabius, against the Aquians, the other, against the Veientians commanded by Furius. Against whom there was nothing done worthy of remembrance. As for Fabius, he had somewhat more to do with his own men than with his enemies. That man himself alone was he, that being Consul upheld the Common-weal, which his army The diffibedi- for hatred of their Conful, had as much as in them lay, utterly betrayed. For when as he (above many other warlike feats and parts of a right worthy General, whereof he shewed singular proof, dien to their both in preparation, and also in man-ging of the war) had so marshalled and ranged his battail, Captain.

Captain, that with lending out the horiemen only, he disordered and brake the ranks of his enemies host: behold the footmen would not follow on after that difaray: neither, when the exhortation of N their leader whom they hated, prevailed not, could their own shame at least-wife, and the publick dishonor for the present; no, nor yet the imminent danger like to ensite (in case the enemy had taken heart again and made head) force them to amend their pace one jot, and make more speed. Neither could he possibly make them (if to do nothing else) so much as to march sill in battail aray: but full against his commandment they retire with their ensigns: and as men sory in their hearts and ill apaid, (he that had feen them would have faid they had loft the field) curfing their General one while, and the valiant service of the horsemen another while, they return to their Tents. Neither wish the General what way to remedy this so pesilent an example and dange: ous precedent. Thus we may fee, that brave men, of fingular and ex ellent wits, have been more to feek and fail in their skill, how to govern a subject than to vanquish an enemy. The Conful returneth to Rome, having purchased morehatted of his froward and stubborn souldiers, than wonhonor by his martial prowefs. Neverthelefs, the Senators prevailed so much that the Confulihip kept refidence still in the name of the Fabij. So, they created M. Fabius Conful, and joyn with him Cn. Manlius for his collegue,

This year likewise, had one patrone and maintainer of the law Agraria, to wit, Tiberius Pontificius a Tribune. He taking the same course, and following the steps of Sp. Licinius, hindered A the musters for a while. And when the Senators were herewith disquiered again, then Ap. The politike Claudius arose up and said, " That the year before, the Tribunes power was overmatched, and the practise of Ap. "neck of it broken in proof, only for that prefent, but in example for ever hereafter: for almuch to abate the "as it was well feen then by experience, that of it self even among their ownselves it fell apieces: Tibunes au-"and never will there want at any time one good Tribune or other, that would be glad to get thorny, "the start and victory of his fellow, yea, and the savour also of the better part, for to purchase the "good of the weal-publike. And that there would be more Tribunes, if more were needfull, "ready to affit the Confuls: and if there were but one, even that one were inflicient to fland "against all the rest, So that the Consuls and LL. of the Council would but do their endeavour, to

R" win unto the State and Senate, some certain of the Tribunes, if they might not compass all. The Senators being thus schooled and taught their lessons by Appius, both ail ingeneral would courteously fainte and friendly intreat the Tribunes, and also in particular as many of them as had been Confuls, according to that interest that each man had in any one of them privately, partly by favour and friendship, and partly by countenance and authority, prevailed so with them, that they were willing and well content to employ the Tribunes authority to the good and fafety of the Common-weale. So by the help of foure Tribunes, against one that hindred the good of all, the Consulstook muster of the souldiers. Then set they forward on their voyage to war with the Veientians: unto whom from all parts of Hetruria they came to aid and inccour; not so much for any love that they bare to the Veientians, as in hope that the puissance of Rome

C through intestine and civill diffention, would decay and come to nought. For in all the Diets and Affemblies of the States of Heruris, the Princes and Peers gave it out and faid, That the Thespreches power and greatness of the Romans was everlatting, if through mutual discord they warred hop of the Tustan to among themselves: which hath been found the only bane of weathy and flourishing Cities, Princes in where y mighty Empires became mortall and subject to a finall end. "Which mischief (fay their Councils, "they) this long time hath been prevented and delayed, partly through the fage advise and pru-"dent government of the Senate partly by the patience and long sufferance of the Commons: "but now they are come to a great extremity. Divided they are, and of one City become twain: e each part have their feverall Magistrates and laws by themselves. At the first, however they "were wont to be at odds, and to fall out at the multering of fouldiers, yet in war they would "hold together and obey their Captains. How soever they fared at home in the City, were the

 State never io far out of order, yet io long as martiall distribline was on foot and took place, they  might be reclaimed, and all troubles stated. But now, the former use and custome of disobeying "Magistrates within the City, is taken up by the Roman souldiers in the very Camp, For no "longer fince than the last war of all, in the time of battell and conflict, their whole Army agreed " of their own accord, not forced by any extremity that they were put unto, forto give the Vei-"entians, as much as in them lay, even after they had loft the field, the entire victory and honour " of the day. For they abandoned their enfigns, left their Generall alone in the skirmilh, and "against his will, retired themselves into the Camp. And surely, if they hold on still this course, " Rome may be won by means of her own fouldiers: there needs no more to do, but to proclaime

E"and make a shew of war: For even the very destinies and gods themselves would performe all "the rest: Upon these hopes and deep perswahons, the Tuscans, who afore were wont otherwhiles to have the better, and sometimes to take the worse in their wars, put themselves in arms, The Roman Confuls likewile were in fear of nothing elfe fo much, as of their own power, their own for e and weapons: being affrighted at the remembrance of that foul and shamefull example, and that lewd part plaid in the last war: lest peradventure they should put it upon this point of hazard, as to be in danger of two battels at once. And therefore info doubtfull and perillous a case, they held off fight, and kept themselves within their Camp, if haply time and space would asswage their anger, bring them into the right way again, and reclaime them to good and reasonable order. The enemies hereat, as well Veientians as the other Tuscans, made F the greater hafte, and were more sharp set, and provoked them to the field: first by riding up and down before their Camp, hard at the gates thereof, braving and challenging them forth, at the lalt, seeing they could not prevail, they fell to rating and railing, one while upon the Confuls them-felves another while upon the whole Army, in these and such like terms: "A gay matter indeed, " and a proper device to talve their cowardile, and under a colour of civill diffention to cloak their "fearfulnels : and the Confuls forfooth mistrust more the faithfulness and loyalty of their fouldi-"ers in service, than they doubted their valour and sufficiency of service. Mary, here is indeed a " new kind of mutiny. What? Armed men to hold their peace, and fit still? Hitting them in their "teeth besides, with their new start-up rising, and late sprung base beginning letting sty against them lies and truths. one with another, and spared nor. For all this soule stirchey kept, souring and

G reviling them under their very trench, and hard at their gates, the Consuls themselves were not one jot troubled. But the foolish and ignorant multitude what with anger, and what for shame of these reproachfull terms, was much distempered: and one whiles wholly gave over to regard and thinke upon home troubles and diffentions, and had rather than their lives be revenged of their enemies: Anon again, they would not in any case gratifie the Nobles and Confuls, nor wish them good fuccess. Thus the hatred both against the enemies without, and the Consuls within strove together in their hearts: untill ar length forrain occasions got the mastry over them: so proudly, ~

so insolently, the enemy scorned and made a game of them. Whereupon they came thick by troups H to the Generals pavilion, calling upon them for to fight, requiring to put forth the banner and fignall of battell. The Confuls laid their heads together, and as taking good advisement, conferred on the matter a good while. To fight they were most willing and dehrous: but this defire was to be kept back and diffembled and thereby argmented: to the end, that by holding off, by opposing themselves, and making some stay, they might set the souldiers on, and being once set on it, they might make them follow more eagerly at once. In conclusion, this answer was returned unto them: That they made too much halle: it was not yet full ripe, nor the time come, to give battell: they must hold themselves contented, and keep within their tents: proclaiming moreover, that no man be so hardy as to fight: and who soever attempted it, without their warrant and commission, they I would proceed against him with all rigour, as a professed enemy. Thus were they dimissed. And the leis willing they thought the Consuls were, the more eager were they, and set upon a battell. The enemies besides, when they had intelligence, that the Consuls were not disposed to fight, and had taken order to the contrary, were inkindled and inflamed so much the more. For now they supposed they might brave it, and infult upon them fafely without danger. For why? The Confuls durst not trust the souldiers with weapon in hand: "now were their mutinies come to the "height, and to breakforth in extremities: now and never before the Roman Empire and Domicontinuous at an end. Prefuming contidently upon this ground, they run together unto the gates, "redoubling a thousand villanous and opprobrious terms, and much ado they had to forbear af-"faulting the camp. Now could the Romans on the other tide hold no longer & endure this contumely and indignity, but came running from all parts of the camp unto the Confuls, And now not leiturely as before, make they request, and by mediation of their chief centurions, but all at once on every fide plied them with outcries and clamors. Now was the matter come to ripeness, yet flow were the Coss, still and hold off. Then Fabius, seeing the tumuit increased & that for sear of a mutiny his brother Conful had yie ded already, caused silence to be made by sound of trumper, and thus The speech of he spake . "I know full well O Manling, that these fellows are able to win the victory : but that "they will so do I know not, and they themselves have caused me to doubt. I have therefore set "down my rest, and fully resolved not to give the signal of battell, unless they swear to return out " of the field with victory. Once did the fouldiers in battell deceive a Coff, of Rome: but the gods "in heaven shall they never deceive. Then M. Flue olesses a Centurion, one of the formost that cal- L. "led for battell so instantly," Return will I (quoth he) O M.Fa. ins victor out of the field : and if "I fail, then I beseech father Jupiter Mars Grad vus and other gods to make me a fearfull example "and shew their wrathfull displeasure upon me. The same oath after him took the whole army, e-"very man against himself. Thus when they had sworn the trumper sounded. Then buckle they them eives toward battell full of anger full of hope. Now they bid the Tuscans revile and rail their fill: now being at all points armed, they wished they had afore them man to man their enemies, those that were so lively and lusty with their tongues. Right valiantly bare themselves that day, as well the Commons as the Nobles, But the name of the Fabii, the Fabii I say passed all the rest and wan the spurs. Who in this piece of service purpoted to gain again the hearts of the Commons, which in many civill contentions were fet against them. And so they embattelled themselves. The M enemies likewife, both the Veientians and also the Tu can legions were nothing behind, as making almost fure reckoning that they should be fought, withall no more than the Equianshad been, Nay they were in hope of some greater ditorder amongst them, and that, considering they were so malecontent, and the occasion so doubtin! they would play a more shamefull part, and shew their leaders a beastly cast. But it sell out far otherwise. For never in any other war afore, gave the Romans a hotter charge upon the enemies: to much had they of the one fide with spitefull taunts and reproaches netled them, and the Confuls on the other fide with their long delaies whet them on, Scarce had the Tustans any time to put themselves in battell array, but at the very first encounter. and shock, casting their javelins catelesly from them (I know not how) rather than levelling and charging them against the enemy, they came presently pell-mell to hand-strokes, and to deal with N their swords, which is the cruellest fight of all other. The Fabii among the formost in the forefront fought valiantly, shewing their countrimen a brave fight, and a noble example to follow. Where Q. Fabius who had been Conful the third year before, the leader and forwardest of them all, whiles he advanced himself and rushed amongst the thickest of the Veientians and scussed with many of them together, was not aware of his deadly enemy fo near: but behold a certain Tufcan a mighty man of strength and skilfull at his weapon, ran him through the breast with his fword. Which was not fo foon drawn forth of his body, but Fabius fell down head ong upon his wound and died. Both armies felt the fall of that one man: and therewith the Romans retired. With that M. Fabrus the Conful stepped over his body as it lay along, and holding forth his target between: "Why, fouldiers (quoth he) is the oath ye took torun away and retire thus in-"tothe Camp? And are ye more affraid indeed, of these most dastardly enemies, than of Ju-" piter and Mors, by whom ye sware? But I, who was not sworn at all, will either make return "with victory, or elie O Q. Fabius, fighting here by thee, I will lise and die by thy fide. To whom, Cafo Falius, who the year afore was Conful, replied again: " Think you brother, with "theie words to mike them to fight? Nay, the gods are they that must do it, by whom "they have fworn, And let us like noble Knights, and for the honour of the Fabian house,

A "fir up and animate our fouldiers by fighting rather than by exhorting. Thus rode the two Fabit with lance in rest into the forefront, and drew the whole battel with them. The fight of one fide being thus renewed, Cn. Manlius the Conful in the other wing bestirred himself, and did for his part as valiantly: Where hapned almost the like fortune. For as in the one wing the fouldiers followed Q. Fabius, fo in this they cheerfully went with the Conful himself Marlius, chafing the enemies afore him as discomitted. And when he was fore wounded, and thereupon gone out of the battel, his men supposing him to be slain, drew back, and had indeed lost ground and given way to the enemy, but that the other Conful with certain Cornets of horiemen, galloped amain into that quarter, and cried aloud that his fellow Conful was living: and that him-R self who had defeated the other point, was ready with victory to assist them, and so upheld the middle of the Army, that now began to shrink. Manlins alio, to encourage his men, shewed himself in open fight. Thus the knowledge and presence of the two Consuls made the souldiers take heart aftesh. Herewithall besides, were the enemies battalions the thinner and weaker. because they trusting upon their exceeding number, had drawn out those that were to serve for succour and supply, and sent them away to assaile the Camp. In the surprising whereof, finding no great ado and small refishance, whiles they had more mind to rifle for pillage, than to fight for the victory, they lost time. In the mean space the Roman Triarii, who were not able to hold out the first affault and entrance, having dispatched to the Consuls certain messengers, to give knowledge in what terms they flood, cast themselves round in a ring, and retired themc selves to the Pratorium or Generals lodging, and of themselves alone, made head and renewed the fight. Likewise Manlius the Conful being ridden back to the Camp, at every gate fer (ertain fouldiers in guard: and so enclosed them within, that they could not get forth. The Tuscans being in this desperate case, fared more like mad men than hardy souldiers. For when as they ran here and there every way, according as they had any hope to find iffue and to escape, and had made fundry offers and attempts in vain: behold one troup of tall fellows in a body, made no more ado, but knowing the Conful, who by reason of brave and goodly armour was a fair mark, charged upon his own person. The first volley of their shot was received by those that fact many marget upon in or in parton, the marget many factor many factor many marget upon in or in the many marget many factor many marget marget marget marget marget many marget m was wounded to death, and fell down in the place, and all the reft were disconfited. Wherenpon Conful flain, the D the Tufcans took more heart unto them, but the Romanswere fo diffressed, that they ran all about the Camp ingreat fear. And in extream jeopardy had they been, but that the Lieutenants caught up the Conful his body, and made passage at one gate for the enemy. Through which they rushed forth, and dismarched disorderly, untill they light upon the other Coniul presently after his victory: where they either fell again upon the edge of the sword, or were scattered and put to flight. This brave Victory thus atchieved, was heavy yet and for rowful for the death of two fo noble personages. And therefore when the Senate had decreed a Triumph, the Conful returned this answer: "That willingly he could allow thereof in regard of the passing good service Fabius refu-"performed in that war, in case an Army might triumph without a General. But as for himself. " seeing that his house grieved and mourned for the death of his brother Q. Fabius, and that the p "Common-wealth was half fatherless as it were, for the loss of a Conful, he would not ac-" cept the Lawrel so deformed and foully blemished, both with publike and private sorrow. This Triumph thus by him refused, was more honourable than all the Triumphs in the world. By which we may see that glory despised in due time returneth otherwhiles in greater measure. Then folemnized he with great honour the obsequies one after another, first of his fellow Conful, and then of his own brother. And he himself made the funeral Orations for them both, Buc fo as in yielding unto them their due commendations, he went himself away with the greater part. And not unmindful of that rule which he had learned in the beginning of the Contulthin. namely, to win again the hearts and love of the Commons, he divided the cure of his hurt and wounded fouldiers among the Senators. With most of them the Fabii were charged, and of Finone were they better tended and looked unto than of them. Whereupon the Fabilinow waxed popular, and that, for no other policy and intent, but only to do the Common-wealth good : and therefore with the favour and good will of the Commons, as wel as of the Nobles, Cafo Fabius was created Conful, with T. Virginius; Whose principal care above all was this even before war, before musters, before all things elle, that seeing now in some measure there was good hope of concord begun already, the hearts of the Commons might be perfectly linked and united together with the Nobles, and that, with all speed possible. In the beginning therefore of this year, before that any Tribune of the Commons should prefer the law Agraria, he thought good and gave his advice, that the Nobles should prevent all, and go in hand fift themselves to perform their part, and shew their bounty: namely, in parting the lands gotten by conquest, and freely bestowing the G same as equally as might be among the Commons. For it was meet and requisite that they should bepossessed thereof, whose sweat of brows, ray, whose bloud had paid for the purchase. But the Senators could not hear of that ear, but misliked of the motion : yea, and some of them complained and faid, that the lively spirit, and couragious disposition of Calo, which sometimes he had, was now by reason of excessive glory, grown to be toyish and full of vanities. And there an end of civill factions for a time. But the Latines were much troubled with the incursions and inrodes of the Equians. Thither was Caso with an Army sent, who invaded and overran the very country of the Equitans, Forra- H ging and ipoiling as he went. The Equians thereupon retired, & put themselves into their towns, and kept cose within the walls, whereby there was no memorable field fought. But at their enemies the Veientians hand, they received an overthrow, and that through the rashnels of the other Conful: and had not Cafo Fabius come to the rescue in good time, the whole Army had been utterly loft. From that time there was neither war nor peace with the Veientians: but their dealing was much what after the manner of robbing. For when the Roman Legions were abroad, they would leave the field &take to their Cities: when they perceived the Legions were removed and gone, they would make excursions and wastethe country. Thus plaid they mock holiday, and dallied with them, shifting off war with quietness, and quietness again with war, by turns. So as I the Romans could neither all wholly rest careless and secure for them, nor yet go through stitch, & make an end once for all with them. Befides, other wars were either prefently at hand, to wit, from the Æquians and the Volicians, who could no longer fit flill, than untill their fresh grief, and pain of the last defeature was over-past; or else the Sabins, never other but enemies, yea, and all Hetruria, were like all shortly to rise and take arms. But the Veientian a continual enemy, rather than dangerous, provoked them to anger with reproachful taunts, oftner than with any great peril or hurt. And yet as little as it was, it might notime be neglected, florgave them leave to be employed in the mean while otherwhere. Then came the whole house and kindred of the Fabis unto the Senat, in the name of them all spake the Consul in this wise: "My Lords of the Senat, "the Veientian war had need rather of a resident garrison, as ye know well enough, to keep the K to the Lords of "frontires, than great forces for expedition. As for you, see ye to other wars. Let the Fabii alone "to deal as private enemies with the Veientians. We dare undertake and warrant, that the State " of Rome shall receive no dishonour nor danger there. We are fully minded and resolved at "Our own proper cost and charges, to maintain and mannage that war, as appropriate and pecu-The linage of « culiar to our name and family: the City shall be charged neither with men nor money there. Great thanks were given them for this their forwardness. The Confulbeing come out of the Senat house, was attended home with the whole generation of the Fabii who stood at the porch of the Council Court, expecting the Senats decree, And being commanded to be ready in armor well appointed the next day, and to give attendance at the Confuls door, they departed from thence their own perhome to their own houses. The bruit hereof spread all over the City. All men extoll the Fabii up L to the skie, faying, "That one family had taken upon them the whole burden of the City. The "Veientian warnow is become (say they) a privat charge, and require th the power and force on-"Iv that privat persons could make. O that there were two such samilies more in Rome of that er stomack and valour: that one of them might take the Volscians in hand, and another the Æquier ans. Surely all the nations bordering hereabout might foon be subdued, and the people of Rome "fit fill the while and rest in peace. The day following, the Fabii armed themselves, mounted on horseback, and repaired to the Rendezvous aforesaid, as they were commanded. Then came the Consul forth, clad in a rich coat of arms, and standing in his porch, beheld his whole bloud and linage armed and marshalled in order, and being received in the midst of them, cansed the guidons and Cornets to be advanced. Never marched three along the City an Army either less in num- M ber or more renowned for their fame and the admiration of men. Three hundred men of arms they were and fix, all nobly descended of one stock, of one race and name all. And of all them there was not one that a fage and prudent Senate would have refused at any time as unsufficient to be a Leader and Commander in the field. Thus surnished with the force and strength that one only Family could make, they advanced forward, threatning and menacing the ruin and destruction of the Veientians. Therefollowed a number and multitude of Citizens: one private company by themselves of kinsfolk, allies, friends, and fellows, casting in their minds no mean matters, neither of hope nor fear, but all exceeding measure and surpassing: another, of the common people, moved with a carefull regard, and aftonied again in a favourable applause and admiration of their enterpisse, crying with one voice, Hold on right valiant N Knights, March on a Gods name in happy hour; God grant lucky speed, answerable to your magnanimous attempts and defignments: and look for, at our hands from henceforth, Confulfhips striumphs all rewards and honourable dignities what foever. And all the way as they paffed along the Capitol, the Cattle and other Temples, they belought the gods, as many as were prefented to their eye, as many as they could conceive in their minds, to vouchfafe that squadron to be attended upon with good fuccels and fortunate felicity, and foon to return home again in sasety to their native country and loving parents. But, alas the while, in vain were all these prayers made. Then fet they forward on their journey, leaving Jarus Church on their right hand, taking the ungracious and unlucky way, from the gate Carmentalis, untill at length they came to the river * Cremera, That was thought a convenient place to fortifie in and there to plant a garri-O Fossaw Vanca, son. After this were L. Amyling and C. Servilius made Confuls, And so long as they adventured no farther than forraging the Country, the Fahii were good enough, not only to defend their hold and fort ; but all their frontier parts and marches where the Tuscan Territoryad joyneth to the Roman they so scoured and traversed, between the one confine and the other, that they kept all their own in fafety, and mightily endamaged the enemies. Then furceased they a while, but it was not long, from wasting and spoiling. By which time both the Veientians had gathered

A a power out of Hetruria, and affaulted the fort of Cremera, and also the Roman Legions, under the conduct of the Conful L. Emilius, encountred the Tufcans in open field, And yet the Veientians had hardly time enough to put themselves in order of battel: so suddenly at the very first skirmith, whiles the files were entring into array under their colours in the vanguard, and the fuc-cours, and supplies a placing and disposing in the rereward, a Cornet of Roman horse charges them so hotly on the Hank, that they had not room and space, either to begin fight, or to keep their standing fure. Thus were they discomfitted, and chased back as tar as Saxa rubra, i.e., Red rocks (for there they were encamped) where they humbly craved peace. Which when they had obtained (see their inbred inconstancy so naturally engrassed) they were weary of it, and repented thereof. B before the Roman garrison could be withdrawn from Cremera. And so the Fabii once again skirmished with the Veientian Nation, without preparation of greater war. Neither made they inrodes only, and sudden violent incursions into the Territories but fundry times they encountred with banners displaied, and joined battell in plain field. And that one house and kindred of the Roman people carried oftentimes the victory away from that most mighty and rich City (in those daies) of all the Tuscans. This took the Veientians at the first for a foul disgrace and indignity, But afterwards they deviled to lay trains; as occasion should serve, and entrap their sierce and hardy enemy; and well apaid they were and rejoyced, that the Fabii upon the good success that fill followed them, were become more bold and venturous. And therefore divers times when the Romans were abroad a plundering, they would drive cattel in their way, but yet so, as they might referm to light upon them by chance. The ruftical peafants made shew as if they fled out of the Country, and leit the fields wast : yea, and the companies of fouldiers lent out to restrain and stay their fpoiling, made thew of running away, pretending ofther they were afraid than they had caule indeed. So as now the Fabii by this time fet folight by their enemies, and thought so well of themselves, that they beleeved verily their power was invincible, and might not be withstood in any ground, or at any time whatfoever. This conceit and hope of theirs fet them so affoat, and made them so bold, that espying upon a time cattelfar from Cremera, (for there was a large plain made them to both, that elpying upon a time carterial from Cremera, that there was a large plan between) although here and there they might defery armed fouldiers of their enemies, yet from their fort they ran down, with bridle in their horse neck. And when unadvisedly without forefight, they were past the ambush, which was laid covertly about the very way that they were to D pais, and were firaging here and there diforderly, driving the cattel away, which gadded in and out, as their manner is when they be scared and affighted, then suddenly flart the enemies all at once our of the ambushment : so as both before and behind, and on every side they were belet and environed with enemies. At the first the very houting and outcry they made round about terrified them: afterwards flew their shor from all sides. And as the Tuscans gathered themselves together, the Fabii were foon hemmed within a round battallion of enemies standing armed thick and close one to another: and the nearer the enemies approached about them in so much less room were they enforced also to cast themselves into a ring. Which, considering their arraies were thrust so thick together in so straight a compass, made their small number appear the less, and the multitude of the Tulcans to carry a greater shew. Then forbearing to fight as they first intended, E onevery hand alike, and with all at once, they made head to one only place. Thereto they endeavour with might and main, body and axinour; and with a pointed pattel wedgewise pierced through and made themselves passage. And they took the way that led to a little hill, rifing up with an easie ascent. From whence at first they made resistance only and kept their ground: but foon after, when by reason of the vantage of the hill, they had some time to breath themfelves, and to take heart again after so great a fright, they forced the enemies also to give back that were mounting up the hill. And as few in number as they were yet by the benefit of the ground they had gotten the better, if the Veientians had not fet a compals about the hill fide, and gained the very top and pitch thereof. Thus became the enemy again to have the upper hand. And so were the Fabii flain every man, and not one of them escaped, yea, and their fort overthrown The Fabilal F and rafed. Three hundred and fix there were that died, as all writers do agree. One only of the flain. name was left behind at home, well near fourteen years of age, for to renew and encrease, as our of a stock, the name of the Fabit, and to prove in time to come the greatest propand pillar that the people of Rome should have in their dangers and extremities many a time both at home and abroad.

But ere this heavy loss and overthrow hapned, C. Horatius and T. Menenius were Confuls. Menenius was fent forthwith against the Tuscans puffed now up with pride for this their victory: with whom then also he fought unfortunately and sped but ill. For the enemies surprised and got the Janiculum, and the City had furely been belieged, (confidering that belies war they were greatly diffressed for want of victuals, for the Tuscans were passed over the Typer) but that G Horarius the Conful was called home from the Volicians. And so near approached the enemies in this war and pressed to the very walls, that first there was a skirmish on even hand at the Temple of * Sp s: and another again at the gate Collina, Where albeit the Romans got but very finall * Hope; odds of the enemy, yet did that conflict upon a little recovery of wonted courage prepare the fouldiers to better service in the battels ensuing.

Now were A. Virginius and Sp. Servilius created Confuls. The Veientians after this late defeat, came no more into the field, yet they robbed and wasted still, And from the Janicalum as

from a fortress and place of safe retreat, they would make excursions our into the Territory of H Rome all about, and neither cattel nor country people could any where be in fafety for them. But afterwards, they were overtaken themselves in the same wile that they had caught the Fabii with. For as they followed after certain cartel, which were driven forth here and there of purpose to draw and tranthem abroad, they were plunged themselves headlong into an Ambuscado laid for them. And the more they were, the greater was their flaughter. Upon this foil, their cruel and fell anger gave the occasion and overture of a greater overthrow. For having crossed the Tyber in the night leafon, they gave the attempt to make an affault upon the Camp of the Conful Servilius, But being discomfited, and many of them flain, the rest retired themselves from thence, and with much ado recovered the Janiele. Straight after this, the Conful also passed over Tyber, and en-I campeth himselfstrongly under the Janiculum. The morrow morning by Sun rising, so venturous he was by reason of his fortunate fight the day before, and more for the scarcity of corn and vichals, which drave him to take he cared not how rash and dangerous courses, so they tended to more quick and speedy expedition) full fondly he advanced forward, and marched up the fleep hill of the Janiele, and charged the enemies hold : but being fet back himself from thence more shamefully than he had the day before repelled the enemies; yet by occasion that his fellow Conful came in the while to rescue, he and his Army both were saved: and the Tuscans enclosed between both hofts, were forced to turn their backs, both to one and the other, and were killed every mothers son. Thus by a rash enterprise (which as good luck was) sped well, the Veientian war came to an end. The City then, as it enjoyed peace, so it came again to be better stored of corn K and victual: both for that there was some grain brought out of Campánia, and also because the old flore that was hoorded up came abroad, by reason that no man now flood in fear oldearth

Afterwards upon plenty and ease they began to be busic again, and their heads to work, seeking to broach old troubles at home, fince they had none to occupy them abroad. The Tribunes they fell to follicite and infect the Commons, with their venome and poylon, the Law Agraria: inciting them against the Nobles that gainsaid it: not in general terms only, but also by touching particular persons. For Q. Considius and T. Genutius, who were for the Law Agraria, framed an inditement, and fued T. Menenius. And this was laid to his charge, to wit, the loss of the fort and garrison at Cremera: for that, hebeing Consul lay encamped not far from thence. But of this L danger he soon stopped the course, both becatise the Nobles laboured and rook his part, no less than they had done afore for Coriolanus: and also the affection and favour that men bare to his father Agrippa, was not worn out, and clean forgot. The Tribunes used moderation therefore in the penalty, for having commenced a capital action against him, and convicted him thereof, they fet a fine on his head of * 2000 Asles. Howbeit this cost him his life: for he grew, men say, into fuch a melancholick fit for shame of this digrace, that he fell thereupon from grief of heart unto a pining fickness, which followed him to his dying day. Then was there another accused and brought into trouble, to wit, Sp. Servilin, fo foon as he was out of his Confulfhip, at what time as C. Nantius, and P. Valerius were Confuls. In the beginning of whole year the Tribunes L. Caditius and T. Statius, called him straightwaies to his answer. Who suffained the violence of the M Tribunes, not as Menenius did, by his own intreaty and the praiers of the Nobles, but bare himfelf confidently upon his own innocency, and the good grade wherein he flood. Blamed he was likewise, and charged for the battel with the Tuscans at Janiculum. But being a man of an hor spirit and stout courage, as he carried himself before in the publike danger, so now in his own private peril, by refuting in a bold and ftout speech that he made, not only the Tribunes, but also the Commonalty, and cassing in their teeth and reproving them, for the condemnation and death of T. Menenius, by whose fathers means the Commons being in times past restored, had obtained first those very Magistrates and Laws, whereby at this day, they exercise such rigour: he went through all his troubles, and with much boldness avoided the present jeopardy he stood in. The testimony of his Colleague Virginius stood him in great stead, who produced forth as a witness, N made him partner with himself in all his worthy acts. But that process of judgment which passed against Menenius (so altered were they now, and repented therefore) did him much more good,

When this broil and contention was ended at home, the Veientians war began abroad; to whom the Sabins also had joyned their power. Whereupon the Conful P. Valerius, with the aid of the Latines and Hernicks, was sent out with an Army to Veii: and incontinently he set upon the tents of the Sabius, as they lay encamped under the wals of their confederates, and put such a terrour amongst them, that whiles they ran forth scattering by bands and companies, some at one gate some at another, to repell the violent assault of the enemies, it happed that the gate which he first advanced his ensigns against, was won. And within the trench small fight there was, but O more man-flaughter. The tumult and noise hereof was heard from out of the Camp into the City. And the Veientians in great fear ran hastily to their weapons, as if Ven had been surprised, Some make speed to succour the Sabins: others do what they can to affail the Romans. who were wholly busied about the pillage of the Camp. For a pretty while they were put to some trouble, difordered and withdrawn from their purpose: but afterwards they themselves advanced their banness, and made head against the one side and the other. The horsemen with all, sent in by the Cost.

A brake the Tufcans array, and put them to flight. And thus in one hour two armies were defeated, Sibins and two most puissant nations, and nearest neighbours to the Romans vanquished.

Whiles these exploits were performed about Veii, the Volkians and Aquians had encamped themselves, with the help only of the Hernikes, and without any Leader of a day all from the Romans and Education and themselves, with the help only of the Hernikes, and without any Leader of aid at all from the Romans, forced to abandon their rents; and besides the recovery of their own goods again, acthieved a great and rich booty, Notwithstanding all this, the Consul Nautina was sent from Rome against the Volstians. They were not well pleased, I believe, with the manner of it, that their allies should wage war at all with their own power and direction, without the Army and conduct of n the Romans. He spared not to work all the mischief he could, all abuse and spight possible against the Volkians yet could not they be brought to fight a fet field. Then succeeded L. Furius, and C. Manlius, Confuls, To Manlius fell the charge of the Veientian Province, Howbeit, war there was none at all. But at their own fite, a truce was granted unto them of forty years. And they were enjoyned to find corn and fouldiers pay. Peace was not fo foon procured abroad, but prefently enlued discord at home. For at the infligation of the Tribunes, by occasion of the Law Agraria, the Commons were fet a madding. But the Confuls skared neither with the condemnation of Menenius, nor yet with the peril wherein Servilins flood, refifted all they could. And when the Confuls were ounce out of their Office, Genutius a Tribune laid hold upon them, and airested L. Farius, and them : and L. Emilius With Opiter Virginius enter their Confulfhip, In some Annals or yearly re. C. Mantius en-C cords I find Vopi Cus Julius Contul inflead of Virginius, But in this year, who foever then were Conduct. fuls, "Furius and Manlius being indited beforethe people, went about arraised in vile apparell and 1015, Ferriti and transfer occupy and the control of Senators, as well as the Commons periwading, advising, Remonstrative of the younger fort of Senators, as well as the Commons periwading, advising, Remonstrative of the Senators of the S "and warning them to forbear and refuse all dignities and offices of state, yea, and all charge of puny Noble." "Common-weal, And as for the Confuls rods born afore them, their pursled robes with purple, "and chair of state, they should esteem no otherwise of them than of the pageants carried in a « funeral pomp. And that with these gorgeous ornaments and enfigns they were but destined to "death: much like to beafts adorned with facred white ribbands and labels, appointed to facti-"fice, But if the sweetness of a Consulship were such let them consider now withall, and perswade "themselves, that it is become private and overswaied with the power of the Tribunes: and that D "the Conful, as if he were the Tribunes fer jeant, must do all at his beck and command. For if he "quetched never so little, if he seemed to regard the Senators, or make account of any thing "else in the whole State but of the Commonalty, let him set before his eyes the exile of Cn, Mar-

"tius, the judgement and death of Menenius. The Nobles incented with thele speeches, from thenceforth began to consult and confer together, not openly and in publike council, but privatly, and apart from the privity of many. And when they were refolved once upon this point, that those accused parties now in trouble, should be enlarged one way or other, by hook or crook: then the cruellest advice, and hardest course that could be delivered best pleased them: and for to put in execution the most audacious designments what loever, there wanted not one or other to give counfel. Well the law day of trial came, and when as the Commons gave attendance devoutly in the E Forum, in great expectations of the sequel and issue, they began at first to marvel much, that the Tribun Genusius came not down in place: and inspecting somewhat because of his long tarrying & delay, they imagined that he durst not for the great men and thief Magistrates of the City: and to they complained, that the common cause was for lorn and betraied. At the last, they that kept about they complained, that the common came was forton and oct actually the large of the door & porch of the Tribune his house-brought word that he was found at home flark dead.

But above all others the Tribunes were in bodily lear, being thus by their in his sause by fellow taught how little help or none at all, their facred and redoubted Laws afforded. The No-the practice of bles could not diffemble this their joy, nor use it with moderation, but shewed it excessively and the Partitians. F fo little repented any one of them of the fact committed, that they avowed it, and took it upon them, and would not feem culpable in the action; but gave it out in plain terms, that the Tribunes by foul means were to be tamed & their wings clipped in a mischief. Upon this their victory, so shameful a precedent in times to come there went out an edict for the publishing of a muster: and whiles the Tribunes were in this feare daunted, the Confuls without any controliction, went through with it clear. But then, were the Commons much more offended at their Tribunes flence and fitting still then at the Consuls rule and imperious government: saying, "Farewell freedom, " now, farewel liberties and all: now is the old world come again, and the Tribunes authority is "both dead and buried together with Genutius. Now they were togo in hand and bethink them-"felves of some other course, how they might withstand the Senators proceedings: and seeing

G" they were destitute of all other help to rely themselves upon, the only way was for the Com-"mons to trust to themselves, & stand upon their own guard. Wheras therefore, there gave atten-"dance upon the Confuls 24 Littores or Vergers, Commoners all and no better, none more con-"temptible and base minded, if they met with those that would set them at naught: they might "thank themselves only, and their own timorous conceits & imaginations, that such things were " fo dread and terrible. Thus having animated & provoked one another with thesespeeches: there was a Sergeant sent from the Consuls to one Polero Publicius a Commoner, who because he had been a Leader in the field of certain bands, pleaded his immunity for being a common fouldier a- Hgain. Volero calleth for help to the Tribunes: but there being no man to refcue him, the Confuls commanded the man to be stript out of his cloaths, and the rods to be made ready for to scourge him. Then quoth Folero, "I appeal unto the people, feeing the Tribunes had rather have a Citi-"zen and freeman of Rome beaten with rods in their presence, than be murdered themselves by "you in their beds. But the more fiercely he cried on fill, the more cruelly fell the Listor to cut and flice his apparell for to uncase him. Then Volero being himself the stronger man, and affifted withall by some whom he called unto him, thrust the Sergeant from him: and where he perceived the mainest out-cry and loudest noise of his adherents, that sumed and charled in his behalf, thither retired he, to shroud himself among the thickest, crying: "I appeal and beseech the I "Commons of their protection and succour. Help Citizens, help fellow-souldiers. Never stay "and wait for the Tribunes, untill they come, who have themselves need of your affistance. Hereat folk were raifed and gathered together, and addressed themselves as to a Battel. A foul piece of work was toward, full of exceeding danger, and like it was, that no man would have had regard either of common law or private honesty. When the Consuls in this so great a broil and storm of outrage came in, to prevent further mischief, they knew soon by experience how slenderly guarded against danger, the Majesty of Rulers is, where force is wanting. For their Lictois were beaten, misused, and ill intreated, their rods broken all a peeces, themselves driven out of the Common place, and forced to take the Senat house, doubting how far forth Volero would proceed in the train of his victory. But when the riot was well appealed, they affembled the Sena- K torstogether, and complained there of their injuries received, the violence of the Commons, and the audacious presumption of Volero. After many opinions and sharp censures delivered among them, the Ancients and Elders prevailed at length, who thought it not good to fet the anger of the Nobles against the head-strong rashness of the Commons. And the Commons so highly favoured and embraced Volero, that in their next election they made him their Tribune for that year, wherein L. Pinarius and P. Furius were Confuls. Who contrary to all mens expechation, that thought verily he would have exercised his Tribuneship in molesting and vexing the Consuls of the former year, preserred the publike cause before his own private grievance, and gave not the Confulsio much as one foul word. Only he preferred a Law unto the people, That the Magistrates of the Commonalty might be created in a ward-Leet, or Assembly of the Tribes L and Wards. Thus under a title, which at the first fight seemed nothing hainous, passed a matter of no smallconsequence, but such as abridged the Nobles of all power and authority, to create Tribunes whom they would, by the suffrages and voices of their vaffals and favourites. But when Commons the Senators resisted with all their might, the going forward of this Act most pleasing and fan in a Tribe plausible to the Commons, and yet none might be found of the brotherhood of Tribunes, that by the authority either of Consuls or of Senators could be brought to joyn in his way by their negative voice, which was indeed the only means to cross it: the business, notwithstanding in it selfe so weighty to wield, and so hard to be compassed, held out with much debating the year through. The Commons then made Volero Tribune again. The Senators on the other fide, iuppoling the matter would now come to a final triall once for all, created for their Conful Ap, Clan-M dim, the ion of Appim: who even for the old contentions maintained by his father, who was both hated of the Commons, and also hated them again: and he had for his companion in government T. Quintins. At the very beginning no matter was treated of before that Law. But as Volen ro was the first deviser and broacher of it, so his fellow Lectorius was the more earnest and hor maintainer thereof, as he came more fresh unto it. The stouter he was besides, by reason of his great military glory, for that in those daies there was not a taller man of hands, nor more active than he. Now, when as Volero went straight to the substance of the Law in hand, without any circumstance of words, and forbare to inveigh against the Consuls person, Lettorius began his speech with challenging Appins and his house, as most proud, and cruelly affected to the Gommonalty of Rome: avouching earnestly, "That the Nobles had made, not a Consul, but a butcherly tor: N "mentor, to afflict and manglethe Commons: but being a rough-hewn fouldier, and not used "to make Orations, his tongue could not frame to express his mind as freely as he would: and "fo his utterance failing him: Since that (quoth he) O Quiries, I cannot fo readily deliver that "in my speech, as I can make that good indeed which I have spoken: Be you here to morrow, and " in this very place I will either get this Law enacted, or I will lie in the dust and die for it before er you all. The next day the Tribunes were gotten into the Temple or hall first. The Confuls and Nobility abode still in the assembly of the people, for to hinder the passing of the Law. Then commanded Lectorius all the rest to avoid and depart, but those only that were to give their voices. The young Gentlemen of the Nobility flood fill, and gave no place to the Tribunes Officer. Then willed Lettorius some of them to be attached. But the Consul Appius replied again, O "That a Tribune had authority over none but Commoners: for a much as he was a Magistrate, "not of the people, but of the Commons. Neither could himself, of his absolute power (Conful "though he was observing the custome of his ancestors, command any man to avoid: for that the "usuall form of words ran thus, May it please youmy, Masters, O Quirites: f youthink good, to depart. Soon was he able, thus laying the Law unto him, by way of fcorn and contempt, to outface Lettorius, and put him down. Whereupon the Tribune chafed, and fet into an heat, sendeth an gainst the Consul: and also there was a concourse of the multitude, raised out of all parts of the City into the Common Hall. Appins notwithstanding stood sliffely to it still, and abide the brune of this rempettuous from: neither had this broile stand without some bloudined, in cale Quintim the other Conful, had not feet some of the Aldermen that had been Confuls, to get his brother Conful by force (if otherwise it might not be) out of the Hall, whiles himself was in hand, "one while with the Commons, to appeale their iury, by way of intreaty and with fair words, B" otherwhiles befought the Tribunes to break up the affembly, perswading with them to take "more leifure in this their heat and angers for that time and space would abridge nothing of their "power, but would joyn counsel and advice thereto: concluding withal, that both Nobles should " be ruled by the people, and the Conful ordered by the Nobles, Hardiy and with much ado were the Commons quieted by Quintins, but far more trouble had the Nobles to fill the other Conful. At the length, when the affembly of the people was dismissed, the Consuls called the Senst together Where after much variety of opinions, proceeding from fear and anger according as the one or the other (waied among them: look how much longer time they had to reclaime their mind from violent courses, and tagely with deliberation to consider of the matter: to much the more their hearts went against all contention, and farther strile: infomuch, as they yeelded Quinius hearty thanks, that by his travel between parties, the discord was well allaied. And to Appius they were petitioners, "That he would be contend, that the majesty of the Contull might be no greater than would fland with the unity and concord of the Citizens. For whiles the Tribunes for their part would needs have all, and the Conful on the other fide draw all to them; between this "this pucking and haling there was no ftrength left in the midit: and to conclude the Commonweat was rent, torn and difmembred between the rulers therof: who strove rather for the mana-"ging and rule, than for the lafety and preservation of the State. Against whom Appius replied with a folemn protestation before God and man, and said, "That the weal publike was aban-"doned, forlorn, and betraied by nothing else but foolish fear: that the Senat wanted not a Con-" ful, but the Conful wanted Senators: who now yeelded to harder conditions than they had be-D" fore time in mount Sacer, Howbeit overweighed at length by the general consent and accord of the Nobles, he was content : and so the law passed quietly, was by royall consent authorised. Then The forestaid and never before were the Tribunes created in a congregation of the tribes, and by their voices, law enacted: Pifo writeth that there were three more made to the other as if there had been but twain before and he nameth also the Tribunes, to wit C. Succius, L. Numitorius, M. Duellius, So, Icilius, &t. L. Mecilius. Then had the Volicians and Aquians, between the civil fedition of the Romans, & the beginning of war, harried & wasted the country: that in case the Commons had made an insurrection, they might have retired to them as to a fure place of receit & refuge. But when all was huffit & matters compounded between the Nobles and Commons, they removed their camp backward, Appins Claudius was sent against the Volicians: and to Q intius fell the Province of the A-E quians. The same rigorous severity continued Appins still in warfare, that he used at home in the City:but to much more freely, for that he was not curbed nor held in by the Tribunes. The Courmons he hated, more than his father had done afore seeing he was overswaied, and had taken the foil at their hands: and being the only Conful, opposed against the Tribunes power, yet maugre his head, the law passed clear away, which the former Consuls his predecessors, with less ado, nor with to great hope and expectation of the Nobility, had ever hindred and staid. This his anger and indignation gave an edge to that fell-flomack of his by kind, for to plague and punish his souldiers with imperious and lordly command. But to fet they were to spurn again and disobey, that by no forcible means they could be tamed, doing all things that they did lazily flowly frowardly, and flubbornly. Neither bashed they for shame, nor flood in awe for fear. If his will was they Fishould march on apace, they would on set purpose go fair and softly: If he encouraged them in proper perion to intend their business, they would all of them flack their former service, whereun. The mutiny to they were entred of themselves : whiles he was in place, they would hang down their heads and disobe and look on the ground, as he paffed by they would feeretly carde him in their hearts. So as that encoording and look on the ground as he paffed by they would feeretly carde him in their hearts. So as that encoording the partial of the control of the ground and they ground the ground t invincible fromack of his against all hatred of the Commons, would now and then grieve here-Appin change. at, And wen he faw that all the shrewdness and rigour that he used was in vain, and that now wheir Geo. he could do no good with his fouldiers, he fell to che king the Captains and Centurions, faying, nerall. They had spoiled and marred the Army, terming them Tribunes of the Commons, and otherwhiles in taunting-wise nicknaming them Voleroes. All these doings were the Volkians aware of, and therefore were they more eager and forward, hoping that Appins should find the Roman G Army as froward and disobedient, as they had been against Fabius. And to say truth they were more crooked and unruly with Appears than with Fabius a great deal, For they were not only upwilling to have the victory as Fabius his Army was, but also defirous to lose the victory and be overcome. Being brought forth and fer in battel array, they shamefully took their heels and fled into their tents: and never made head and refutance; before they faw the Volfcians with banners displaied, advancing against the munitions of their Camp, and a foul slaughter committed upon the tail of their rereward. Then were they driven perforce to fight for very necessity, that the enemy thus far forth Victor, might be kept from the Wall and Trench: and yet fo, as it H was very apparant, that the souldiers passed for nothing elie, but only to save the Camp for being won: for some of them rejoyced at their own loss and deseature. Whereat, the store stomack of Appius was nothing daunted nor his heart broken: but he minded to deal cruelly with them, and thereupon summoned a general assembly. Then the Lieutenants, Marshals, and Colonels, came running unto him, advertifing him in no cafe to try mafteries, and to inforce his authority. The ery ground and firength wherof refleth wholly in the accord of obedient people; adding moreover, that the fouldiers commonly gave out, that they would not go to the affembly : but rather they might be heard every where, calling upon them aloud, to dislodge and remove out of the territory of the Volscians: moreover, that the enemy now Master of the field, was but a while since ad-I vanced to the gates and rampier, and well near possessed of them: whereby, they were not only to suspect, but might evidently see before their eyes some great matter toward of dangerous consequence. Whereupon at last he was over-ruled, and for aimuch as his fouldiers thereby should gain nothing but delay of their punishment) remitted the affemby for that time: and after proclamation made to fer forward in their journey the next day, and to depart in the morning very early, he caused the trumpet to sound the remove, and to march away. The Army being gone out of the Camp, and ready to be fet in order of a march at length, the Volicians who were gottenup by the same sound of the trumpet, plaid upon the tail of the rereward : the noise whereof passed from thence to the vanguard, & so disordered the entigns, so troubled the ranks by reason of that fright, that neither could the direction and commandment of the Captains be heard, nor the Army be K brought into battel array. No man minded any thing at all but to run away: and disorder. y in great numbers, they fled back over the dead carcaffes and armors that lay on heaps, and to escaped; and never flay they their flight, untill the enemy gave over the chase. At the last, the Consultaving called his fouldiers together that were run away fo fcattering, (for with all the ipeed that he made after to call them back, he could not reclaim them) en amped withouthis enemies ground in a place of security. Then he called them all together to an affembly, and inveighed bitterly, and not without just cause, against the whole Army, as having betraied the discipline of war, and forsaken their colours: asking every one of them what was become of their banners? And what they had done with their weapons? And as many fouldiers as were marmed, as many enfign-bearers as had not their enfigns, the Centurions alto, and those that received double allowance, and for look their L Florus faith, bands and companies he caused to be scourged with rods & to lose their heads. The whole numthey had the Bastinado. ber besides, were by lot tithed, and every tenth man as it fell out, executed. But contrariwise, in wide Caral. Sig. the expedition against the Æquians, the Contul and his souldiers, strove to exceed one another in currefie and kindnesses. Quintus was by nature mild and chearful, and the cruelty of his brother Conful, that never feed well, made him take more joy in that his gentle disposition. Whiles the ved of his foul. General and his Army conforted thus together, the Æquians durit not confront them, but fuffered their enemies to range all abroad and for rage the country: so as in no former wars got they greater booties from then e: and all was bestowed among the souldiers. Over and besides these gratuities, they had their due praises and solemnicommendations, wherein souldiers take no less delight than in rewards and gilts. So, that Army returned home better affected to their General, M and also to the Nobles for their Generals take: reporting that the Senate had given to them a loving father, but to the other Army alordly master. This year thus spent with variable fortune abroad in war: with grievous discord as well at home as abroad, was above all most memorable and famous for the Tribe-Leet, A matter of more note, in respect of their victory that entred into the action, than of consequence, in regard of commodity that grew thereof. For the very Leet it self lost more credit by excluding the Nobles out of that assembly, than either the Commons got strength, or the Nobles did forgo thereby. But more troublesome was the year following, whiles L. Valerius & T. Emylius were Consuls, both for the variance of the three States about the law Agraria, and also for the arraignment of Appius Claudius. Whom, being a most bitter adversary of that law, and a great maintainer and upholder of those that possessed and held the common N lands, as if he had been ever a third Conful, M. Duellini, and C. Siccius arrested and endited Never before that day came to the bar, a person to be tried before the people, so odious unto the Com-Appius claudi- mons: charged with so many wrongs done of his own, so many of his fathers afore him, in regard whereof they were highly displeased and offended with him. The Nobles likewise had not lightly laboured to earnefly nor firained themselves so much for any one as for him. Who being the patron and protector of the Senat, the maintainer and upholder of their port and dignity 3 a man ever opposed against all the troublesome broils of Tribunes & Commons, was now delivered as a prevto the Commons in their anger, and only for that he had overshot, and passed himself in hear of contention, But of all the Senators that ever were, Appins Claudius of himlelf alone was he, that cared not a rush either for Tribune or Commoner nor yet for his own arraignment. No mena-O cing threats of the Commons no earnest prayers of the Senators could once make him, I say, not to change his apparel, and in humble manner to feek and crouch unto men for to be good unto him: no nor so much, as when he came to answer for himself before the people, one whit to moilifie and let fall (as it were) that rough and that p kind of speech that he was wont ordinarily to use. He kept the same sowre countenance still, the very same frowardness and crabbedness of visage, thesame spirit of boldness in his apology and desence. Insomuch, as many of the

A Commons were no less afraid of Appius standing prisoner, there arraigned at the bar, than they had been of him, fitting as Conful in his ivory chair of eltate. In pleading of his cause, he spake briefly and at once to the point, with the same accusatory spirit, that he had ever used in all his pleas and actions. With his boildness and resolute constancy, he so amazed both Tribunes and Commons. that they themselves deserred the day of giving sentence, and suffered afterward the fuit to hang and depend fill undetermined. But not long after, even before the Law day appointed was come, he fickned and died. Whose funeral praises when as the Tribunes went about to hinder, Ap. Clauding the Commons would not fuffer, that the death of so worthy a man, should be defrauded of the dieth. due honour and folemn obsequies, and gave audience as quietly and attentively to the commen-B dation of the man now dead, as they did afore to his acculation while he was alive: and with a goodly train attended his corps to the grave.

The same year Valerius the Consul made a voiage with an army against the Æquians, and seeing he could not train the enemy forth to fight, he made a bravado to affail the Camp; but there fell such a terrible storm and tempest from heaven, with hail and thunder-claps that he was dilappointed of his enterprise. And that which made it more strange and wonderfull, he had no sooner founded the retreat, but the weather proved fo fair and calm again, that he made fome scruple and matter of conscience, to give a second assault unto the trench, as if it had been desended by the speciall power and providence of God. So, all the heat of war turned to the walting only of the Countrey. The other Conful &milius watred with the Sabins. And even there also, because C the enemies kept within their walled towns, the Territories were spoiled. But afterwards, the Sabines railed with the firing, not only of their villages and hamlets, but also of the good towns and burroughs, whereof in those parts there were many, and those well peopled, encountred the forragers: and after a doubtfull skirmish, they departed alunder, and the morrow after railed their Camp, and retired themselves back into a place of more security, which the Consultaking for a sufficient argument and proof, that the enemies were defeated, left them so, and dislodged likewife without any end of the war.

During these wars and whiles discord continued in the City at home, were T. Numitius Priscus and A. Virginius created Confuls. Now leemed it that the Commons would no longer abide the deferring of the Law Agraria. And as they were about to put it to a venture and to try the utn most by extremity they took knowledge partly by the smoke and flame of the villages on fire, and partly by the running away of the villagers, that the Volcians were near at hand. Which occurrent repressed and kept down the sedition which was now come to ripeness, and ready to break forth. For the Confuls forced by the Senare immediatly to the war, by taking the ferviceable youth with them out of the City, reduced the rest of the Commons to more quietness. And theenemies verily made no further attempt, but after they had given a false allarm, and set the Romans ina foolish fear, dismarched away as speedily as they could. Then Numitius went to Antium against the Volstians, and Virginius against the Equians: where having well-near received a great loss and defeat by a train laid for him : such was the prowels and manhood of the souldiers, that they recovered all again, which by the negligence of the Conful had like to be loft. But better was E the conduct and government of the Army against the Volscians. For there, at the first skirmish the enemies were difarrated, put to flight, and chafed as far as to Antium, a City (for that time) of right great puissance and importance. The Consuldurst not assault it, but wan from the Antiates. Cenon, another town, but nothing so wealthy. Whiles the Aquians and Volicians thus amused the Roman Armies and kept them occupied, the Sabins were come robbing and spoiling to the gates of the City of Rome. But within few daies after, they themselves received more damage than they brought, by occasion that both Confuls with two armies were entred in great anger into their Confines. In the end of the year some peace there was, but disquieted, as at all times before, with the variance between the Nobles and Commons. The Commons in a peevish and angry fit, would not be at the Election of the Confuls. So, by the Senators only and their followers, F there were elected Confuls, T. Quintius and Q. Servilius, The like year to the former these Confuls had seditious and troublesome in the beginning: but afterwards upon fortain was quiet and fall. For the Sabins with a running Camp having passed over the plains of Crustuminum, and put all to fire and word about the river Anio; were challed back, well near from the gate Collina and the walls: howbeit they drave away with them exceeding great booties both of people and cattell. Whom the Conful Servilius followed hard with a power ready to bid battell, but could not overtake their main army in any even ground meet to pitch a field in Howbeit he foraged and wasted the Country all about to as he left no corner clear that felt not his fingers, and returned with purchase of many rich prizes of all fores.

Likewise among the Volscians they sped well and had lucky hand by the good demeanour both G of captain and fouldier, First, they joyned battell upon a plain, and fought with very great staugh. The strangers ter, and exceeding much bloudshed on both sides. And the Romans (who for their small num - bit the Conful ber were more apt to feel the loss) had lost ground and dismarched, if that the Conful by ma- Quinting, king a lie for a vantage, and crying that the enemies fled from the other wing, had not encourathem and renewed the battell afresh. And so by giving a new charge, whiles they thought they had the better, they got the better in very deed. The Conful fearing again, by preffing too hard upon the Army, to enforce them to turn and make head, founded the retreat. Few daies passed between, wherein they rested quiet, as though there had been a secret truce agreed between them. H In which mean space, a great fort of people from all parts of the Volscians and Aquians repaired to the Camp, thinking verily, that if the Romans were aware of them, they would depart in the night season. Whereupon, at the third watch they came to make an assault upon their Camp. Quintim after he had quieted the tumult, which upon this judden aliarm arole, and given commandment that the fouldiers should keep themselves within their pavilions, brought forth a company of Hernicks to guard the gates, and caused certain cornettiers and trumpetters on horseback to wind and found before the trench and counterscarpe, and so to hold the enemy in sufpence and expectation untill day-light. The rest of the night all was so quiet within the Camp, that the Romans had time enough and good opportunity to take their repose and sleep. This I shew of footmen in their harnels, whom the Volicians imagined to be more than they were, and all Romans: the neighing befides, and noise that the horses made by reason of their strange riders that they were not used unto, and the found also of their trumpets and horns that made them to fet up their ears, and to stamp and sume outragiously, amused the enemies waiting ever when they would charge upon them. When it was day, the Romans being in heart and treth, as having flept their fill, came forth and embattelled themselves, and at the first shock discomfited the Volstians, wearied with long standing and overwatched withall. And yet the enemies rather gave ground and retired themselves, than seemed to be driven from their standings, because they had at their backs certain hils, whereunto they might retire behind the Principia, and not break their ranks, and fofave themselves. The Contul seeing he was come to a place of disadvantage, K made a stand. The footmen hardly would be staied, calling and crying to the Consulto soilow upon them feeing they were discomitted. The horsemen were more eager, riding all about the Conful, and with open mouth cried out, that they would advance before the enigns. Whiles the Consul held off, in a mammering what to do, for as he was affured of the valour of his foundiers, so he little trusted the ground; they all at once set up a shout, that they would set forward, come what would: and as they cried, so did they in good earnest. And pitching their javelins saft in the ground, that they might more nimbly getup the fleep place, they took their full carreer, and ran up the hill. The Volicians having in their first brunt spent all their darts, and other shot which they had let flie, and made no spare, took up stones that layunder their seet, let drive at the Romans as they climbed up, and so thick and threefold they bestowed them, that they annoyed them L fore, and beat them down the hill. Thus the left wing of the Romans was well-near over-charged, had not the Comul at the point, when as they were ready to retreat, blamed them first for their rashness, and then for their cowardise, and made them for very shame to shake off all fear. First theystood to it stoutly, and kept their ground, and after, as their strength served them, confidering the vantage of the place which the enemies had gotten, they adventured to fet foot forward and won ground with a fresh shout and outcry. And taking their carreer again the second time, they strain all they can, and at length overcame the disadvantage of the place. Now when they were almost at the point to win the very pitch and ridge of the hill, the enemies turned back. Whiles they ran on heaps in disaray, both they that fled, and they that followed, hapned both at once in one company into the enemies Camp, which in that fright was won. The Volkians, as M many of them as could ekape, ran as fast as their legs would carry them to Antium. And to Antimm likewise was the Roman army conducted: and after a few daies siege, was surrendred upon no fresh and new force of affault, but for that presently upon their unfortunate conflict and loss of the Camp their heart were done, and utterly failed.

Fter the winning of Antium, T. Amilius and Q. Fakins were created Coniuls. This was that Fahrus that only remained alive of all the name that perished at Cremera, Now had Æmilius in his former Consulship perswaded to distribute certain Lands among the Commons. And therefore in this second likewise, both the savorers of the law Agraria were in good hope of the forefaid law: and also the Tribuns supposing verily that now by the help of a Coniul, that might be brought about and obtained, which oftentimes had been enterprised against the pleasure of the Consuls; took the matter in hand and gavethe attempt: and withal, the Conful Hill continued in the same mind. But the great landed men and many of the Nobles, finding themselves grieved, and complaining that the chief and head Magistrat of the City bussed D himself, with the Tribuns inits, and was by large giving away of other mens possessions, become popular and gracious with the people, turned the whole butthen and odious heavy load of this action, from the Tribuns upon the Conful his head. And a cruel broil was toward, had not Fabius, by a device and policy to neither party offensive, made an end of the matter with expedition. For whereas there were certain Lands gotten by conquest from the Volkians the year afore under the conduct of T. Quintius: "There might (faid he) a colony be brought to Antium, a City neer ad"joyning, very commodious, and leated by the Sea fide: fo should the Commons without any grudging or complaints of the possessor Land-lords, be seized of Land, and the City rest in quiet and Unity. This opinion of his was accepted of all hands. And they created three especial officers or Triumvirs for the division of the said lands, to wit, T. Quintins, Aul. Virginius, and E. P. Furius. Then proclamation was made, That whosover would hold any of the Land, should give up their names in writing. But plenty, as the manner is, foon caused lothing: for there were fo few that presented themselves, that to make up the full number of the inhabitants, they were fain to adjoyn unto them certain Volscians. The rest of the multitude had rather (as it seemed) to keep a calling for Land at Rome, than be possessed of Land elsewhere. The Æquians craved peace of Q. Fabius, who was come against them with an army: and they themselves by making a sodain intode into the territories of Lavium, cancelled the same and made it void. But the year next follinoge me the termiones of paramy, cancelled the latter and made it view being fent against the Equians, level a standing camp in the Country about Lavium, But by the reason of a contagious disease or a F plague, that raigned in his army, they were of necessiry forced to keep quiet within their tents. So their war was deferred unto the third year, when as Q. Fabius and T. Quintius were Confuls, And for almuch as Q. Fabius, had upon his victory before granted peace to the Equians, he had an extraordinary commission directed unto him for the rule of that Province. Who being thither gone with full affired hope, that the very fame of hiri, and noise of his army, would quiet the Equians, with full address of the Councel of that Nation, with this meffage: "Q. Fakins the Conful, faith, "that as he caried before peace from the Aquians unto Rome, fo he bringeth now war to the A-" quians from Rome; having now his (word in the very fame hand, which he gave unro them beof fore in friendly manner unarmed. Whose treathery it is and perjuty, that is the cause of this, the "Gods can witness now, and in some measure will revenge hereaster. Nevertheless, he for his Bart, however the case standard desireth that the Equians would yet bethink themselves of their own accord and repent rather than stand to the extremity and abide those calamities and mirefries that follow wars. If they would come in therefore and be fort for that they have done, their fulbinifion from d be received, and they take into the fafe protection of his clemency, whereof d'already they had experience. But in case they persist still in their disloyalty, and take pleasure in being fortworn; be they well affured that they should have the ire and wrath of the Gods more than their enemies to fight against them. These words so little or nothing at all moved any men there, that the very Embaffadors had like to have been very hardly used and evil entreated, yea, and an army withal was fent forth as far as Algidum against the Romans. When these tidings H were brought to Rome, the indignity of the thing and the shameful manner thereof, rather than any fearful peril otherwise raited the other Conful out of the City. So two Confular or royal armies approached the enemy in order of battail, ready to try it out prefently by the dint of fword. But the day being (as it fell out) welneer ipent, there cried one aloud from out of the place where the enemy kept ward: "This is to make a shew of war only (ye Romans) and not to war indeeds "ye set your battaillons in array against night forsooth, that now draweth hard on : we had need " of more daylight I wis, for the business in hand, and to try this quarrel. To morrow therefore "at Sun rifing, fee you come again into the field, ye shall have fighting fear not, your hands full. The fouldiers netled and galled at these words, retired back into the camp until the next day, I thinking the night was long, that kept them from battail and to for that time they refreshed their bodies with food and fleep. On the morrow fo foon as it was day the Roman hoft being flirring fomewhat more early, flood ready arranged in array: and at length the Æquians likewife shewed themselves in field. A sharp fight there was on both sides, by reason that both the Romansouldiers fought in anger and deadly hatred; and also the Æquians upon prickt conscience, that bare them witness how they embarked themselves into this danger, and were out of all hope ever to be trusted again, were forced to hazard all upon a cast, and venture the utmost. Yet were not the Æquians able to endure long, the violent fight of the Romans, but were discomfitted and put to flight. And being returned within their own Frontiers the unruly multitude for all this, were never the more inclined to peace, but reproved and blamed their Captains, "That they put the tryal K " of the issue to a set field, in which kind of fight the Romans had singular skill, and surpassed "them. As for the Æquians, they were better at robbing, spoiling, and foraging, in making in-"cursions and inrodes; and a better and safer kinde of service it was, here and there in sindry " places, to skirmish with forces divided, than reduce all into one gross army, and to pitch a field. Leaving therefore a guard to defend the camp, they went forth, and with such a tumult invaded the confines of Rome, that the very terror thereof reached unto the City. This flir, especially coming fo fodainly and unlooked for, made the Romans fear the more. For who would ever have doubted and suspected, that their enemies so lately vanquished, and in manner besieged within their own camp, could possibly think upon entring into the lands of others, and to drive booties. Befides, the ruftical peafants came in at the gates, crying, and faying. That they were not petty companies, and small handfuls of theeves and robbers, but (such was their foolish fear, augmenting and making everything greater) whole armies & legions of enemies were at hand, and marched apace with banners displayed full against the City. From their mouths, they that were next made report unto others. & as they heard news from they knew not whom, so they set them abroad they cared not how, but ever in the carriage they added formwhat of their own and covined lies good flore. Here was running there was crying al'arm & generally such a consusion every where as if the City had been quite loft. By good hap Quintius the Conful was returned from Algidum to Rome. That remedy cured all and frayed the fear. When the tumult was appealed, he rebuked the people for fearing those enemies whom heretofore they had vanquished, and placed good guards over the gates. Then he affembled the Senare, and by the authority and affent of the Nobles, proclaimed M Justitium, or a general cessation or vacation in all courts of law; and went himself forth in person with a power to defend the marches leaving Quintus Servilius Provost of the City: but the enemy he found not in the territory all about. The other Conful performed his affairs passing well: who having certain intelligence, which way the enemies would come, fet upon them laden with prey, and (by that means marching more heavily in diforder) made it a dear booty unto them, even afmuch as their lives were worth. For few of them escaped the Ambush, and all the pillage was recovered. So the return of Quintius into the City, made an end of the publick Lawstead, or abovefaid vacation which lasted but four dayes. Then was a Cense or Assessment set of mens goods, and a muster or view taken of the number of Citizens, together with a solemn purging of the people, called Lustrum, celebrate by Quintins. And there were numbred of Citizens 124214 polles, over and above men and women that lived single, or had no children, and all orphans besides. And among N the Aquians afterward nothing was done worth remembrance; for they betook them to their firong Towns, suffering their territory and villages to be consumed with fire, and spoiled. Thus the Conful, after he had divers times overrun the Country of his enemies, with a cruel army wasting and spoiling as he went, returned home to Rome with great honor and a huge booty. Then were Cost. Aulus Posthumius Albus, and Sp. Furius. Some have written them Fusi, who indeed are rightly named Furii. Which I note, left any man should think they were fundry men, whereas the variety is only in the name. No doubt there was, but that one of the Coff, would war with the Æquians: and therefore the Æquians fought for aide of the Ecetrane Volicians. Which being gladly granted and fent with speed, (such a perpetual hatred bare these Cities alwayes o against the Romans) there was great preparation for war in most forcible manner. The Herniks having an inckling and knowledge thereof, certified the Romans afore-hand, that the Ecetrans were revolted and banded with the Equians. The Colony Antiemlikewife was had in jealousy, for that when the Town was lost, many people fied from thence to the Æquians, who all the time of the Æquian war; served in the field, and proved the most hardy souldiers and fiercest of all others. And now when the Æquians were driven into their Towns, that

A multitude being slipt away and retired to Antium, withdrew from the Romans the allegeance of the Coloners and inhabitantsthere, who were arready of their own inclination unlound and not to be truled. But before the matter was come to ripenels, and they entired into any action, the Senate upon intelligence given that they intended only and were upon the point to revolt, gave the Coss, in charge to send for the chief men and head persons of that colony to Rome, and to enquire and learn of them in what terms A stiam (tood: who being come willingly enough, without any great intreaty, and convented by the Consuls before the Senate, made answer to their interrogatories in such manner, that they were lent away more suspected, than at their first coming: whereupon they refolved fully of war. Spurius Furius one of the Coff, to whom that R province by lot fell, having taken his voyage against the Aquians, sound the enemy spoiling and wasting in the territory of the Hernicks: and being ignorant what number they were (for that in no one place they were all discovered together) he rashly joyned battell, and hazarded his power, being in number and force inferior to the other. And at the fift encounter he was driven back, and retired into the camp: and yet was he not path all danger and infecurit, there: for both the night following, and the next day after, the camp was to streighty befor, and to horly affaulted, that he could not dispatch so much as a messenger from thence to Rome. The Herniks fent word both of the infortunate fight, and also how the Conful and his army were belieged. With which news they to terrified the LL, of the Councel, that they granted Post hamius the other Conful the folemn commission, l'o see to the State, that it sustained no danger and damage, .C The form of which order and decree, hath been alwayes accounted to fignify tome great extremity of the Common-wealth. And thought beth it was, that the Confus himself in proper perfon, should abide at home to enrol in the muster book, all those that were able to bear armes: that T, Quintins should be sent as Pro-consul or Vice consul, with a power of consederate Allies to taile the fiege and refeue the camp: and for the furnishing of this army, the Latines, the Hernicks, and Colony Antium, were commanded to fend unto Quimtus, Subitary fouldiers (for fo they termed at that time, the aids and supplies taken up in hast and on a sudden.) Many attempts were made, much skirmilhing, and fundry affaults for certain dayes on each fide were enterprised. For the enemies being more in number, assayed in divers places and fundry wayes to cut off and diminish the power of the Romans, as not sufficient and able to make head at all D turns, For at one time they both made an affault upon the camp, and withal ient out certain of their forces to wast the territory of Rome, yea, and to give the venture upon the very City, if they could elpie any good opportunity to offer it self. L. Valerius was lest behind to defend the City, and Posthumius the Consul was sent out to restrain and withstand the wasting of the marches. No point of care or travail on any hand was slaked, watch and ward both night and day was let in the City, a good Corps de guard appointed afore the Gates, and fouldiers beflowed upon the Walls: and (that which was needful in fogreat an hurlyburly) for certain dives it was no Term, or interdiction of Law was observed. In this mean while, Furius the Coss, who at the first had quietly endured the siege and made no resistance, suddenly and at unawares fallied out at the broad gate called Decumana, upon the enemies: and whereas he might E have chased them, he made some stay of that, for fear lest on some other side, they would have given affault upon the camp. But Farius the Lieutenant (who also was the Consul his Brother) engaged himself too tar, and upon a hot desire of pursuit and sollowing the chase, neither saw he his fellows as they retired, ne yet the enemies as they came to charge him on the back. Thus being thut out from all the refcue, after many essayes made (but all in vain) to make way through unto the camp, manfully fighting he was flain. The Conful likewise hearing that his Brother was environed all about with enemies, returned again to fight; but as he ran more rash'y than wazily into the midst of the skirmish, he was fore wounded, and being hardly and with much ado faved by those that were about him, he both disquieted and daunted F the hearts of his own men, and made his enemies more fierce, lufty, and couragious. Who were so animated and let on fire, both with the hurt of the Conful, and also with the death of his Lieutenant, that nothing alterwards could stand in their way: no for e was able to flay them, but that they beat the Romans again into their camp: where they were befieged afresh being now both in hope, and also for strength worse than they were before. So that their main State thus lying a bleeding, had utterly perisht, but that T. Quintius with a supply of strangers ; namely, a power of Latines and Hernikes, came to the retrue in time : who charging the Æquians behind, whiles they were wholly bused in assailing the camp, shewing them within the Lieutenants head in a great bravery and pride, at the same instant caused a fally out of the camp, by a signal that he gave them a far off, and so inclosed round about a great num-G ber of the enemies. Small mas the flanghter, but great was the flight and scattering of the Æquians in the territory of Rome: upon whom (firagling here and there and driving their booties afore them) Posthumius, who in divers convenient places had bestowed certain companies and bands of fouldiers, ran violently. And as they fled every way in diffray, they lighted upon Quintius as he with the hurt Conful returned with Victory. Then the Confus army bravely did their endeavour, and had a goodly day of them; and was revenged both for their Confuls wound, and also for the death of the Leutenant and the Squadrons with him. Many lofses and overthrows were given and taken on each side for certain dayes. But in so ancient a matter as this was, hard it is for a man upon his credit, to fet down precifely the certain num-H ber either how many fought, or how many were flain, Howbeit Valerius Antias boldly reckoneth the exact numbers, namely, that there died of the Romans in the Hernicks Country 5300, and of the Æquian robbers, who went up and down spoiling and pilling in the territory of Rome, were killed by A. Posthumius the Cos. 2400. The rest of the multitude, which laden with spoil fell into the hands of Quintius, were not to quir, nor escaped with the loss of so few mens lives: for of them the sword devoured 4000, and to account the number exactly, 200 (quoth he) and 30 just. Then returned they on all hands to Rome, and the forelaid vacation or law-seed ended. The skie was feen much on a light fire, and other strange wonders either appeared indeed, or presented to the searful people vain apparitions, and fantastical illusions. However it was, for to I avert the dangers by these prodigious and terrible tokens presaged, there were proclaimed festival holy dayes for three dayes together. During which time all the Churches were replenished with men and women, making supplications and prayers for the favor and mercy of the Gods. The bands and squadrons of the I atins and Hernicks, after great thanks given them by the senate for their good service in this war, were discharged and sent home. But the Antiate souldiers, 1000 in number, who after the battell was fought came tardy, and too late for to inccour, were difmissed in manner with ignominy and shame.

Then was the great Leet or affembly held, for the election of Magistrates: wherein L. Ebutius and P. Servilius were created Confuls: and on the * Calends of Sextilis (for on that day) began the year then, they entred their Confulship. A grievous and heavy time it was and as it fortuned, K a year of plague and great mortality, both in the City and Country, as well among brute bealts as men. And the receiving of the Country pealants with their cattel into the City, for fear of robbing and spoiling, encreased the contagiousness of the sickness so much the more. For that confuled medly of all forts of bealts, both annoyed and emposioned the citizens with the uncouth and unufual flink, and also flifled with fultry heat and overmuch watching the ruftical people, lying pettered together, and thrust up into close rooms and straight lodgings. The mutual recourse one to help and Minister unto another, and the very catching of the disease, set it all abroad. Thus whiles they had much ado to endure these present calamities, behold, to mend the matter, all of a suddain, the Hernick Embassadors bring word, that the Æquians and Volscians having levied a power joyntly together, were encamped within their limits: and from thence with a migh-L ty army wasted and destroyed their territory. Now, besides that the small assembly in the Senate-houle, was to these their allyes an evident token that the City was fore visited with the peftilence, they received also an heavy answer from them, namely; That the Herniks themselves together with the help of the Latins, should defend their own: as for the City of Rome, it was with the heavy hand and visitation of the Gods, dispeopled by the plague: but in case the fickness decreased in some measure and took up in any time, they would willingly aid their confederats, as they did the year before, and as they had done at all times besides. Thus departed these allies, and for their ill news they brought thither, they caried with them home again a worle answer and message, to wit, That they should by themselves sustain that war alone which hardly they were able to support; if they had the power of the Romans to affift them. Long stayed not the enemy in M the Hernicks countrey, but went forward from thence into the territory of Rome, defolate already (God wot) without the injury of war, and little need there was of calamity that wayes: where meeting with no man at all, no not fo much as any one unarmed, and patting overall the Country, disfurnished not only of Garrisons to resist, but also of people for husbandry and tillage, at length they came to the third stone, i. within three miles of Rome, to the broad port high way, called Gabina, leading to Gabes. The Roman Cof Ebatins, was now departed this life, and his brother Cof. Servilius, lay lingring on at the point of death, in small hope of recovery. Most of the peers and principal ancients were infected, and fick in bed, so was the greater part of the Nobles, and welneer all the ferviceable men of war: so as they were not able to set forth an expedition or voyage abroad, as meet was in so great a tumult, no nor scarce to keep any ordinary set guard at home $_{ m N}$ for the defence of the City. The Senators, such as age and fickness would permit, took the charge in proper persons of watch and ward. The Ædiles of the Commons went the round, and had the charge to fee all well & in good order to that upon them now reflect the government of the state, & the Majesty of the Consuls Regiment. Thus when all was forlorn no head to direct, no strength of man to execute; the Tutelar Gods, Protectors of the City, and the good fortune alone that ever waited upon her, preserved the main chance. This made the Volicians and Aquians to carry with them a mind and intent, rather to deal by way of robbings and spoilings, than in any hostile manner like professed warriors: for io imall hope had they, or none at all, of winning the City; io little heart fon uch as to approach the walls, that even the very roofs of houses, which they descried a far off, and the fight of the tombs and graves so neer at hand, turned their minds clean, and O daunted their courages. So as over all the camp they began to mutter with themselves, What they meant to spend time idly and sit still without spreading, in a wast and desart Countrey; within the mortality and putrified air and corruption, both of people and cattel; when as they might as well invade those parts that flood clear and sound, and namely the rich, plentiful, and fat fields of * Tufculum: and therewith fuddainly at once they plucked up their enfigns, and by crofs wayes * Val manume passed through the * Lavican countries, even to the mountains of Tusculum: and thither turned

A they the whole force and tempet of the war. In the mean featon the Herniks and Latins moved not with pity and compatition only, but also for very fname, in case they had neither withstood their common enemics, marching to Rome wirh a cruel army, nor relieved their belieged friends; joyned their powers together, and fet forward to Rome: where not finding the enemies, and following the bruit that went of them, and tracing their fresh tracks and sooting, they encountred them as they came downfrom the hilly Country of Tusculum into the vale of Alia: Where they made no saving bargain or it, but fought to their loss, to as their fidelity unto their allyes, had but bad succeis for that present. And in Rome there was no less mortality of citizens by the sickness, than there were Maffacres abroad of their allyes by the edge of the fword. For the other Conful. R who alone survived hitherto, now died. There left this life also, other noble perionages, M.Vacerius, Tum Virginius, Auguts: and Ser. Sulpitius the Curio Maximus. But among the bale and common fort, the violence of the disease raged and spread, I know not how far. The Senate now destitute of all help and comfort of man, moved the people to devotion, to their beads, and prayers unto the Gods. And commandmene was given to all men with their wives and children, to go in procession, to pour out their supplications, and crave mercy at Gods hands. Thus being by publick authority called forth to perform that which every man was forced unto by his own proper calamities, they filled all the Temples and Chappels. The Dames and an ient Matrons, lying groveling and tweeping the Church floors and pavement with their hair and treffes, hanging loole down, humbly belought pardon of the Gods, and an end once of the petillence. Whereupon, C were it that they had obtained the mercy of God, or that the more dangerous and contagious feafon of the year, was now well overpath; their bodies by little and little, having estaged the danger of dilease, began to recover and wax more healthy.

Then set they their minds about the care of the Common-weal, and after certain inter-reiens determined or ended, P. V. lerius Poplicol., the third day of his Interreign or Regency for the time, createth Confuls L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and I. Veturius Gemunus, ot Vetusius, whether ye will: who * three dayes before the Ides of Sextilis, began their Confulfhip, By which time the City was grown to firong again, that it was able not only to maintain a defensive war, but also to enter the field and affail others. When the Herniks therefore gave them advertisements that the enemies were passed over into their borders: they made no delay, but readily and willingly promiled their aid and levied two Consular armies. Veturius was fent against the Volicians, to begin with them and to war within their own Country. Tricipitinus was opposed in the Frontiers of their onfederates, to keep them from invation and wasting, and went no further forward than to the Herniks. Veturiss at his first encounter and confronting of his enemies, discomfited and put them to flight. But Tricipitinus whiles he lay still encamped in the marches of the Herniks, miffed of the army of the Robbers: which was conducted over the Mountains of Prenefles from whence they came down into the Champain, and spoiled the territories of Prenefte and Galles: and from then e they fetched a compais about unto the Mountains of Tusculum. The City of Rome likewise was put in great fear, rather upon the iodain occurrent of this alarm, than for any want of power to resist their violence. Quintus Fabius at that time was Provost or Pre-E sident of the City, who put the youth in armor, dispoled guards in places convenient, and made all fafe and in good security. The enemies therefore who had raised a booty out of the parts ad-joyning, durst approach no neerer, but cast about with their army and retired : and the further they went from their enemies City, to much the more careless they were, until they light upon the Col. Lucretius, who by his espials and scouts, was afore that time acquainted what wayes they would take, and was ready also to try battail. So with resolute and prepared hearts, they fer upon them, that with the sodain fear were amazed. And albeit they were in number sewer, yet they discomfited and put to flight a mighty multitude of them, and drave them within the hollow vallyes, where because they had no ready way to get out; they kept them inclosed on eyery side in such fort, that the whole name and nation welneer of the Volscians, there utterly pe-F rished. In some Chronicles I find that there were 13470 flain in the fight and chase, and 1250 taken Prisoners alive, and 27 ensigns or banners brought away. It may well be that the number perhaps doth somewhat exceed the truth, yet a great slaughter certainly there was. The Conful having atchieved this victory, and gotten a mighty great prey, returned into the same standing camp again. Then pitched both Confuls together, and the Volicians joyntly with the Æquians, rallied their Forces thus decayed and weakened, into one place, and made one entire army. This was the third field fought, in that one year; and by the same good Fortune the Romans wan the victory: and having vanquished the enemies, they were Masters also of the camp. Thus the City of Rome recovered her felf, and returned to her ancient good estate. But this happy success in war, immediatly flirred up civil troubles at home. C. Teremillus Arfa, for that year a Tri-G bun of the Commons, supposing in the absence of the Consuls, good opportunity was offered to c. Terentillus

"felves at their own liberty and unbridled, turned the edge of all streight and dreadful Laws; yea, H "and the rigor of all punishment, against the Commons. But less their licentionsness should "continue for ever, he was minded to prefer and publish a Law, by vertue whereof there should "be five men created, who should set down certain conditions, to limit and gage the authority " of the Coniuls: and look what authority and commission the people granted out over them, the " same should the Coniul exercise, and no more, and not sule of themselves, and use their own " will and licentions lust in stead of Law. This act being once published, and the Nobles searing, lest whiles the Coniuls were away, they should be taken down and yoked. Qain. Fabius Pretident of the City, affembled the Senate, who so bitterly and sharply inveighed against the Law and the Law-giver himself, that if both the Consuls themselves had stood about the Tribun of purpose I to contradict and crofs his proceedings, there had been no threats nor terrible menaces left for them, to have thundled out. " For he laid fore unto his charge, that he had lyen in wait and now "having spied the time to fit his purpose, had given the venture to affail the C.W. and the State. "And in case the Gods in their wrathful displeasure had sent among them such a Tribun as he the " year before, together with war and peffilence, there had been no remedy then, but he must have " had his way, and then they had been all undone. For when the Confuls both were dead, and "the City lay bed-rid as it were, in a milerable confusion of all things, he would have made laws "then indeed, to the utter abolishing of the Consuls authority out of the Common-wealth, and "been a ring-leader to Volscians and Æquians both, for to have affaulted the City. For what "might not he have lawfully done by vertue of his place? If the Confuls had either proudly or K " cruelly proceeded against any one Citizen, he might have entred an Action against them, and " convented them for tooth before those very Judges, of whom peradventure some one had been " by them hardly dealt withal. This would have been the course and end of it. And he that thus "did, should not cause the Consuls authority and rule, but the Tribuns power to become odious "and intollerable: which having been of late well quieted and reconciled unto the Nobles, began " now afresh to come unto the old biace, and to be troublesome again, Neither intreated he him "not to go on flill as he had begun. But ye my Mafters (quoth Fabius) that are the reft of the "Tribuns, we would request you to consider well this one point especially: That this power you "have, was brought in for the fuccour and relief of every particular perion, and not to the general " prejudice and undoing of all. Again, that ye are created Tribuns of the Commons, not enemies L of the Nobles. A heavy and lamentable case it is to us, odious and hateful unto you, and will "breed you much ill will and displeasure, in case the C. W. now forlorn, should thus be invaded "and affailed. Ye shall lose nothing of your own right, I assure you, nay, you shall avoid much " mislike and hatted of men, in case ye be in hand and deal with your brother Tribun, to put off "this matter and defer it wholly until the Confuls coming. Why, the very Æquians and Volici-"themselves the last year, when both our Consuls were dead of the plague pressed not hardly up-" on us, to projecute any proud and cruel war against us. So, the Tribuns communed and perswaded with Terentillus: and this his commenced suit or action being adjourned in outward shew, but in very truth let fall quite and disamilled, the Consuls forthwith were sent for home, Lucrehis very fift coming wan himlest more glory, by laying abroad in Mars field all the prizes, that every man for three dayes space might know his own and have it away. All the rest, that had no owners to come forth and make claim, was fold in port-fale. By all mens confent, the Conful was thought worthy of triumph: howbeit that matter was put off by reason that the Tribun had not yet done with his law: which was the thing that the Conful thought meet should be first regarded. The matter was debated and treated for certain dayes, both in the Senate and also before the people. At last the Tribun yeelded to the Majesty of the Conful, and gave it over. Then was due honor rendred both to the General and also to the army accordingly. He triumphed over the Volicians and Æquians: and in his triumph his own legions followed after him. To the other Conful granted it was that he should in a kind of triumph called Ovatio, ride into the City, but N without his fouldiers. The year next enfuing, the Law Terentilla was by the whole Colledge or fellowship of the Tribuns revived and propounded again: which put the new Consuls P. Volumnius and Ser, Sulpitius to sometrouble, And in the same year the skie seemed to be on a light fire, and there was an exceeding earthquake. And that which the year afore was no credit given unto, was now for truth believed, to wit, That a Cow did speak. Among other strange wonders it rained flesh: during which showre, a huge number of fowls flew among, and were reported to have inarcht it and carried it away as it was in falling. But that which fell down and escaped their tallons, lay feattered here and therefor certain dayes in such fort, as the sent changed not at all, nor the fleth one jottaken and corrupted. Then the books (of Sibilla) were perused by the Duumvirs deputed over matters of Religion: who fore-told of some dangers to ensue by a Company O of strangers, and gave warning to look lest haply some assault should be made upon the highest places of the City, and thereof a flaughter and maffacre enfue. Amongst the rest, warning was given to abiliain from civil discord and mutinies: which the Tribuns found fault with, as a devised matter to hinder the law. Whereupon great debate and contention was like presently to grow. But behold, (that the revolution and course of troubles might turn about every year to the same point,)The Herniks bring news that the Volkians had Æquians for all their wings were well clip-um lay the whole weight and importance of the affairs, and all depended upon it: That the Antiat coloners held their councels and had their meetings in open show, at Ecetra, but Amit me was the principal feat of the war, and from thence came all preparations and forces whatloever. As soon as these news were reported in the Senate, order was given to muster souldiers; and that the Confuls should part between them the administration and managing of his war, so as the one should have the charge against the Vosscians, and the other against the Aquians. But the Tribuns rung it out openly in the common Hall before the people, "That this was but a made mat-"ter of the Volician war, and a tale devised by the Herniks, who were suborned and framed to B " play their parts in the Pageant, and to serve the turn of the Nobles. And that now verily the felves against "freedome of the people of Rome was not oppressed or endangered by plain prowels & vertice, the Nobility, "but finely shifted off and dallied cunningly withal, by flye and crafty inventions. And for asmuch "as now it was an unlikely thing and incredible, that the Volicians and Aquians after fo great "flaughter committed upon them, whereby they were all in a manner killed up, should be able of "themselves to wage war, there were, for footh new enemies sought out: A faithful Colony near "adjoyning, was now flandred and defamed: war war pretended for a shew against the guiltless "and innocent Antiats, but in truth, intended with the very Commons of kone, whom they "means to drive out of the City in all hafte headlong, furcharged with heavy armor, and to (by " turning out their poor fellow citizens into bathshment, and sending them away, God knows C. " whither) to be a length of the Tribuns. And thus the Law (lay the Tribuns, for they "mult think their drift is to this end and to none other) should be troden under foot, unleis whiles all is entire and whole, and nothing done, whiles they remain at home in their houses, " whiles they be in their gowns, they take heed and look well about them, that they be not dif-" possessed of the City, and take the yoke of servicinde upon their necks: assuring them that if "their hearts only served, they should want for no help: and that all the Tribuns agreed and were " of one mind, that there was no cause of ear abroad, no forrain war to trouble them: last of all, "that the very providence of the Gods the year before affured them that their liberty might with " fafety be desended. These and such like Remonstrances gave the Tribuns out. On the other part, the Consuls causing their chairs of estate to be set, even in their sight and presence, began to number. hitherranthe Tribuns down in all haft, and drew the whole affembly of people with them. And, to make as it were a proof and tryal, some few by name were called, and straightwayes began a tir. For whomtoever the Sergeant by the Conful his commandment arrefted the Tribuns charged again that he should be let go. And neither side contained within the limits and compais or their commission and rightful authority but presumed of their might and strong hand, to attain unto their defired purpose. For even as the Tribuns had demeaned themselves in forbidding the muster, semblably the Senators bestirred themselves to stop the law for going forward: which was propounded every Court day, and when the people might affemble. And evermore the brawl began, when the Tribuns commanded the people to avoid the Hall, for that the Patritij would not endure thus to be fet out and excluded. Few or none of the ancients would E be present at these troublesome stirs, being such as were not to be managed and ordered by sage Councel, but wholly left to the rathness and boldness of young and green heads. The Consist also were much abient, and forbare to be in place, for fear left in fuch a confused hurliburly their Majefty and dignity, might have been subject to some shameful contumely and disgrace. But there was among them one Cafa Quintius, a lufty young Gentleman and a flout, in regard both of his noble parent age, as also of the goodly tall personage and strength of his body. Besides these good parts that God had bestowed upon him, he had won himself many ornaments by fundry exploits atchieved in wars: He had withal an eloquent speech and a good grace at the bar, so as, in one word, throughout the whole City, there was not one thought to be more ready in tounge, or taller of his hands. This Cafe standing in the midst of the Nobles, higher to be seen above all the F rest, as one that in his speech and strength, carried afore him the countenance and authority of all Dictators and Confuls, was the only man that bare off the brunes of Tribuns, and florms of the the other Tribuns befides were herewith difmayed and welnear daunted. Aulus Virginius alone, being one of their fellowship, was so bold, as to enter an action against Cafo, of a capital crime.

By which deed of his, he rather fixed, than feared his hot and furious nature. For fo much the more eagerly withstood he the Law, coursed and troubled the Commons, and persecuted the Tri-ftill, and with many outrages to kindle more coals of ill will, and hatred upon his own head, and to minister surther matter of crimes to be charged with. And all the while he ceased not to prefer the Law aforefaid, not fo much of any hope to bring it to pass, as to provoke and set on work, the giddy head and humorous vein of Cafe. Whereby it came to pais, that many follies oftentimes were committed both in word and deed, by the yonger fort: and evermore the blame light upon poor Cafe: he atone was atwayes charged, because he had been once suspected. But nevertheless

G buns as it were with open war. The plaintiffe in the mean time, suffered the defendant to run on common people. Many a time were the Tribuns driven out of common Hall, the Commonalty cafe Quinting defeated and put to flight by the conduct of this Captain. Who oever came within his reach, a bitter adverwas fure to go away throughly beaten, and clean stripped. So as it evidenly appeared, if this fary of the law course might have been allowed, the law had soonbeen checked and overthrown. Now when all Termilla.

hee gainlayed and croffed the Law. And Aulus Virginius ever and anon would entertain the Com- H mons with these and such like speeches, "See ye not already (quoth he) O Quirites, that ye may "not now have Cafe your Citizen, and the law which you dehre both togetner, But what mean "Ito speak of your Law? It is your liberty that he intringeth and setteth himself against, and in " pride and arrogancy he exceedeth all the Tarquins that ever were, But wait, ye were beflyuntil " he be made a Conful or Dictator, whom ye see already, being but a private person to bear him-"felf fo greatly of his firength and boldness, as to Lord it over you, and rule as a King, Many foothed the Tribune and faid the like, adding moreover, how they had been well knocked and beaten at his hands : and were forward enough of themselves to set the Tribine on, to proceed in his commenced action against him.

Now was the law day of judicial trial come : and it seemed abroad, that all men verily thought that the very foundation of their liberty confifted in the condemnation of Cufo. In conclusion, driven he was with much indignity and shame, to creep and crouch unto every man, submissively craving their favor one after another. There seconded him his kinssolk and peerest friends, the bett men of the City. Titus Quintius Capitolinus, who had been thrice Conful, spake in his behalf: and after he had reckoned up many honors and dignities, both of his own, and also of his family, affirmed, that neither in the house and race of Quintii, nor yet throughout the City of Rome, was ever feen to great towardness, no such shew and likelihood of ripe and percect vertue and prowels as in Cafo: faying, that he had been first his souldier, and served under him, and that with his own eys he had seen him oftentimes fight valiantly hand to hand with his enemies in the field. Again K Sp. Fusius made this good report of him, That upon a time, when himself was in great dittress and extremity, Cafo was fent unto him from Quintius Capitolinus, to help at a pinch: and that there was no one man, by whose good service, as he thought, the Weal-publick at that time was more relieved and restored, then by his. L. Lucretius the Consul last year before glittering in his bright glory to fresh and new, joined with the rest, avowing Caso partaker, with him in his praise-worthy acts: he recounted his brave combats, rehearfed his noble exploits, both in his rodes and voiages, and also in the pight field: advising & counselling them, that in any hand they would retain him still for to be a Citizen of their own City, rather then of any other, this excellent young gentleman, furnished with allgood gifts of nature and fortune, like to prove a singular stay of the publick affairs, into what City and State foever he should come. As for that heat and hastineis (quoth he) L which was in him misliked and offensive, age and time would dayly diminish, and bereave him of it: grave and fage counfel, which now was wanting, would come on apace every day more then other. Seeing therfore his faults waxed old and faded his vertues now were in their growth, flourished, and grew ripe unto persection; they should permit so brave, so rare a person, to live fill among them, and be a good old man in this their City. His father among the rest, L. Quintius, furnamed Cincinna'us, went another way to work: who not by iterating fill his prailes, for fear of heaping more matter of envy and repine, but craving pardon for his wildness and youthful demeanor; belought them for his fake at least wife, to give the ion as a present to his father, who neither in word nor deed had ever offended any person. Some took no heed and gave a deaf ear to his prayers, either for modesty and reverence, or for sear. Others complaining how they and M theirs had been beaten and hardly used at his hands, bewraied and shewed plainly by their shrewd and churlish answers what their judgment was, Besides, the common mislike and malice conceived against the desendant, there was one perilous matter and crime above all, that touched him very neer. And that was this : M. Volscius Fittor, who certain years before had been Tribune of the Commons, came in against him as a witness, and deposed, how that not long after the plague was in the City, he hapned upon a company of youths as they made a riot and robbery in the Subarra: where there arose a brawland fray, in which his elder brother, a man welin years, and not throughly recovered of his fickness, was with a buffet with Cafe his fift fell'd to the ground, and lay there for dead : so as he was fain to be had home between mens arms; and as he deemed, of that blow he died : yet might not he as hainous as the fact was, bring his action and prosecute N the law, for fear of the Confuls of these last years, As Volscius thus informed, the whole court was moved therewith, in so much that Ceso escaped hardly, from being murdered, in that rage and sury of the people. Then Virginius commanded to lay hold on the man, and to have him away to prison. The Paritii again by force refisted force, T. Quintus cried out. That he who was under arrest for to make his appearance, and answer at a day for his life, and who shortly should come to histrial and be judged, ought not before fentence of condemnation, and before he had pleaded for himself, thus violently be missified. The Tribune replied again, That his meaning was not to punish him before he were condemned : howbeir, by his leave he would be so bold as keep him fast in prison, to be forth-coming at the law day; that he who had killed a man, might suffer therefore, according as the people of Rom: should award, Then were the Tribunes called un-O to for their help, who by the means of an indifferent decree then made, shewed their lawful favours with speed. By vertue whereof they forbad expresly, that he should not be imprisoned, but pronoun ed that it was their wil and pleasure, that the defendant should personally appear, and a piece of money be promised unto the people, in case that he made default and failed of his appearance. Much question there was what sum of money should be thought reasonable to be promiled. And the matter was put over to the Senate to be decided: and whilst the Senators sate

A thereupon, the defendant was kept still in ward within the common Hall. At length they thought chereupon, the derengant was kept timin ward warming common training transporting and soo * Afles, good and fet it down, that he should put in surecises. And they bound each surecy in 3000 * Afles, * 9 lb 7. B.6. good and ter it upwing a series band, was left to the will and difference of the Tribuns, who defer the many of these should put in band, was left to the will and difference of the Tribuns, who defer the many of these should be series as the series of the many of the series of the many of the series of the many of the series of the seri affigned and determined ten and no more. With formany furcties the plaintiff bound the defendant perionally and peremptorily to appear at his day. This man was the first Roman that went under special bail, and put in good pledges to make his publick answer. Thus being enlarged our of the common Hall and diffinited, the next night following, unawares to the Conful, he departed to the Tukans into exile. When the day of this judgement was come, and that it was alledged for his excule, That he was out of the town, and gone into banishment: yet nevertheless B. Virgimus assembled the people about this matter: but his fellow Tribunes being called unto for their help, difmiffed the Court and licensed every man to depart. But the foresaid money was cruelly exacted at his fathers hands, fo that he was driven to fell up all that ever he had, and for a long time to live apart as a person confined, on the other ride of Tyber, in a poor blind cottage out of the way. This proceis of judgement, and the preferring of the law abovefuld together, bufied the City and kept it occupied. Quiet they were for any wars abroad. At what time the Trithere is the Conquerers, seeing the Nobles appalled at the banishment of Cel_2 , supposed now their law was in manner fully established and enacted. And for as much as the more ancient Senators had dispossessed themselves, as it were, of the Common-weal, and medled not for their own parts with the State: the younger fort, and fuch especially as were of Caso his crue and ac-C quaintance, were kindled the more against the Commons, and abated not their courage: marry, this good thereby was done upon them, that in some measure they tempered and ruled their furious affections and violent outrage. The first time after the exile of Ceso, that the law began again to be proposed, they being well appointed and banded together, backed also with a mighty company of their triends and favorities, fetupon the Tribunes: taking the occasion when they charged them to depart out of the hall, in fuch manner, that no one of them above his fellows was fingular, or carried home with him any special praise or blame more then another: but the Commons complained that for one Ceso, there were now start up a thousand. All the days between, wherein the Tribunes medled not with their law, none more quiet, none more peaceable then they themselves. Contreously they would falute and speak unto the Commons, at all other times D they would invite them home to their houles and make them good cheer, affift them and be prefent with them in the common Hall, suffer the Tribunes themselves without any interruption or impeachment to keep their courts and hold their affemblies whatfoever: shewing themielves at no time to any of them either publickly or privately fierce and cruel, but only when they went in hand with the law, for otherwife the young Gendemen were popular enough. And not only in other causes made the Tribunes good dispatch, and went quietly through all their businessesbut of the fame men were chosen again for the next year following without any foul and cross words for far were they from being offered any forcible violence: and thus by fort handling and gentle dealing, they had now by little and little won the Commons, and made them as it were cometo hand. And lo by these fine setches and devices, for one whole year the law was shifted off, and E prettily avoided. The City being now in more quietsfate, C. Claudius the ion of Appins and P. Valevius Poplicala, came to be Confuls. And no news this new year: for the same care still, either about preferring or admitting the law, held the City occupied. As much as the puny Nobles infinuated themselves more into the favour and samiliarity of the Commons: so much more eagerly again on the other fide, did the Tribunes labour and endeavor with complaints and flanders, to bring them into suspicion and jealousse with the Commons; Saying, that there was a compiracy intended and contrived that Cafo was in Romet that there were plots laid to murder the Tribuns, and to massacre the Commons: that they were set on work by some great ones, even the Ancients of the Nobles, utterly to abolish the Tribunes anthority out of the C. W. and to bring and reduce the City to the same pals again, as it had been before the taking and keeping hold in the

was and to duly once every year it came about:) yea and with all, another mitchief newly fprung. A rabble of banished persons, Outlaws and Bondslaves, to the number of 4500 having to their The Opini Captain one Ap. Herdonius a Sabin, surprised in the night the Capitoll and Cattle, and were ma-farprised by figes thereof. Who immediately killed in the caftle as many as would not be of their confpiracie & Staves and take armes with them. The reft-amid this hardburde ran headlone down into the Market place for Outlans. take armes with them. The rest amid this hurliburly ran headlong down into the Market place for fear. The alarmy was given on all hands: and no cry heard but Arme, Arme, the enemies are in town. The Confuls were afraid to put the Commons in arms, and they doubted also to let them be unstried, not knowing what fudden occurrent this should be, that thus had entred and posses G fed the city: whether it were fortaign or domestical, arising from the malice and hatred of the people, or from the treachery and fallhood of their fervants; Yet they devised to appeare the uproar; and as they were buse to repressit, the more other-while they stirred up new: for the frighted and amased multitude, could not be ordered by any commandment. Howbeit at length they refolved to fuffer them to take arms, and not all in general, but only (for that they knew not what their enemies were) to have a fufficient and trofty guard about them, ready at all affayes and dangers what soever. In this careful suspence and doubt, who were their enemies, and what their number was, they passed the rest of the night, disposing strong watch and ward in all meet H and convenient places of the City. But the day light discosed the war and the Captain thereof. Appins Herdonius from out of the Capitol proclaimed freedom to all bondmen that would come and follow him: " taking upon him for footh to defend the cause of most miserable caitifs: " namely, to restore home again unto their native country all such exiled persons, as had been wrongfully expelled, and alto to take away the heavy yoke of flavery and bondage. Which "thing he could wish it might be effected and brought about with the good will and helping "hand of the people of Rome. But in case there were no hope & comfort there, then he would al-6 fav the Volf ians and Æquians, yea, and procure what means he could, by all hard couries and " extremities what loever. Now the Nobles and Coss, began to see more into the matter: and T besides those dangers that were in view, and presently threatned, they seared some practise from the Veientians or the Sabins: and left, there being already fo many enemies in the City, the legions and Tuscans should combine together, and come upon them. Over and besides, left their old enemies and perpetual, the Volkians and Aquians should now at once, not, as aforetime, invade their borders and drive booties, but give an attempt upon the very City, which was already in some part, taken and possessed by enemies. Many and fundry were their sears. But of all other the dread and jealouly of their own bondflaves presented unto them most imminent and present danger: for fear, lest every man harboured his enemy at home in his own house, whom neither he could trust securely, nor yet mistrusts without some jeopardy: searing left being once discredited, he might prove the more malicious and bent to do a mischief. And to such streights they were driven, that with all their concord and agreement, they hardly were able to remedy the matter, and to stop the extremity. So greatly the future troubles like to enfue, exceeded those that presently appeared and were in fight, that no man feared either Tribuns and Commons. That mild and gentle kind of malady, in comparison of others, and rising alwayes by occasion of rest from all other, feemed then by reason of a forrein terror, stilled clean and brought asleep. And yet fee, that was the only thing in a manner that lay hardest upon them, ready to bear down to the ground their state, which now began already to shrink and reel. For so suriously and mad-Iv were the Tribuns bent, that they stiffy would stand to it, and bear men in hand, That it was no war, but a vain illusion and colour of war, and no other, that had seised on the Capitol; for nothing else but to withdraw the minds of the Commons from intending and following their r Law: and that a fort of clients, followers, and favorirs of the Nobility and Gentry were gathered together, who if they might once perceive that the Law were passed, and that all the itir they had made, took no effect, would flip away foon and be gone, in more filence I wis, than they thither came. Whereuponthey called the people away from their armor and weapons, and fummoned them to an affembly, to go through with their Law and Enact it now or never. In the mean time the Cost, held a Councel fearing a greater mischief like to ensue from the Tribuns, than the enemies had wrought in the night feason. And when word was brought that arms were laid away, and that the people had abandoned their quarters wherethey were fet inguard, then P.Val. leaving his collegue to keep the Senat together, departed hastily out of the Court & went straight into the Temple to the Tribuns."What work is here my Masters (quoth he) youthat are Tribuns? M. "Are ye about to overthrow the State indeed, under the conduct of Ap, Herdonius? and who was on notable to folii it and do any thing with your bondflaves and fervants, was his hap fo good as to "corrupt and inveigle your felves? Is this your pleasure and to your good liking, whiles the enemy is over our heads, to have our armor laid afide, and laws preferred? Then turning his speech to the whole multitude: If ye take no regard nor care (O Quirites) of the City, if ye pals not for your " felves yet have some reverence, and stand in sear of the Gods of your native country, which by "your enemies are now taken Prisoners and captivate: Inp. Opt. Max, that most bountiful and Al-"mighty God, Queen Juno and Minerva, with all the rest of Gods, Goddesses (and heavenly "wights) are befieged: Outlaws and bondflaves are encamped about your Tutelar Gods, and have in possession the Protectors and Patrons of your City. Is this, think ye, the form of a wise "and well governed City? is it in good case indeed and as it ought to be? So many enemies not "only within the walls, but also aloft upon the cliff within the Castle, overlooking and comman-"ding both Hall and Court: and all the while, the people affemble in the Hall, Senators fit in "Court like as when we enjoyed peace and were at reft: the Senator he delivereth his opinion at "the Councel boord: the citizens of Rome besides, are busy in their scrutinies and giving their "voyces. And had it not been more meet and decent that both Nobility and Commonalty, Con-"fuls and Tribuns God and Man, all armed together, should let to their he'ping hand, should " run up into the Capitol to deliver, save, and set in quiet that most starely and sacred house of Jup. "Opt. Mav.? O Father Romulus, vouchfafe, I befeech thee, that mind and that courage unto thy incceffors and posterity, whereby sometime thou didst recover and win again this sottress from O "these same Sabins, betrayed and lost by corruption, and for a sum of gold: command them to en-"ter even that way which thou first ledst, and thy valorous army followed after. Lo, I the Con-" int, so far forth as a mortal man possibly may, will sollow thee an immortal God, and thy sooter sleps. The conclusion of his speech was this, That as he put himself in arms, so all the Romans shall do the like. And in case any man went about to hinder this he would without regard of Confuls rule and dignity, or Tribuns authority & might, pais for no facred or inviolable laws: but what

A or wherefoever he were, in Capitol, in market place, all as one, take him for an enemy, and deal accordingly, Let the Tribuns (for almuch as they forbad to take arms against Ap, Herdonius) command hardly, and spare not, to arm against P. Valerius the Consul: It should be well seen that he would dare and do that by the Tribuns, which the first of his house and name sometime had done by the KK. A great broil was toward, and no other like, but that they would have gone together by the ears, and that the mutiny of the Romans, would have been a goodly spectacle to the enemies for to behold. But all this while, neither could the law be preferred, nor the Conful go up into the Capitol. The night at length stayed these brauls begun, and husht all. The Tribuns fearing the armed forces of the Confuls, yeelded to the darkness of the night, and gave over. Now

B when the principal Authors of the discord were once gone out of the way, The Nobles went about to the Commons, intruding themselves into their companies as they were met in knots together: where they would enter into talk and discourse with them, according to the present occasions and the time, admonishing them to take heed into what danger they brought the State. "For almuch as now (quoth they) it is not a matter of debate between the Senators and Com-"mons: but both Senators and Commoners, the Caftle and strongest hold of the City, the Tem-" ples of the Gods, their houses both publick and private, were ready to be yeelded unto the enemies. Whiles these things were a practifing in the common place, for to appeale the diffention the Consuls for fear, left the Sabins or the Veientians, enemies both, should stir and rife, were gone to the gates, and all about the walls. The same night came tidings also to Tusculum of the

C taking of the Cassle, the surprising of the Capitol, and likewise of the troublesome State wherein the City flood. At that time was L. Mamilius, Dictator of Tusculum: he forthwith called a Senate together, brought in the Meffengers of the forefaid news, and thought it very expedient and "needful not to wait until there came Embafladors from Rome to crave their aid: for that the "present peril it self alone, the urgent necessity, their social Gods, and the saithful bond of league, required no less at their hands, than to lend luccour: adding moreover, that the Gods would " never give them the like occasion and opportunity again, to gratify the Romans; to bind and esting unro them by a found benefit and pleasuredone, formighty a City, and so neer a neigh-6 bour. Whereupon it was decreed, to relcue them with all fpeed. The able men of fervice were taken up and enrolled, munition and armor given them in their hands; who advancing toward D Rosse by break of day, seemed a far off to be enemies, and were taken for the Æquians or Volscians. But afterwards, when this foolish fear was overblown, they were received into the City: and marched down in order of battell to the market place. Where, at the very same time Pub. Palerius having left his fellow Conful to guard and fortify the gates, was fetting his men in array.

The authority of the man had prevailed with the people, for he promifed and affored them, that if the Capitol were once recovered, and the City set in quiet, if they would suffer him to be informed what fraudulent and secret mischief was underhand practised by the Tribuns under colour of this Law, he would in remembrance of his anceffors, and of his furname (which in re- * Popliale) gard of the affectionate love unto the people, by a special care, as it were by inheritance from his forefathers, was recommended unto him) not hinder and trouble the meetings and affemblies of Effectiathers, was recommended unto hum) not bunder and trouble the meetings and attempties of the Commons, not crofs and thwart their proceedings. They followed him therefore as their Captain, gain-fay the Tribuns whist they could for all would not ferre? advanced forward, and marched up against the rising of the Capitol Hall. The Triculan Legion stuck following the control of them, and followed after. Citizens and Associates both did their best, and strove who should regain the Capitol first, and have the honor of that day, Each Captain exhorted and encouraged his men. Then began the enemies to fear, and wift not well what to truft unto, but onlytthe littuation of And toggin the Commiss and their allies feeing their fear, came forgyard and advapsed their Standards against them. When all was appealed and in quiet, the Tribuns were earlight with the Nobles to perform coin the burth the promile of b. And in what danger we had flood of those nations, in case "they had known that the Capitol was in the hands and possession of outlaws, better it is to guels N to by that which is past, than to try indeed by present experience. The Consul his Oration moved "and galled the Commons. The Nobles took heart; and were in a good belief, that the world was "well mended, and the state better reformed, The other Cos, more hearty to follow than to lead, and who was well content that his fellow had broken the ice before, and taken in hand to deal first in so weighty a matter, willingly challenged unto himself the charge to perform the part and office of a Conful, in the execution and accomplishment of those delignments. But then the Tribuns made a game therat, and letting light at the Conful his words, inferred again and demanded how the Confuls would lead out an army, and no man fuffer them to muster fouldiers. Marry (quoth Quintins) we need no mustering at all : for, at what time as P. Valerius armed the Commons to recover again the Capitol, they were all sworn unto him, and took their oath in this form, To affem- O ble together at the Consul his commandement, and not depart from their colours without his leave and licence. We will and charge you all therefore, that have taken this oath to prefent your felves to ing how when they took that military Sacrament, Quintius was but a privat person. There was not as yet, that neglect & contempt of the Gods entred into the world, which now reigneth every where and is so rise: neither did men interpret their oaths, and construe laws, to serve their own

A purpose, but rather attempered and framed their lives and demeanour thereunto. The Tribunes therefore, feeing no hope to hinder the thing, began themselves to treat about fetting forward the army: and the rather, because there ran a rumour abroad, that the Augurs were commanded to attend at the lake Regillus: and that by them a place should be hallowed and consecrate there, wherein the Confuls might duly commune and confer with the people, concerning all matters, according to the flight of birds: to the end that whatioever at Rome had passed under a law, extorted by the violent force of the Tribunes; the same might there in a lawfull assembly and generall Selfion, be abrogated & made void by the suffrages of the souldiers, who without doubt would accord to that, which should stand with the Confuls pleasure. For by reason that there was no B appeale in force without the city, above one mile, the Tribunes themselves also, if they came this ther, should be subject as well as the multitude besides of the people, to the commandment of the Confuls. These matters scared them indeed and put them in a bodily fear, but the greatest thing above all the reft that diquieted their hearts was this, that Quintim oftentimes had given out and faid, that he would not call an affembly of the people for the election of Coff. for that the city was grown fo far out of frame and temper, that it might not be reformed and cured with ordinary and uluall remedies : but that the Common-wealth had more need of a Dictator that who foever went about to trouble the state of the city, might well know that there was an absolute Dictatorthip, that checked all appeales. The Senat was affembled at that time in the Capitoll; thither came the Tribunes with their Commons greatly disquieted and troubled. The multitude cried Court and belought one while the Confuls of their favour, another while the LL, of the Senat of their protection; but could not once remove the Conful from his opinion (such a pitch had he taken) before the Tribunes gave their word and faithfull promife, that they would be wholly ruled and ordered by the Senators. Then the Conful propounded the demands and petitions of the Tribunes and Commons, and the Senat enacted these orders and decrees. First, that neither the Tribunes should that year prefer their law : nor the Consuls lead out of the city any army. Item, from thence forth, the Senat deemed it not to stand with the weal publick, that Magistrats should continue still in place from year to year, and that the same persons should be more then once chosen Tribunes. The Confuls for their part, were overruled and ordered by the Senators. But, fav and gainfay what the Confuls would, the fame Tribunes were chosen anew : and the Nobles also D because they would not be one ace behind hand with the Commons, would need schoole L. Quintins likewise for their Conful again, But all the year through was not the Conful more earnest and vehement in any action and speech whatsoever then in this. Should I marvell my Lords of the Councell (quoth he) that you bear no stroke with the Commonalty, and your authority is so little The oration of worth among? Why, you, even your own felves fet light thereby: feeing, for footh, the Commons L. For it is a point of much more lightness " and vanity, I assure you, for men to disanull the acts and decrees of their own making, then of E "others. Ye that be Senators and Fathers of the C.W. imitate, and spare not, the ignorant, lewd "and inconfiderat multitude: ye that should give good examples to others, fin ye hardly your " (elves, and do amiss by the precedent of others; neither then let others by your example do well: at fo long as I, for my part, take not after the Tribunes, nor fuffer my felfe to be declared Collagainft "an express act of the Senat, As to you, O Claudins, I would exhort you, that both your felf would er restrain the people of Rome of this their licentionineis, that thus they have not their desire, and " also that you would perswade your self thus much of me, that so far off will I be from thinking "my honour by you impaired, that rather I will take my glory to be increased by the despiting and "refuting of a dignitie, and the ill will and envy abated and diminished, that might grow upon the "continuation thereof Whereupon both the Confuls jointly together made an edict and proclama-F tion, that no man should by his voice nominate Quintins, Conful: and if any man did, they would not allow of his election. So there were created Confuls. Q. Fabins Vibulanus the third time, pected to rebel. Yet hardly could the Tribunes be brought to agree, that preparation should be made G aforehand to prevent this war. But upon these news, the Confuls parted between themselves the charge of all affairs. Fabius was appointed to lead forth an army to Antium: and Cornelius, to abide at Rome for the defence of the city, for fear lest tome part of their enemies, as the Equians man-* Lago de Praj. morrow, with your armour, at the lake of * Regillus without fail. Then the Tribins began to cavil fo de de S. The Hernicks and Latines, were by vertue of the league, charged with the finding of certaine founders, so as the whole army should confist of ij. parts of confederats and one third of citizens. When, at the day appointed the Allies were come, the Conful pitched down his stents without the gate Capena: from whence when he had taken a generall multer and purged his armie, he marched towards Antium

ent writers. I dare not avouch it for a certaine truth. Nobles in fear : for the Tribunes cried out that this was cautelous and fraudulent dealing, thus to keep the armies abroad, for nothing els but to disappoint them for publishing the law. Yet nevertheleffe, fince they had begun it, they would not give over, but go through with it and fee an end. Howbeit P. Lucretim, prefident of the city for the time, prevailed thus much with them, That all Tribunitian actions should hang & be deferred unto the coming of the Consuls. There was besides *Treasurers of a new occasion arole of tresh trouble. A. Cornelius and Quintus Servilius * Questors, gave N Generall Re. summons to M. Volleiss to make his answer at a day, who laid to his charge that he without ceivers of the all doubt, had born falle witnesse against Cafe. For by many presumptions and evidences it appeared, that neither Volfeins his brother, from the first time that he fell fick and took his bed, was at any time feen openly in the streets, or so much as to have sit up, and mended any whit, but of that ditease which held him many months, he languished and consumed away to death: nor about that time, wherein the deponent supposed the deed was done, was Caso once seen at Rome: it being plainly affirmed and proved by those who served together with him in the wars, that he was ordinarily all the time fighting under his colours as well as they, without any pasport or licence to depart. And to make this good, many there were that of themselves privatly challenged Volleins, and offered to traverie the law and to be tried by any indifferent and competent judges. But when as he durst not abide the triall and to be judged, all these things put together and to contonant one to the other, made men doubt no more of the condemnation of Folfeius then of Cafe, which was grounded upon the bare teltimony of Volfcius. The Tribunes were only the stay; who faid plainly they would not fuffer the Questors to hold any fessions or judiciall court. for the trial of the defendant, before they had a folemn affembly about their law. So were both thefe and encamped himself not far, either from the town, or the standing camp of his enemies: where H the Volicians feeing no forces yet come unto them from the Equians, had no heart to fight, but made preparation how they might keep themselves quiet and safe, within their mure and rampire. The morrow after, Fabius made not one entire battell of Allies and citizens mingled tonether, but three battailons severally by themselves, of three fundry nations, & ranged them along all about the counterfearpe and trench of his enemies. Himself was in the midst with the Roman legions, and gave commandment to observe heedfully and mark the signall: that the Allies alio should both begin battell and also retire, when he sounded the retreat. In like fort he placed the horsmen behind the Principia at the back of each battel. Thus in three fundry parts he affailed the camp, and invironed it round about, and charging luftily hard upon them on every fide, T he beat the Volicians down from their rampier, for they were not able to endure his violence. And having gotten over all their trenches and fortifications, he drave the fearfull multitude clean out of their hold, that now were retired to a fide and corner of the camp. The horimen might not eafily get over the trench, and flood still of purpose to behold the fight, and to mark them when they should flie : but having once gottenthem in the open fields, they chased them as they ran away on heaps : and by killing them in their fearfull flight, deferved their part in that victorie. Great was the execution both within the camp, and also without the rampires, as they fled ; but greater was the pillage, for that the enemies had much ado to carry their armour away with them. and but that they shrowded themselves as they fled in the woods, they had perished every man. During these exploits about Antium, the Equians having sent before them the tallest and lustiest K young menthey had, insprised the callle of Tufculum, upon a judden and at unawares in the night feasion: and with the rest of their power they were encamped not far from the wals of Tuiculum. intending to intercept and fray the army of their enemies. Tidings hereof came in post to Rome. and from Rome to the camp before Antium: which troubled the Romans as much as if news had been brought, that the Capitoll was taken. So fresh in remembrance was the late desert of the Tuiculans: and the like jeopardy feeming to challenge and redemand femblable aid and fuccour. Fabins letting all other things aside, caused the booty in all halt to be conveyed out of the camp to Anium: where having left an indifferent guard, he hastneth apace in order of battel to Tufculum; by reason whereof, the souldiers could take nothing with them, but their armour, and such taked or boyled meats as were at hand ready. The Conful (Cornelius) fent a con- L vov of victuals unto them from Rome. Thus for certain months continued the war at Tufculum The Conjul (Fabius) with one part of his hoft affailed the camp of the Æquians: for the other part he had let the Tulculans have, to win again their fortresse. Against all force it was impregnable, but in the end famine constrained the enemies to abandon it. To which extremity being at length driven, they were by the Tufculans diffarmed and compelled to paffe naked under the * yoke. Who as they fled homeward with shame enough, were overtaken of the Roman Consul gallows made in Algidum, and put to the tword every one. After this victory, he encamped with the rest of with two jave- his army at Columen, for to the place is named. The other Conful like wife, leeing that there was no danger threatning the wals of Rome, now that the enemy was discomfitted & repulled, departed endlong in the himself from the citie. So the Consuls entring two wajes the borders of their enemies, made ground, and achird fallned tharp war and ipoiled the Volscians of the one fide, and the Aquians on the other. I find in most M overthwart to Writers that the Antiates in this year rebelled: and that L. Corneling the Conful managed that war and won the town. But for as much as there is no mention made of that matter in any anci-This war was no fooner brought to an end, but the domesticall Tribunes war at home put the

a good and quiet state.

A matters put off unto the Confuls coming. Who being entred with triumph into the city, with their victorious armie. & no words made of the law, many thought the Tribunes were clean danted and ftriken dead. But they (for that the year now was at an end) afpiring to be Tribunes the fourth time, left all their hot contention for the law; and referved themicives wholly to argue and resfon at the affembly for the Election of new Magistrats. And albeit the Consuls had bent all their might and main against the continuity of the Tribunship, as earnestly, as if a law had been propounded, tending to the impairing and abridging of their majesty, yet got the Tribunes the mastrie, and had the hand of them in the end. In this year peace was granted upon request and petition, unto the Equians, And the Seffing, which the year before began, was now finished.

R And this was counted the tenth general Survey and tolemp purging of the citie from the foundation thereof. There were numbred in the Cenfe-book of citizens 132419 polles; Aglorious and honourable year it was untill the Confuls, both at home and in war. For they not onely procured peace abroad, but also the citie was, if not in perfect concord and unitie, yet in leffe trouble than at other times. L. Minutius, and L. Nautius, that there were created Confuls, entred upon the reliques of the two matters begun the former year. And much after one fort, as the confuls croffed the going forward of the law, to the Tribunes hindred the judiciall proceeding against Volleim. But the new Questors were men of more power and greater authority. For together with M. Valerius, the fon of Valerius, and nephew of Volefus, was T. Quintius Capitolinus created Questour, a man that had been thrice Conful. Foratmuch therefore, as Cafo, the worthiest

C gentleman of all other, and the very ornament of the youth of Rome, could not be reflored again, neither to the house of the Quintij, nor the commonweal, he pursued of mere pietie, with just & lawfull war, and falle wittness, who would not suffer on anythand the innocent person to have the liberty to plead in his own defence. And when Virginius, most of all the other Tribunes, was earnest to publish the law, the Consuls had two months respit given them 'to consider therof, and look into it throughly: to the end, that when they had advertised the people what fecret fraud and inconvenience was hidden and lurked therein, they might afterwards fuffer them to proceed to a ferunitie, and gather voices accordingly. This space between granted, brought the citic into

But the Equians would not abide, that long it should continue fo; Who having broken the league, D which the year before was made with the Romans, choic Gracehus Cluilius for their governor and generall, who was in those daies the greatest man among the Equians. Under the conduct of this Graceous, they enter first in warlike manner the country of Lanuvism, and from thence into the territorie of Tufculum, spoiling and ransacking as they went : and being loaden with preyes and booties, they pitch their tents in * Algidam. Thither repaired from Rome into their * Roccous del camp, Q. Fabins, P. Valerius, and A. Posthumius as embassadours, to complain of wounds received, Papa. and to demand amends and fatisfaction according to covenant. The Generall of the Lequians feemed to grant them audience, and willed them to declare what message and commission they had from the Senat of Rome, unto the oake; for that himself had some other matters to dispatch the while. Now there grew a mightie great Oake hard by the General his pavilion, spreading E his boughs even over it, and the shadow thereofferved for a cold fitting place. Then one of the Embassadors, as he went his way, " Let both the sacred Oake (quoth he) and what divine power foever is feated in this place, heare and know that by you first the league is broken, who now re-" gard our present complaints, and shortly affilt our valiant armies, when we shall prosecute 45 and revenge at once the difloiall breach, both of Gods laws and mans. So foon as the Embaffadors were returned to Rome, the Senat gave direction, that one of the Confuls should lead forth an armie against Gracehus, into Algidum, and the other have in commission to wast the borders of the Æquians. The Tribunes, as their manner as, hindred the muster and peradventure had staied it altogether, but for a new fearfull occurrent that suddainly came in the neck of the other. For a mightie power of Sabines were approached well neer to the wals of the citie, robbing, spoiling and destroying all a fore them with sword and fire, The territorie was pitiously round about F laid defolat, and the citie therewith fore terrified. Then the Commons stomacks came down, and gently they tooke weapons in band : and (lay what the Tribunes would against it) two great armies were enrolled. Naurius had the leading of the one against the Sabines: and being encamped at Ereium, with rodes and incursions, and those for the most part by night, made such foul work and wast in The Sabines country, that in comparison thereof, the lands about Rome, seemed as if they had not been once touched ... Minnim in his exploits, had neither like good jucceffe. nor yet equal courage and valour of heart. For having pitched his tents not far from the enemie, and received no great foile and loffe at his hands to speak of, yet he kept himselfe for fear within the camp. Which when the enemies perceived, they grew more bold (as commonly the cowardise of one inceaseth the courage of another) and affailed the camp in the night season : but

G seeing that plain force little prexailed, the morrow after they raised mounts, and cast trenches round about. But before they had with their countermures and rampires (topped up all passages, five horsemen being even amongst the guards of the enemies, brought news to Rome, that the Conful with his armie was belieged. Nothing could there have hapned fo little thought of, and unlooked for: whereupon there was such fear, trembling, and quaking, as if the enemics had befreged not the camp, but the very citie. Naurins the Conful they fend for, and becaule they thought him like to doe but imall good, they agreed therfore to creat a Dictator, who might reflore again the diffressed state of the C. W. And L. Quintius Cincinnatus by content of all H men was nominated. Now a world and wonder it is to hear them speak, that in regard of riches despite all things else, and sappote there can be no great honour and vertue, but where wealth and riches do flow in excesse. This L. Quintins, the only hope of the Romans, the man who was to let upright their Empire now distressed, occupied then a peece of ground, to the quantity of foure acres, called at this day Quintia prata, i, Quinting his meddows, on the other fide of Tyber, over against that very place, where now the Arsenal and Shipdocks are, and there washe found digging a ditch, and bearing hard on his spade, or else a plowing the ground, I wot not whether, but bufie and earnest about some rusticall work, no doubt he was and after falurations passed on both fides, between him and the Embassadours that were sent, he was requested by them, that I he would put on his belt gown, and (that which might turn to the good of himself and the commonweal) hear a meffage from the Senat First, he marvelled what the matter should be & very often asking of them if all were welche willeth his wife Racilia to bring him forth his Senators robe ftraitway, out of his torie cottage: which he put on his back (but first he brushed off the dust, and wiped away his (weat, and made himfelf tomewhat mannerly) and then came forthunto.them. who in joyous manner, by way of congratulation, stilled him by the name of Dictator : calling hard npon him to repair unto the city, and declaring in how doubtfull termes the armie stood. Then was there barge provided ready for Quintins, at the cities coft : and being ferried over the river, his three fons met him and received him first, then others of his kinstolk and friends, and after them the more part of the Senatours. Thus attended with this frequent company, and with the E. Sergeants going before, was he brought to his house. Great concourse there was also of the Commons; but nothing to joyous were they, to fee Quinting, supposing that government of his overgreat and absolute, and him telf a man in time of his rule, too imperious. And for that night verily. nothing was done, but a good flanding watch kept in the city. The morro wafter, the Dictator being come into the common place of affembly before day-light, appointed Generall of the horte, L. Tarquitius, of Noble blond descended : a man who for mere poverty had ever served on foot, but of all the flower of Rome was reputed and taken to be a brave lervitour, and an excellent touldier of Then Quinting with the Generall of horfemen, mounteth into the pulpit aloft: proclaimeth a publicke vacation or Lawsteed; commandeth all shop windows through the city to be that, and chargeth that no man thould follow any privat bufineffe of his own. Then as ma- L. ny as were of age to fight, were willed to thew themselves intheir armour, before the san fet, in Mars held every one with victuals drefled for five daies, and with twelve forked flakes a peece for to to pitch in the rampart. And that wholoever were above that age, and were unweldy and not meet for fervice should dresse and provide victuals for the next souldier unto him, whiles he himself made ready his armour, and fought for stakes aforesaid. Thus ran the young able men to and fro, to furnith themselves with stakes, and took whatsoever they could find, and whatsoever was next hand : no man was forbidden, and so they were all ready with heart and good will, according to the Dictator his proclamation. Then went the Dictator forth with the legions of footmen, the Master of the horse likewise with his men of arms, in such good order and aray, as might not only serve for a speedy march to rid ground, but also for a set battell if occasion served. "In M both regiments they spared not to encourage and exhort their fouldiers, according as the present "time required : willing them to let foot forward, to mend their pace and make speed, that by " night time they might reach to their enemies: & not (fay they before there was great need; for "that the Roman Conful and army were befreged, and had now three daies already been pent "up fast incloted and what might happen in one day or one night, no man knew; for oftentimes in the twinciking of an eye, and in the very turning of an hand, there fall out accidents of right "great moment and importance. On afore apace, Enfigne crieth one: follow fouldier faith a-nother. Thus went they also lultily forward, and all to pleasure and gratific their captains. So that by midnight they were come into Algidum: and io foon as they perceived their enemies to be neer at hand, they pitched down their enfignes. Then the Dictator rode about as far forth N as he could fee in the dark, and having viewed well the lituation, coasting and fashion of the camp, commanded the Marshals and Colonels to give direction, That all the carriage and baggage, should be laid up together in one place, and that the fouldiers with their armour and stakes only, should come again into their ranks. What he commanded was soon done. Then in the fame order that he marched, he draweth out his holt in length, and compatieth the camp of his enemies, and commandeth them all upon a fignall or watchword given) to fet up a shout, and prejently upon the shout to call a trench,& every man stuck down his pale in the rampier. Having given this charge, straightwayes the fignall followed. The fouldiers do that which they were hidden: the thout was heard over all the camp of the enemies, yea, and into the Contul his camp : caufing in the one great fear, in the other exceeding joy. The Romans rejoycing one O With another to hear the shout of their fellow-citizens and countriemen, with a conceit of their coming to reione, begin of themselves from their fentinels and Corps de guard, to threaten and terrine their enemies. The Conful fet them forward and faid, there was now no staying for the matter, nor delaies to be made : for that it appeared by that alarm, that not only their friends were come with fuccours, but also had begun to skirmish: and that it was all to nothing. that their enemies camp, was alreadly on the outward fide affaulted. Whereupon, he commandeth his fouldiers to arm, and to follow hard after him. Thus in the night began the skirmish,

A and the legions of a Dictator by their outery and shouting made signification that the enemies on that fide also were driven to their shifts and in great harzard. By this time the Equians had addreffed themselves to impeach them in their trenching and making of their rampire to the end that they might not be compassed about : but the al'arme was given and the skirmish already begun by their enemies within; fearing therefore, left they would break through the midft of their camp, they turned from the pioners and workmen without, to them that fought within, and therby gave the other leave to plie their work and labour all the night long at their pleasure : and fo they maintained skirmish with the Cos, untill day light. Now by the break of day they were entrenched on every fide by the Dictator, and were scarce able to hold out batell with one of the ar-R mies. Then the holt of Quintius, which presently upon the finishing of the trench returned to their weapons, entring of the mures and rampires of the enemies. Here began a fresh conflict again, and vet the former nothing abated. The enemies then feeing themselves thus diffrested and to hardly driven on every fide, left fighting and fell to intreating: they belonghithe Cof. on one fide and the Dictator on the other, that they would not get the victorie by effulion of bloud and cruel maffacre, but would permit them to go their waies naked without their weapons. The Conful he posted them off to the Dictator: who being in great wrath and displeasure, would not be contented without their shame and ignominy besides. But commanded that Clusters their generall with other Colonels and Captains should be brought bound unto him. Item, he enjoyeed them to abandon & quit the town of Corbio : as for the Æquians bloud, he fought notfor it, he had no need thereof : they might depart with their lives. Howbeit, because he would have it now at length, mangretheir heads, confessed, that the nation was vanquished and subdued this will and pleasure was they should passe all under the yoke or gallows: the maner wheref is this. They took three spears or javelins, and fet two of them pitched in the ground endlong, and their overthwart faitned unto the other. Under this kind of gallows the Dictator compelled the Equians to go. Thus having gotten the tents of the enemies full of all kind of store (for naked he sent them under the yoke) the whole pillage he beltowed upon his own fouldiers only : and rebuking sharply the Consulsarmy and the Coshimfelf, Ye shall (quoth he) souldiers go without your part of booty won of the enemie, whole booty ye had like your felves to have been. And as for thee, O L. Micinutins, until thou begin to have the heart and courage befeeming a Conful, thou shalt be a Lieute-" nant only over thele legions. So Minutius being discharged of the Consulship, remained still D as he was commanded, with the army. But so well were men content in those daies, willingly to veeld obedience to them that better could command, that this army in remembrance hereof as of a favour received, rather then of a difgrace offered, both ordained for the Dictatour a coronet of gold of one pound weight: and also when he went homeward, saluted him by the name of their Patron. At Rome the Senat being affembled together by Q. Fabius Provolt of the citie, decreed that Quinting should enter the city in triumph with his army marching in battell aray as he L. Quinting came. Before his chariot was led the commanders of his enemies . the enfignes are carried a triumpheth. fore, then followed the army laden with spoil and pillage. Great chear and banquets were set out, men fay, upon tables at every mans dore. Thus making merry, they followed the chariot with longs of triumph, with sports and merry conceits, as they are wont to do at their great and solemn E feasts. The same day L. Mamilius the Tusculan, with the approbation and good liking of all men, was enfranchised citizen of Rome. And forthwith would the Dictat, have refigued up his office, but that the Court, held for the triall of M. Volfeins, endited of bearing falle witnesse, stated him; and in truth, the Tribunes would have hindred the judiciall proceeding against him, if they had not Rood in awe of the Dictatour. But Volfeins was convicted and had fentence, and departed to Lanuvium in exile. And Quintins having taken the Dictatorship for fix months, gaveit over the fixteenth day after he entred into it. About the same time the Conful Nantins fought valiantly with the Sabines at Ereium : who besides the walting of the fields, had an overthrow in fight. Fabins was sent into Algidum, to succeed in the roome of Minutius. In the end of the year, the Tribuns began to stir, about their law : but because the two armies were absent, the Senatour prevailed so much at that time, that no bils were propounded unto the people. The Commons likewife obtained, that they might create the felf-fame Tribunes, now the fifth time. The report goeth, that there were feen in the Capitol, wolves chased away by hounds: for which strange fight, the Capitol was purged. And these were the acts of that year. Then followed Contals Q. Minutini & M. Horatius Pulvillius.

In the beginning of which year, whiles all was quiet abroad, the same Tribunes and the same law caused differtion and sedition at home: which would have grown to a farther mischief in such heats men were, had not word been brought, as it were of set purpose, that the garison at Corbio was surprized in the night by the Æquians and put to the sword: whereupon the Consuls G called the Senat together: and order was given, that they should lead a Subitary army and with a running camp invade Algidum. Then was the strife about the law laid afide clean, and a new contention arole about the multers. But the Confuls with all their authority, were overfwaied of the Commons, by the help and affiltance of the Tribunes. At what time a new trouble put them in fear-for intelligence came, that a power of Sabins were come down already into the territories of Rome for to fach booties and make spoil : and from thence advanced against the city. Upon which fear, The Tribunes were content that fouldiers should be prest, yet not without this covenant indented: That for as much as they had now themselves these five years been trifled off first created. and deluded & that this protectorship of theirs stood the Commons in little stead, in regard of their H fmall number, therefore, there should from thenceforth be ten created Tribnnes of the Commonalty. The Nobles were so near driven and to such straights, that will they, nill they, yeeld they must thereto: with this provito, that they should never after Elect the same men Tribunes twife. And for fear that this act should after the war was once past, turn to nothing, like as others had done before. they went in hand immediately to call a court for the Election of the Tribunes. So in the 36, year from the first Tribunes of the Commons chosen, there were ten created ; our of every Classis, two. And by an act it was provided, that in such fort they should be created ever after. The musters then being taken and fouldiers enrolled, Minutius went with a power against the Sabines, but found not the enemy. And Horatins, because the Equians after they had put the gartion at Corbio to the I fword, and won Hortana belides, fought with them in Algianm. Many a manthere he flew, and drove his enemies not only out of Algidum, but also out of Corbin and Horsana. As for Corbin he utterly rated it, for betraying the garifon there. After this, were M. Valerius and Sp. Virginius made Confuls. At quiet they were both at home and abroad. But great fearcity there was of corn. by reason of the untemperat and unseasonable rain that fell. A bill there was preferred, that the mount Avenine should be turned to Commons. And the same Tribunes were made again: who. all the year following, when T. Romalius and C. Veturius were Confuls, in all their Halls and atfemblies, ftill published the law : faying, it was a shame, that their number was thus increased to no purpole, in case their affairs should lie dead in their two years, as they had done in the "whole 5. years past. Whiles they were earnestly debating these things, fearfull messengers came K in all halt from Tusculum, with news, that the Æquians were in the territory of Tusculum. The fresh desert of that nation would not suffer the Romans for shame to defer their helping hand-Whereupon both Confuls were fent with an army, and met with the enemies in Algodum in their wonted haunt and accultomed place, where they encountred and ftruck a battell : in which were flain about 7000, enemies. The reft were put to flight. A huge booty there was gotten; which the Confuls fold out-right, by reason of the want of mony in their common treasury. But this canfed the fouldiers to repine and grudge, and in the end ministred matter to the Tribunes, to accuse the Commons. As soon therefore as they were out of their office, when Sp. Tarpeius and A. Eternius were Confuls: Romnlius was arrested and put in fuit by C. Claudius Cice. ro, Tribune of the Commons. And Veturins was likewife troubled by L. Halienus an Edile or L Warden of the Commons. Condemned they were both the one and the other, to the great indignation of the Nobles. Remulius was fined in * 10000 Affes. Vernius in * 15000. But for all this hard # 46,lib. 17.fb. hap and calamity that befell to thole former Confuls, the new were never a jot more remiffe and cool in the quartel: faying, Well may we also be cast and condemned, and both Commons and Tribunes never the neerer to compasse and enact their law. Then the Tribunes giving over the law. which now by propounding only to oft, was waxen Itale and old, began more gently to deal with the Senatours, praying them to make an end once of all strife and contention. And in case that the "laws of the Commons to difliked and displeased them, they requested them to suffer certain Lawmakers to be created indifferently out of the Commonalty, as well as of the Nobility, who might of devife acts commodious & profitable to both parts and or the equal liberty and freedom of all. As M for the subflance it felt of this motion, the Senators refused not but they flatly faid, that none but of the Nobility should have the making of those laws. Seeing then they agreed thus about the laws. &differed only and squired about the la wgiver, there were Embassadors sent to Athens, So. Political Embalsadours mins Albus, A. Manlius, and P. Sulprius Camerinus: who were commanded to exemplific and feat into Greece copy out the famous and worthie laws of Solon: to fearch out and learn the ordinances, cultomes. and rites of other cities in Greece. For any outward wars, this year was quief, and the year following more quiet, when P. Curiatius, and Sex. Quintilius were Confuls, by reason of the continual flience of the Tribunes : which, as the expectation of the Embassadors that were gone to Athens and of strange and forain laws, first and principally procured : so, two mighty great calamities that role both at once, to wit, famine and peltilence, noilome and loathtome both to man and N beaft, afterwards continued. By means wherof, the fields lay wast and desolate, the city dispeopled with continual burials : many right worthipful and honourable houses thereby mourned. Ser-likewife: in whose room the Augurs (his Affociats) choice C. Veturius: and therather, because he had been condemned by the people. Quintilius the Conful departed also this life, and four Tribunes of the Commons. So that this was a year, with manifold loffes and calamities fouly diffained. But for enem es all was quiet. After this were C. Menenius, and P. Seft in Capitolinus made Confuls. In which year likewise there was no war abroad, mary at home some troubles arose. By this time were the E batiadors returned with the Athenian laws. And therfore the Iribunes were fo much the more earnest and organt, that once at length they would fet on, to describe and put O down tome laws. And agreed it was, that there should be creased Decemvirs above all appeal : & TenMagiftrafor the years en g there should no other Officers and Magiltrats be in place. Now, whether ates called De ny of thele might be of the Commons or no, that was a question and nereupon some debate and cemvirs, infticontroversie continued for a good while, At the last, the Nobles were a way with it, Schae the pretuted for the heminence upon the condition, that neither the law colla, concerning the Aventine mount, nor maki gof awcs, other facred lawes should be repealed. Thus in the 30/ yeare after that Rome was built, was the form of the cires government changed the lecond time, and to the Confuls from the December, was the loveraign rule translated, like as before, from the kings to the Confuls.

gisso Cornelius, the Flamin of Quirinus dyed therof. C. Horarius Pulvillus the Augur went of it

This change was leffe notable, in that it long continued not. The beginning of this Magistracie was fair and goodly to see to, but grew too rank, and exceeded in overmuch licentiousnesse. The sooner therefore it faded and fell away, and the former government was taken up again, and both the name and jurisdiction of Confuls returned, and was conferred upon twain. The Decemvirs created were thefe : Ap. Claudius, T. Genneins, P. Seftius, L. Veturius, C. Iulius, A. Manlius, P. Sulpitius, P. Curiatius, T. Romalius, Sp Posthumius, Cliudius and Genutius, because they had been Confuls elect for that year, had this dignity bestowed upon them, in lieu of the other. And Sestius one of the Confuls the year before, because he had preferred this matter unto the Senators, against his fellow Consulswill. Next to these were counted the three Embassadours that went to A-

B thens, both for that they should be rewarded with this honourable dignity for their embassage into fo far & remote a country, & also because men were perswaded, that by reason of their insight and skill in forrain ordinances of strange nations, they might be well emploied in setting down, and making of new; The reft made up the number. They fay, that in the last fecutionies and fuffrages at this Election, choice was made of those that were more aged, and farther stept in years, to the end they might not to fiercely and stoutly gainfay and croffe the opinions and constitutions of the other. In this new state of government, Appens was the man that bare the greatest stroke, he ruled the roft and swaied all the rest, so highly stood he in grace and favour with the people. He had so altered his nature, and became such a new man, that all on a sudden, of a cruel and terrible presecuror of the Commons, he proved a very Publicola, and courter of the Commonalty, and one that

C lay for to get every gale of popular love and favour that might be had. Every one fat his tenth day in place of judgement, and ministred justice in their severall turnes unto the people. On which day, the welve knitches of rods were born by the Lictors before the loversign judg as for his nine brethren, they had each of them one fer jeant to give attendance. In this agreement among themselves. (which accord other whiles when they were privat persons, had been huttfull unto them) refled only and wholly the greatest equity towards others. A proof and argument of this their moderation, it shall be sufficient to observe now in the example and instance of one onely matter : for whereas they were created absolute, and patt all appeal, it fortuned, that in the house of P. Softius, a Nobleman, there was a dead body found buried, and brought forth openly into the publicke allembly of the people. The thing being no leffe apparent in view, then hainous and horrible in fact, C. Inlines a Decemvir, brought Seftine in quettion therefore, put him in fuit to an-D fiver at a certain day, and became plaintifunto the people, and accused that defendant, whole competent judge he was by order of law. And to he yeelded of his own right : adding to much to the freedom of the people, as was taken from the power of his own jurisdiction and government. When as now both high and low gave out that this authority was found and uncorrupt, & fet asit were from Oracle, and Gods own mouth, & al men wiling to accept of juffice at their hands : tnen fet they to it, and went about the making and giving of laws, And with great expectation of men, they let out ten Tables, and called the people to a generall affembly, commanding them in a good hour, and in the name of God to go, & (that which might turn to the good, to the benefit, and hap. The ten tables pines of the Commonweal, hemfelves their children &posterity) to read the law there published: E protesting, that To far as ten men could with all their witedome forese & provide for, had devised indifferent lawes, and equall for all torts of cailings, as well the best as the meanest. But for as much as the wits and heads of manymen, were of deeper reach to fee farther into things, they gave them good leave, to cast in their minds, and ponder with themselves each particular, yes, and to reason together from point to point, and thereof to deliver their epinion openly, what was shore and wanting, or what was superfluous, in every article ; and look what laws the confent of all men feemed to bring in those should the people accept and none other that it might appear they were not so much to approve of them and give their affent after they were propounded, as to propole and preferre them their own lelves. And when as they were though lufficiently corrected, according to the speeches of men, and as every one spake to the severall titles and chapters of the laws, as they were fet forth: then in the high court of Parlament, aftembled of all the Centuries & degrees of men, the laws of ten Tables were enacted and established. Which even at this day, among that infinit number of statuts, heaped and hudled one upon another, are the very well-spring and fountain of all justice, both publick and privat. After this, there can a rumour abroad, that two tables were yet wanting, which if they were put unto the reft, then might the complete body as it were of the whole Roman law be finished and made perfect. The expectation thereof, now that the great Leet-day grow neer for the Election, made men very defirous to create Decemvirs again the iccord time. Now the Commons abroad, besides that they hated the very name of Confuls, as well as or Kings, fought not greatly for the protection of the Tribunes : feeing that the Decemvirs one after another, yeelded in their perogative, and admitted in some fort the appeal. G But after that the folemo affembly for the chating of Decemvirs, was published against the * Trinundanem, or third market day next enluing, to luch an heighth was be ambition and defire of That is the ay this dignity growne, that the very chiefemen, and principall heads of the City (for feare, I be- day following leeve, left the polleffions of to great a government, in case they were not invested themselves in the place, frould he open unto fome unmeet and unworthy perions Jwent about and made court to every man, using in numble manner to those very commons, with whom they had been at itrife & variance, for that honour and dignity, which they themselves had with all their power and might impugned. The worthinefle and reputation of men of those years, and having born and gone through fuch offices, being now come in question, and submitted to the choice and judgement of others, pricked on Ap. Clandins, and fet him forwards. So as a man could hardly know whether to reckon him among the Decemvirs, or those that flood to be Decemvirs again, For otherwhiles he was more like one that fued for an office, than him that prefently bare office; blaming presonages of best quality in the City, and laying hard to their charge: but extelling the vainest & bafelt of the Competitors. Himself in person torting among the Duilij and Icilij, and inch like as fawoured the Tribunes, went fwinging and fquaring in the common place, using them as infruments to venditate himself forth to the common people. So long, as at length his very brethren in office, who untill that time had been singularly addicted and affectionated unto him, cast their eies upon him, and began to mark, & marvail much what his meaning was: reasoning thus among themselves: I er Surely there is no foundnesse nor goodnesse herein, but all meer dissimulation and hypocrisie, ce Certainly, it is not for nought, that in such pride of his, there should appear so much courtesie. 51 What? to force his own nature too much within compasse: to debate himself, and suffer priof vat men to be his fellows, was a figne of one, that made not so much hast to forgo a dignity and er promotion, as fought means to keep it still. Openly they durst not presume to check and withstand his ambitious desire, but assaied by pleasing and soothing him up, to repress and bridle his foolish affection. And seeing he was the younger of his company, they all with one accord laid upon him the charge, to hold the high court for the Election of Decemvirs. Their drift and policy was that he should not Elect his own self ; a thing, which unlesse it were the Tribunes again, and that was a most dangerous precedent and example) no man ever had done before. And he with K all his heart accepting therof, made profession that he would be president of that honourable Court and Seffion, and prayed to the gods that he might perform it for the benefit of the weal-publik. And to took the vantage of that opportunity, to fet forward his own defign, which they meant should have stopped and crossed the same. And after he had by secret packing and convasing with the other competitours, and given the repulse unto the two Quintis (Capitolinus, and Cincinnatus) and out beside the Cushion his own Uncle by the fathers side (C. Claudius, a most stout & resolut champion of the Nobility) with other citizens of like mark and quality : he createth Decemvirs fuch as were not for worth, port, and behaviour, to them comparable and his own fweet felf with the first. Which as there was no man thought the ever would have done, so all good men mislifed when it was done. With him were elected M. Cornelius Maluginenfis, M. Sergins, L. Miuntins, Q. Fabius Vibulanus, Q. Petilins, T. Antonius Merenda, Caso Duillius, Sp. Oppius Cornicen. M. Rabuleus. And there's an end of Appins playing anothers mans part. Off went his mask and visour now, and to from thence-forth, he began to shew himself in his own likenesse, and to live in his kind : yea, and to frame his companions to the bent of his bow, even before they were entred into office. Day by day had they their fecret meetings by themfelves apart from all other: and being once hereby furnished with ungratious and proud delignments, which they had closely complotted together, they could no longer hold & diffemble their pride. Few might bave accesse unto them: feldom would they be spoken with, she wing themselves strange, surly, & churlish to those that came unto them. Thus drew they the time on, unto the * Ides of May, which was the usuall 13.day of May and folemn day then of entring into offices of government. In the very beginning whereof they M made the first day of their magistracie noted by an intimation and evident shew of exceeding terrour. For whereas the Decemvirs their predecessors had observed this order, That one alone should have the rods of State born before him, and that this regall ornaments should passe round through them all in course one after another : Behold, these came all of them abroad, and each of them had his xij.bundles of rods carried before him. So that these Lictors, 120 in number, with their rods and axes too, failned within the rods, tookup and filled the whole Ferum or common place as they went. And for as much as they were created absolutely, and their commission ran without all appeal, men made this exposition, that to go with their axes or without was all one & made no matter at all. Thus was there a fliew & representation of ten KK. And this terrour grew more and more, not with the meanest and basest fort only, but also with the chief and best of the N Patritians: supposing that they sought to pick a quarell, and minister occasion and overture to some maffacre: that if any man should offer either in the Senat or among the people, to speak one word concerning liberty, forthwith there should be exemplary whipping and heading, to the terrour of all other. For, besides that, from the people there was no remedy and succour to be had, by region that the appeal unto them was quite disapulled and taken away : the Decemvirs themfelves drew fo all in one line together and were fo combined and linked, that there was no hope at all, that one would thwart and croffe that which another did: whereas the former Decemvirs could well abide, that their judgements and fentences should be censured and corrected, by the appellations or appeal to one of their brethren in commission : yea, and in some cases put off fome matters from themselves to be decided by the people, which seemed properly to belong O unto their own jerisdiction. For a while, the fear was to all indifferent : but by little and little the Commons only began to feel the imart. The Nobles were forborn and eleaped clear and cotfree: the meaner persons went to the wals, and with them they dealt according to their lust and pleasure right cruelly. The person wholly they regarded, and never respected the cause, as with whom favour and friendship prevailed as much as equity and right should have done. At home in their houses, they determined of matters how they should passe: and in open place they pronounced fentence accordingly. It a man had appealed to one of their bench, from him

A unto whom he fled for relief, he went his waies again by weeping croffe, repenting that he flood not to the order and injunction awarded by the former. It was thought and spoken also abroad, but the first author would not be known, That they had conspired together, not for the present time only to do wrong and injurie, but also were confederat between themselves privily, yea, and had bound it with an oath, to call no affembly at all for the electing of new magistrats ; but being now once invelted in the loveraign rule, to hold the possession of the Decemvirship for ever-The Commons than began to look about them, to behold and advise well the countenances of the Nobles, to see if they could from them catch some good gale of wind, some hope again of liberev. at whole hands they fearing bondage, had brought the common-weal to this hard paffe. B The LL. of the Senat hated the Decemvirs, they hated also the Commons. They liked not of things as they went; and yet were perswaded that the Commons were well enough served, and deferved no better : who gaping greedily after liberty were now fallen and plunged into fervitude and thraldome. Help they would not with the least of their fingers, but rather heap more wrongs upon them : that having a wearifome and tedious lothing of the present state, they might fall to a longing defire after two Confuls, and with the old world were come again. By this time now was the better part of the year gone and past: and the two tables of laws were annexed to the other ten of the former year: which if they might be once confirmed and ratified by a Parliament to the former of the Centuries, there remained nothing behind, for which the common-weal should need these ten, magistrats: but expected it was certainly, that the assembly for Election of Confuls should out C of hand be published and proclamed. Marry, there was one thing hammered in the Commons heads, by what means they might revive again the Tribunes authority; the very grand bulwark of their freedom, and the thing that now had discontined and lien dead. But all this while there was not a word of the new Election. And the Decemvirs, who at the first presented usually unto the Commons fight, a crew of those that favoured the Tribines, for to attend upon their persons (a thing right plaufible and pleafing unto the people :) were guarded now, with certain tall peofioners of their Nobility : whole troups of them flood about their Tribunal leats and places of judg. ment. These made havock and spoil of the Commons and their goods : and look what the mind of a mighty man stood unto and lusted after, it was his hap to have it what loever. Nay, there was no toare now made of their backs and fides : some were scourged with rods, some lost their heads D by the ax. And because this cruelty should not go unrewarded, lightly there was none executed. if he were worth any thing, but his goods went after and were begged or given away. The wouth of the Nobility, by this kind of hire well fleshed; not only opposed not themselves to withstand these wrongful dealings & hard courses, but carried it afore them, openly professing & avowing that they wished rather their own licentionines, than the liberry of all. The * Ides of May * 15 day of were now come about, and no new magistrates elected in the others roome. Forth come the De- May. cemvirs, (who to fay a truth and to give them their right, were no other than privat persons) neither with minds abated for the exercising of their imperious rule, nor with fewer regal ensignes, to fet out and shew their honour & dignity. When the people faw that, they made no other reckoning but this was plain usurping of the kings government, and no better. And now farewell freedom E for ever and a day. For neither had they prefently, nor hereafter were they like to have any man to recover it again. So that now, not they only let fall their hearts and were discouraged in themfelves, but also grew to be contemptible in the eyes of their neighbour-nations: who dildained highly, that they should have soveraignty of rule, who were not free themselves, nor enjoyed their own liberty. For the Sabines with a strong power invaded the Territories of Rome : and when they had for raged far and neer, and driven away booties both of people and of cattell, without impeachment, they gather their army together again, that had hanged here and there up and down, and entred unto Eretum, where they encamp themselves alaying this for a ground, and building their hope upon their discord at Rome, that it would stay their mustering. Not only the news that came hereof, but the the flying of the country pealants, put the whole city in great fear. F The Decemvirs fall to confulting what were belt to do. And whiles they were to feek what course to take, and between the hatred of the Nobles and the Commons utterly forlorn and destitute, there hapned also another fearfull trouble in the tail of the former. The Equians from another fide were encamped in Algidum. And from Tufculum Embassadours brought tidings that their country was walted with excursions from thence, whereupon they craved their help and aid. These tearfull occurrents to troubled and perplexed the Decemvirs, that confidering the city was now befet at once with wars from two places, their stomacks were come down to confult with the Senat. They commanded therefore the Senatours to be lummoned to the Curia. And well they wift, what a great fit and florm of anger, displeasure and blame was towards : namely, that they would burden them & lay to their charge, how they were the only cause both of the country wasted already, and tempt and shrewd push, to abolish atterly their government, unlesse they truck closely together.

to it, and by extending their authority sharply upon some few of the stoutest, quail and crush the the attempts of others. After the voice of the Bedell was heard in the Forum or common place, citing the Senatours to repaire into the Councell house to the Decemvirs; thenovelty and strange-neffe of the matter, (because they had laid down for a long time the manner of calling them to Councell) caused the Commons to marvail and mute what was betallen, that they should after fuch discontinuance, take up a thing to obsolete and out of use. And thus they conceived of it,

G of the perils like prefently to enfue: looking for no other, but that there would be given an at-

A Decemvir, began to speak, rather by of way praire and intreatie, then in checking and reproving that they were much beholding to their enemies, and might thank war for this, that any ancient H guite and custom of a free city was come up and in ure again. They looked about on every side of the Forum to fee if they might efpy a Senator: but few or none could they hear of, any where. Then looked they into the Caris, and behold, none at all apeared about the Decemvirs. Whereof their own felves, even the Decemvirs could gather no otherwife, but that in the conceipt, & consent of all men, their government was become odious: & the Commons also thus colk feed and interpreted, that the Senators met not together, because privat men (such as the Decemvirs were indeed) had no authority to affemble a Senat. And now laid they, is the way and entrance made to recover their liberty again, if so be the Commons would join with the Senat : and as the Nobles being called, meet not together in counsel, so the Commons likewise would refuse to be I multered. In this wife muttered and whilpered the Commons. And in truth fearcely was there any one of the Senators about the common place, and but few within the city : for very griefe and indignity to fee that things went as they did, they had withdrawn themselves into the countrie to their lands : and forgetting the state of the common-weal, they became careful of their own privat affairs : thinking themselves so far forth freed from oppression and wrong, as they were remote and sequestred from the society, meeting and conference, with so Lordly & imperious rulers. When they would not affemble at their fummons, the officers were fent unto their houses, both for to streine and take away stresses for their contumacie and disobedience, and also to enquire and learn, whether they refused to come at their commandment, or of set purpose or no. And word they bring back, that the Senators were in the country. The Decemvirs were better apaid to hear K that, than if answer had come that they were at home and refused to obey. They they gave commandment that they should be sent for a and they warned a Senat house against the next day following: where they attembled more in number then they looked for. Whereupon the Commons supposed that their liberty was bought and fold and utterly betraied by the Nobles, for that the Senat had yeelded obedience to them (that now by right were out of their office) as if they had given lawfull (ummons, who being privat men had no power at all fo to do. But they thewed more obeifance and submission, as we have heard say, in coming to the Councel house, than any disposition to deliver their minds and opinions there, to the liking and pleasures of the Decemvirs. First, L. Valerine Potitus, as it recorded, after that Appine Claudine had proposed unto them the I cause of their meeting, before they were required their advice in order and course, claimed the liberty of the house, to speak in the behalfe of the common-weal. But when as the Decemvirs denied it flatly, yea, and forbad him with threats, upon pain of their high displeasure, he inferred again and menaced that he would go forth unto the commons, and so began a broil and tumnit M. Horatius Barbaius likewife took part with him, and was nothing behind in ftoutneffe to main-M.Oratius Bar- tain the quarell, terming them ten Tarquins : " and are ye aware (quoth be) how the Kings were in times past expelled by the the Valerii and Horatii? And yet the name it was not of the Decemvirs "Kings, that men were to weary of and loathed in those daies. " wife, and befought Appins for his brothers fonl fake, who was his own father, to remember at and regard more that civil focietie wherein he was born, then this ungracious and wicked con-4 federacie, contracted with his fellow Decemvirs. And this request I make (quoth he) tendera ing your privat estate more then the Commonweal. As for her, if she might not by fair meanes er and with their good wils, obtain her own due and right, the would by foul waies, and in thight at of their hearts recover it in the end. And for as much as of much debate and strife there ensue commonly heats of anger and cankred rancour, I am in dread & horror what the fequel and if-" fue will be of these jars. Now when as the Decemvirs would not permit the rest to speak, but only to the point proposed and occasion of their meeting, yet they were abashed to interrupt B the speech of Clandins and to cut him off: but suffered him to goe on untill he made an end. And in conclusion his opinion and sentence was, that he would not (to abide by it) agree, that any act of the Senat should for that time passe in that behalf. And all that were present took his words to. as if Clanding deemed no otherwise of the Decemvirs, then of private men. Many of them also, such especially as had been Consuls, were of his mind, and faid as much. Another opinion there was, more rough and sharp in outward shew, but far lesse for cible and effectuall in deed advising and willing the Nobles, to make no more ado, but to go togethers and chule an Interregent. For this man feemed yet, to account and judge them Magistrates; (bad though they were) that had called Ca Senat, and held them in Councell: whereas the former, that would not abide any act to passes I. Committee big. reckoned them but, for privat persons. Thus when the Decemvirs cause began to shrinke and go Societh in the downward, L. Cornelius Maluginensis, brother to Cornelius the Decemvir, being relerved of pur- Seat. pose to give his opinion in the last place of al the Consular Senatours, such as had been Consuls, pre-"tending a care that they had of the war, took part with his brother and his Collegues, faying, that "he marvelled much by what misfortune or destinie it hapned, that the decemvirs should be chal-"lenged and oppugned, especially by those that had stood for the Decemvirship, or by their or friends and allocates: and how it came about, that in to many months space, whiles the city was er at relt and without fear of war, no man made question or doubt, whether they that were in place, and governed the state, were lawfull Magistrates or no: and now at last, when the enemies are "in a manner ar the gates, they should sow civil diffention, unlesse this were the meaning of ita D a that in a troubled state it would not be so clearly seen and perceived, what they went about But co no man is able (qd.he) to fet down a true doom, &alledge a ruled case in so great a matter as this 66 is 10 men, whole minds are bufied and wholly poffessed of a greater care. And therefore my o-" pinion is that concerning that point which Valerius and Horatius charged the Decemvirs with, "namely, That before the Ides of May their government was determined, and they out of office : the Senat should discusse and debate, when as the wars now at hand were dispatched, and the " Commonweal brought once again to quietness. And that Appins Claudius should make this rec-" koning even now aforhand, and know that he is to render a reason of that high court of Parlaes ment, which for the election of Decemvirs he called and held, being a Decemvir himfelf : "namely, Whether they were created for one year only, or to continue still, until the other laws E . which yet are wanting, were ratified and confirmd. As for the present time, he thought good that "all other matters should surcease, and be passed over, save the war only a the rumour whereof, if " they thought to be falle, and that they were but tales that not only the meffengers, but also the " Embassadours of the Tulculans reported, then his advise was to fend out espials, who upon their "discovery might bring more certain tidings. But in case they gave credence to messengers and 4 Embassadours both, then with all speed possible to muster, and the Decemvirs to have the con-" duct of the armies, and to lead them whither they thought meet : and that nothing els the ald be thought upon before this. Which opinion of his, that it might prevail and take effect, the punie Sentaours by importunat convassing, obtained. Then Valerius and Horatius both role up the fecond time more fierce and eager than before, calling upon them aloud, that they might be per-F mitted to speak concerning the Commonweal, and in case they might not be suffered by reasonof the faction, to have the liberty of speech in the Councel House, they would speak their mind without, before the people. For neither could privat men (as they were) debar them in Senat Houle, nor in open affembly & to give place unto their imaginary, and pretended imperial enfigns, they would never be brought. Then Appine supposing the matter wel-neer come to this passe, that unlesse the violence were resisted with like boldnesse, their rule was at an end, and their authoritie conquered : Ye were not best (quoth he) to speak but to the matter, whereupon we sit in Consultation. And when Valerius replied again and faid plainly, that he would not hold his tongue for a privat mans commandment : Appius fent a Sergeant unto him. Whereupon Valerius cried for help to the Quirites, from the porch of the Councell House. Then L. Corneitus clulping G Appins about the middle, without regard to content him whole good he pretended, staied the ftrife. So by the mediation of Cornelsus, leave was granted to Valerius for to fay his mind at his own pleature. But, for as much as his libertic proceeded no farther, then to some few words, the Decemvirs held on their purpose still, and had their desire. The Nobles also, such as had been Confuls, and the ancients, upon an old cankred hatred that they beare still against the Tribuns authority, where upon they supposed the Commons were much more devoted and affected, then auto the

cord should themselves afterwards forgo their office, than that upon hatred and malice received

against them, the Commons should take heart of grasse, and hold up head again. For if with gen- H tle handling of the matter, without stir and clamour of the people, the regiment returned again unto the Confuls, it would haply come to passe, that either by meanes of wars coming between. or through the moderation of the Confuls in their government, the Commons might in time forget the Tribuns quite.

Thus whiles the Nobles were filent and made no more words, a muster was proclamed, and the younger fort of people, seeing the government of the Decemvirs absolute and without appeal, made aniwer to their names. And when the legions were enrolled, the Decemvirs took order and agreed betweenthemselves who should go forth to the wars, and who should have the command of the forces. The chiefe & principal of the Decemvirs were Q. Fabius, and Appins Claudius. And for that there seemed greater war at home then abroad, the Decemvirs supposed the violent nature of Appins, fitter to represse all troubles and mutinies in the citie; and considering withall the disposition of Fabins, to be lesse constant and resolute in goodnesse, then active and quick in militarie fervice, (for this man having been in times palt of great worth, both at home, and also in war; the Decemvirship, and the conditions of his colleagues together, had so greatly changed, that he chose rather to be like Appius then himself) to him therefore was imposed the charge of the war against the Sabines, together with M. Rabuleius and Q. Petilius joined in commission with him. M. Cornelius was fent into Algidum, with L. Minutius, T. Antonius, Cafo Duillius, and M. Sergim, and they ordsined and appointed Sp. Oppim as affiliant to Appim Clanding for the de-K fence and government of the city, and to have the full authoritie of all the ten Decemvirs. But the Common-weal feed no better abroad in warfare, than it fared at home. The onely fault in the Generals was this, That they had made themselves odious to their souldiers and citizens: all the blame els lay in the fouldiers themselves; Who to the end that nothing might go well forward and prosper under the leading and conduct of the Decemvirs, suffered themselves to their own shame, and dishonour of their captains, to be defeated: for the armies were both by the Sabines at Eretum, and also by the Equians in Algianm discomfitted. They that fled from Eretum in the dead of the night, had encamped and fortified upon an high ground nearer unto the city of Rome, between Fidene and Crustumenia. And when the enemie purioed them still and provoked them to fight, they would never come forth into the plain and even ground, to encounter with them I. in a pight battell, but flood upon their guard and defended themselves, trulting in the situation of the place and their rampier, and nothing upon their own manhood andforce of arms. But in Algidum they committed a more foul and beaftly fault, and received withall a greater loffe and overthrow; infomuch as having loft their camp with all their tents, the foldiers being turned out of bag and baggage, their harness and implements of necessary use, retired for refuge to Tusculum, hoping there to be entertained as guelts, and to live upon the protection, mercy and devotion of their holts and friends : who failed and deceived not their expection. But to Rome there came such fearfull news, that the Senatours and Nobles laying apart now all hatred against the Decemvirs, thought good to keep watch and ward in the citie: and commanded as many as were able to bear arms, to keep the wals and guard the gates: they gave order also to fend harnels and armour to suppy their want at Tusculum: moreover, That the Decemvirs should aban- M don the castle at Tusculum, and with their souldiers take the field and keep the camp : That they like wife should dislodge and remove from Fidene, that lay fortified there and remove into the countrie of the Sabines : so that by making wars upon the enemies first, they might scare and divert them from pursuing their intent of giving affault unto the citie of Rome. Besides these damages and foils fullained at the enemies hands, the Decemvirs committed both in war abroad, and also in the civic at home, two most wicked and horrible facts. For whereas one Le Siccius mur- L. Siccius, during their abode in the Sabines countrie (upon an odious conceit and malice against the Decemvirs) had gone up and down, and in fecret talke whilpered in the ears of the Common fouldiers, fome mention of creating Tribons, and of another infurrection and departure: him the Decemvirs dispatch before to spie out a convenient plot of ground to encamp in. Now N they had given those fouldiers in charge, whom they sent to accompanie him in that expedition to let him upon him in some fit place of advantage and to kill him. And kill him they did, but to their own colt : for whiles he fought in his own defence, some of those that laid for his mischiefe, died for it, and lay along about him for companie: for being a right flout and ftrong man of his hands, he flood to it contagiously: and notwithstanding he was befet round about, he derended humfelf very manfully. The reft that escaped bring word into the camp, that Siccine was fallen unawares into an ambushment, and whiles he fought lustily, was with certain other of the fouldiers flain. At the first, credit was given to him that brought the news. But afterwards, when as there was a band of fouldiers thither fent by the permiffion of the Decemvirs, to bury them that there lay dead : they observing none of their bodies there, to be disarmed and de-O spoiled, and Siccins lying in the midst of his armour, and all the rest of the dead with their faces towards him: no corps of enemie, nor footing of them departing from thence, brought away with them his dead carcaffe, and made report that undoubtedly and passe all peradventure, he was murdred by his own companie. Hereupon was the whole camp filled with harred and deteltation of this fact, and generally it was agreed, that Siccins forthwith should be convaied to Rome, had not the Decemvirs made halt to folemnize his funerals fouldierlike at the publike charges of the common treaturie. So interred was he with exceeding forrow and mourning

KK. and Decemvirs, might have not only the like fuccess and iffne, but also one and the self same cause, of losing their rule and dominion. Appine Claudius enamoured upon a virgin, a commoners daughter, lufted to the abule and spoil of her body. The father of the maiden L. Virginius, was of good calling, and in place of credit in the camp that layin Algidum, and had the leading there B of a company : a man of honest example and convertation of life; both at home and also abroad in warfare. His wife likewife of vertious disposition: so were their Children nurtured and taught accordingly. He had expossed and affianced his daughter in marriage to one L. Icilius, a man of flout courage (as having been Tribune) and whole verrue and valor had been well tried and approved in the quarrel and defence of the commonalty. This damiel in the prime of her years, paiting fair and beautiful withal, Appins (I fay) cast a fancy and liking unto and so burned in love of her, that he affayed with gifts and fair promiles to win her good wil. But feeing all guarded and furely fenced with maidenly flamefaltness and honefty, He bent his mind wholly to cruel and proud violence. He suborneth and setteth on a favorite and follower of his, one M. Claudius, to make challenge and lay claim unto her as his bond-maid Hand not to give place nor yeeld her C unto them, that required to have her at liberty out of his hands, during the juit, and until fhee brought proof of her freedom: supposing, because the father of the virgin was absent, he had good opportunity to work this feat, and compais his intended injury. As the maiden therefore was comming into the market place, (for there were the schools for peties kept, of reading and writing) the Decemvirs man (a broker to serve his iniffers luft) laid hold upon her, avowing that the was his bond-fervants daughter, and therefore his bond maid: commanding her to follow him, and threatning besides, that if the made any stays, he would have her away perforce. The fearful girl hereat was amazed, and her purse withal cried to the Quirits for help; whereupon the people came running and flocked together all about them. Now was the name of Virginia her father, and likewife of Icilius her spouse, very gracious and popular: so that the love and favour D wherein they food raifed friends and acquaintance : and the indignity of the thing befides; thoved the whole multitude to tender the cause of the damsel. When as there fore she was now past danger of violence, the party that made claim unto her, faid there was no need that the people thus should gather together, for his meaning was to proceed only by order of law, and hor with any violent course. And so he cited her to the court, minding to commence his action against her, and put her in suit. Then they that were present to affist her, perswaded her to follow. Now when they were come before Appias, fitting judicially upon his tribunal fear, the Plaintif. or challenger aforefaid, declareth against her, and telleth a tale ful wel known to the Judge himself, being the author and deviser of the whole matter and argument: Namely, that the maiden was born in his house, and by stealth was from thence conveied home to Virginius, and so was his E supposed and reputed daughter: this he averred to have certain knowledge of, by pregnant evidences and witnesses: and would make proof thereof to be most true, and let Virginius himself be the judg, whom the greater part of this wrong deeply touched : in the mean while, it was but meet and reason, that the bond-maid should go with her Matter. The friends and advocares of the damfel, having alledged and pleaded in her behalf, that Virginius was absent and employed in the affairs of Common-weal: and if he had word thereof, would not fail but be at home within two days: that it was no reason, that whiles a father was away, he should be in contention and controversie about his children: they required of Appear therfore to defer and put off the hearing of the whole matter, until her fathers coming, and that according to a law by himself in that case made and provided, he would grant her to be at large and fland at liberty, for to bring in proofs F that the was not bond: and that he would not suffer a maid of those years, ripe and ready for a husband, to be more in hazard and danger of her good name, then prejudiced in the trial of her freedom. Appius made a long preface and discourse before his decree, namely, how much he favoured and tendered the cause of liberty, and to that effect, alledged the self same law which the friends of Virginius pretended for their purpose and demand. But so far forth, and no otherwise, should there be in that law affured safeguard of freedom, as the case altered not in circumstante of causes and persons. For, this priviledge and benefit held only in those that were claimed to be free, where any man who oever might go to law and plead. As for her, who was in her fathers hand & at his disposition there was no other man else, unto whom the Master that maketh challenge, is to yeeld the right of his possession. His pleasure therefore was, and thus he decreed, That G the father should be sent for; and that in the mean season, he that made title to her, should not be prejudiced thereby, but that he might lead away the wench, promiting and affurning to have her forth-coming, and to present her in Court, at the return of him who is pretended and nomisated to be her father. Against this injurious decree, when as many men rather muttered and murmured, then any one durst refuse and contradict it, P. Numitorius, the maids Uncle by the mother fide, and Icilius her espoused husband, hapned to come in place: and having way made them through the throng and prefs, the multitude thought verily, that by the coming, especially of Icilius, Appius might have been refifted and croffed. But then the Lictor pronounced that

Appins, had passed an order and decree already, and put Icilius back: who cried out aloud (for so H manifest and horrib ea wrong had been enough to have moved a very Saint, and set on fire a right mild natured person.) " Nay, Appius (quoth he)thou hadit more need to set me back with "force of arms, if thou wouldst go clear away, and not be spoken to, for that which thou wouldst " do in hucker mucker. This maid, I tell thee, I mean shal go with me: I purpose to have her "to my telfe, an honest and pure virgin, and enjoy her in lawful marriage, as my wedded wife: " call therefore unto thee all the Lictors befides (thou were best) that belong unto thy compani-" ons: cause both rods and axes to be made ready: I tell thee, Icilius his espoused wife, shall not "abide in any place without her fathers house. What? although ye have taken from the Com-"mons of Rome the Tribuns affiftance and protection, and the priviledge of Appeal, two principal I "bulwarks for defence of their liberty: ye are not therefore allowed to rule and tyrannize, and to fulfilyour lust upon our children and wives too. Exercise your rigour and cruelty and spare "not, upon our backs and fides in foourging us, yea, upon our necks and heads alio, in taking them from our shoulders to ye forbear to assaul our chastity and honesty. Whereunto, if any "violence shall be offered, I will for my part, call for the help of the Quirites here present, in the behalf of my spoule; and Freginia for himself will call to the souldiers, in regard of his one by daughter: we will cry for help of God and man; and cost it shall our lives before thougo a way "with this decree, and put it in execution, I require and charge thee, O Appius therefore, to be "wel advised, and look how far thousoft proceed. Let Virginius when he is come, see to his "daughter, how he dealeth about her: and let him know thus much for certain, that if he give K "place to this plaintifs affertion, and forgo the present possession of her, he shall go seek his estate "and propriety that he hath in his daughter. As for me, in this quarrel of maintaining the freecc dom of my spouse, I will lose my life, before I fail in my faithful promise to her made. Hereat the whole multitude was moved, and like it was, that fome mutiny and fray would prefently have enfued. For the Lictors had hemmed in Icilius on every fide. Howbeit they proceeded no farther then to big words and high threats: whiles Appius laid hard to Icilius, "That he did not "this io much in the behalf and defence of Virginius, as, (being himselfan unruly person, and even "already breathing forth a Tribuns spirit) sought means, and picked occasion of an uproar and se-"dition, Howbeit for his part, he would not that day minister, unto him any matter thereof, And "that he might now wel know, that he did not this to feed his malapert fauciness, but in re- L gard of the absence of Virginius, and for the name of a father, and the tender respect of freedom, he would not that day fit to hear and determin the matter, nor award a definitive judgment in "that case: but would request Mar. Claudius, to suspend his action, and to forbear and yeeld so "much of his own right, as to suffer the maid to be bailed and go under sureties, and to be at her d liberty until the next day. But in case her father appeared not in Court the morrow after, he "gave Icilius, and such as he was, to wit and understand, that neither the law should want the " natronage of the maker, nor the Decemvir fail in courage and resolution: neither would he cal " together his fellow officers and fergeants, for to keep under fuch feditious and turbulent spirits 44 as he was : but would content himself with his own Lictors, and do wel enough. The time now of effecting this injury, being thus deferred, and the maids Advocates gone afide, they agreed first M of all upon this point, that a brother of Icilius, and a fon of Numitorius, two lufty and nimble young men, should be dispatched straight from thence to the gate: and that with all speed possible Virginius should be sent for home from the camp: for that it stood the maid upon, as much as her whole estate and life was worth; that he would be present and ready in due timethe day following, to preserve her from this hard course, and wrongful proceeding. According as they were bidden, they set forward, and spared no horsestesh, until they brought tidings hereof to her father, All this while the plaintif that made challenge to the maid, was very instant with Icilius to bail her, and put in sureties. And he again made answer, That he went about it as fast as hecould, and did nothing elfe: but indeed trifling out the time on purpose, until the messengers that were sent to the camp, were got afore welonward on their way. Then the whole multitude on all fides N held up their hands, in token that they offered themselves every one unto Icilius, ready to become bound. Whereupon, he burst our into tears for tender heart. Gramercy (quoth he) my maflers all, to morrow I wil use your helping hand: for this time I am sped of sureties enough. So was Virginia iet at liberty, and bailed by the suretiship of her kinssolk. Then Appius, after he had flayed a while, because he would not seem to have sat for that matter alone, when he saw all other fuits and causes omitted, in regard they had to it, and no man coming to him for justice, he arose, gat him home to his house, and wrote unto his brethren Decemvirs into the camp, that they should not give Virginius his pasport, but keep him fast in durance, and in ward. This wicked practife (as God would have it) came short. For Virginius already had got his discharge, and was departed forward on his journey, in the evening by the setting of the first watch. And very O early in the morning came the letters for to flay him, but all in vain. For Virginius by break of day was arrived: by which time the whole City resorted into the common place, standing and waiting earneftly for his coming. And thither he himself being in soiled and simple array brought his daughter in her old worn cloaths, accompanied with certain Wives, and a great number of Advocates and friends. Then and there began he to go from one man to another, and to labour them hard: and not only belought their affiftance by way of intreaty and prayer, but also required it as due and deserved : saying, that he stood dayly in field ready to fight in desence of their

A wives and children: neither could there be reported of any man more hardy exploits and valiant pieces of service in war, then of him self. But what booteth or availeth all this (quoth he) to fave the City from enemies, in case our children be forced to abide the utmost extremities that befal unto Cities taken by the enemies? thus went he about preaching, as it were, from one man to another. Likewise leiling cast forth and redoubled like speeches freely and spared not. But the train of women, with their fill and filent weeping, moved men more then any words uttered. All this notwithstanding, Appins in his obstinate mind (so disquieted was he and wholly possesfed with a forcible spirit of humorous madness rather then of amorous passion ascended up into the tri unal. Where, as the plaintif first of himself was framing some short complaint, that by rea-B fon of partial favour and making of great friends, he could not have law and justice the day past: before that either he had made an end of his demand, or given leature to Virginius for to put in his answer accordingly: Applus interrupted the speech, and began himself. What preamble it was that he made before his decree, peradventure some ancient writers have for truth recorded. But for as much as I cannot any where find in fo shameful a decree, that which carrieth but a shew and foundeth like a truth : therefore, that only which is of all agreed upon, I thought best to set down, even the fentence barely without any preface at all : namely, That he judged her in the behalfe of the Plantif to be his bond-fervant. First, all men there, wondered at this unworthy and foul act: and being ftrucken therewith aftonied, for a good while after, flood fill and held their peace. But afterwards, when as M. Cliudius, went to lay hand on the maid, amongst the dames C that flood bout her, and was received with a piteous lamentation, and cry of the women: Then Virgin as beckving with his hands and shaking them at Appins "To Icilius (quoth he) have "I betrothed my daughter and not to thee O Appens: brought her up I have for honelt and Virginius his sechalt wedrock, and not for unclean and filthy whordom to be a wife another day, and not an " harlot. As this the manner of it, like bruit and wild beafts without all regard, to leap and run er upon you care not whom, and to fulfil your fleshly lust? How these that be here wil suffer such er pranks, I know not: but they that are in camp with fword in hand, I hope, will never put them "up. Now when as he that challenged the maid was by a knot of Women and Advocates that flood about her repelled back, then proclaimed the Bedle and commanded filence. And the Decemvir having his head intoxicate, and alrogether carried away with unbridled luft, brake forth n and faid, That he had certain intelligence and was informed of a truth, by manifelt and affured evidences. (and not induced and led thereto by the reviting taunts of Icilius yesterday, and the violene proceedings of Virginius, whereof he had the people of Rome to bear witness, and which might give tome light and prelumptions) That the night pall, there were meetings and conventicles in the City, and all to taile a mutiny and interrection; and therefore he not ignorant of such a broil and riot toward, was come down into the common place with a guard of armed men: norminding to hurt any one that would keep the peace, but only by vertue of the majesty of goversment and authority, to repress fuch as troubled the peaceable state of the City: therefore it were best for them to be still and quiet. Go Sergeant (quoth he) cause the people to avoid the place, and make room for the matter to lay hand upon his bond, flave; and after le had thursdred it one these words full of ire and wrath, the multitude of themselves gave back and made way : fo the poor filly wench flood all forlorn and left as a prey to their injurious clutches. Then Warginius feeing all past help and no other remedy: Well Appius (quoth he) pardon me first I befeech thee if upon a fatherly affection and grief of heart. I have let fal some shrewd and curst words against thee more then was beiceming: Then, give me leave here before the virgin, to enquire of her nurse the truth of this matter, that if I have fathered her untruly, I may go hen; e better apayed and farisfied in my mind. Leave being granted, he led his daughter and the nurse apart from the rell, neer to the Church of Venus Cloacina, hard at the shops, called at this day Nova Tuber- Vaginia pitena, i.e. the new shops or standings: and there having caught a knife from a but her, he thus only killed by ipake : My sweet daughter, no other means have I but this only to set thee free : and so he struck her fither Vir-Pthe damiel to the heart and looking presently to the judgement seat, Here with this blood I sa- ginius. crifice thee Appias, and thy head to the Devil. Appias with the crie that arose upon so horrible a fact, being much troubled, commanded Virginius to be apprehended : but he with bloody blade in hand, made way where he went, until with a number that followed him apace to bear him company, he recovered the gate, Icilias and Numitorius took up the bloodle's corps, and held it aloft to the people: blathing and curring the wickedness of Appine: pitying the unhappy and unfortunate beauty of the damfel: and bewailing the hard exigent and extremity of the father. The Matrons followed after and cried: Is this the condition and fortune allotted unto parents for getting and bearing children? Is this the hire and reward of chaffity and virginity: with other like speeches, which in such a case, women in their grief of mind use to utter: whose forrow as it is G more heavy, proceeding from weak and tender hearts, so it yeeldeth and affordeth more pitiful and lamentable words, as they make their plaints and dolorous, moans. But the men and Icilius, above the reft, had no other talk but of the Tribunes authority, and the appeal unto the body of the people how they were taken a way from them, and of other publick indignities and common discontents. The whole multitude partly upon the hainousees of this wicked act, and partly for hope by this occation to recover againstheir liberties, were all up at on e in an uproar. Appins one while commanded Icilius to be called, another while for his disobedience and contumacy to be attached and convented before him. At the length, feeing no way made unto the Apparitors, for

to come by him. patfed himself with a crew of tall gentlemen of the Nobility that were of his H guard through the throng & commanded to have him away to prison. By which time there were gotten about Icilius not only the multitude, but the chief Captains and ringleaders of the multitude, L. Valerius and M. Horatius: who having thrust the sergeant back, said withal, that if Appius had any thing to charge him with by order of law, they would bail Icilius, and maintain his cause against him, who was but a private person: but if he went about to offer violence, he should foon meet with his matches. Hereupon grew a fierce brawl and broil. The Decemvirs officer fetteth upon Valerius and Hornius to lay hold upon them : but his rods were by the multitude broken to pieces. Then Appius getshimiup into the common place of audience, for to speak unto the people. Hormius and Valerius follow after him up, to do the like. Them the assembly heard with I patience, but they hifled at Appius and cried out against him. Then Valerius took upon him, and commanded the Listors to give attendance no longer upon a private person, Whereupon, Appius his heart was done and his courage quailed and fo standing in fear of his life, he was fain to cover his face, and to withdraw himself in disguised manner, and took an house over his head, neer unto the common place (unknown to his adversaries) there to save himself. Sp. Oppins, for to rescue and succour his Colleague, rushed from an other side into the place: and there he might see force and might to have got the upper hand of authority. After many devices and confultations, wherwith he was distracted, and framing himself to yeeld consent on every side, at length by the advice and perswasions of many there about him, in great fear he commanded the Senat to be called together. This appealed the multitude, for that they were in hope that (by means of the Senators, K who many of them, seemed to mislike the acts and proceedings of the Decemvirs) that government of theirs should come to an end. The Senat devised and took order, not to provoke the Commonstoo far: and withal to have a more provident and special eye, that the coming of Virginius into the camp, bred no mutiny in the army. Whereupon were fent certain of the puny Senators unto the holt, that lay encamped upon the hill Vecilius, who advertised the Decemvirs from the Senat, to endeavor all they could to keep the fouldiers in good order, from commotion and sedition. But there Virginius raised a greater uproar and tumust then he had left behind him in the City. For befides that, he was feen coming with a crew and train almost of four hundred men, who incensed with the indignity of the late accident, accompanied him voluntary from the City, his naked drawn knife, and himself besprinkled and embrued with blood, caused the whole L Campto turn their eyes upon him. Moreover, their gowns feen in fundry places within the camp, made a greater frew of citizens in number then was indeed. Being demanded of them what news, and what the matter was, he wept, and for a good while held his peace. At the last, when as now the multitude, that for fear ran confusedly together, began to stand still and keep silence he declared orderly from the beginning to the end, every thing in particular, as it was done. Then lifting up his hands to heaven, and calling to all his companions and fellow fouldiers, he befought them not to impute that foul act unto him, whereof in truth Appius Claudius was the author and cause : nor to detest and abhor him as a parricide and murderer of his own children: saving, that his daughters life was more dear unto him then his own, if the might have lived free and honestly. But when he saw her once haled by force, as a bond-maid to be ravished and made a strumpet, M he thought it better to be bereft of his children by death, then by contumely and reproach : and so upon meer pitifulness incurred the shew and appearance of cruelty. And but that he reposed fome hope in the aid of his fellow fouldiers, trufting that they would be revenged for his daughters death, he would not have remained a livefman after her. I know well (faith he) that you also have daughters, fifters and wives of your own: And it is not the death of my child that hath killed and morrified the lust of Appins, but rather the longer it escapeth unpunished, the more outragious and unbridled would it be. So that by the calamity of another man, ye are well taught and warned to beware of the like injury. As for me, I have buried my wife before, who died on Gods hand : and now my daughter, for that she might not finish the course of her days, with the fafety of her maiden head and chastity, hath died, I confess, a pitiful and lamentable, but yet an N honest kind of death. As to Appins, (quoth he) now can he not fulfil his lust in this my house: and for any other violence of his what loever, I carry the same mind and heart still, to detend mine own body, wherewith I have already faved my daughters. Now let other men look to themfelves and their children, as well as they can. As Virginius uttered these speeches aloud, the whole multitude with one accorderied and protefled, they would not fail, but both revenge his grief, and maintain their own freedom. The Citizens also in their side gowns, intermingled among the fou diers, made the self same complaints: shewing how much more horrible those things were in the eye to be seen in fact, then they could found unto the ear by bare relation: and withal reported, how at Rome the matter was well neer dispatched already, for that there were certain come after them, even hard at their heels from thence, who brought word that Appius had like o to have been murdered, and was departed into exile: and so far prevailed they with them, that they gave the alarme, plucked up their standards, and took their way to Rome. The Decemvirs being fore troubled, both at these present occurrents which they evidently saw, and also to hear these news, in what bad tearms all things stood at Rome, ran up and down, here one, and there another, into fundry parts of the camp, for to appeale the tumult. When they went to work mildly and gently, they had not a word of them again: but if any one laid his commandment upon them, and extended his authority, they would beard them and answer, That they were men, and

A more then that men in arms and fouldiers. Thus march they in order of battel toward the City. and take the mount Aventine, and there lettle themselves. And as they encountred any, all their fong was this, to exhort and encourage the Commons to recover their franchifes, and to create Tribuns of the Commonalty. Not a word was heard elfe, tending to any violence. Oppius affembled the Senat together: where it was agreed, not to proceed by way of rigonr in any case: for as much as they themselves had given the occasion of sedition. But three ancient personages, such as had been Confuls, were fent Commissioners in Embassage, as it were, Sp. Tarpeius, C. I. lius, and Publius Sulpitius with commission, to demand of them in the name of the Senat, by whose commandment they had abandoned the camp, or what their intent was thus in war-like manner to B keep the Aventine: and why leaving to war with their enemies, they had thus invaded their native Country: They were not to feek of an answer, only there wanted a man to give the answer: for as yet they were grown to no certain head, upon whom they might rely : and fingly by themselves they durst not incurribe hatred and dangerous displeasure that might ensue. This only the multitude with one voice cried aloud, to fend L. Valerius, and Marcus Horatius unto them for to those they would make a resolute answer. The Commissioners being dilmissed, Virginius putteth the fouldiers in mind, and advertifeth them, how erewhile in a matter not of the greatest importance, they were intear and perplexity, because the multitude was without an head; and how an answer was returned, although not altogether upprofitable and befides the purpose, yet agreed upon at a venture, and not proceeding from any publick counsel. But now his opinion was, that C there should be ten chosen to bear soveraign rule: who for the honour of warfare and souldiery, should be called military Tribuns. And when this dignity was to him offered first, Nay (quoth he) referve still these your good perswations and judgments of me, unto more happy days and favourable times both to me and you. For neither doth the remembrance of my daughter fuffer me to take joy of any honour in this life, nor (as the state standeth now troubled) is it good for you to have them to be your Magistrates, who of all other are most exposed to ill will and dipleasure. and in neerest danger to be hardly shought of If I may serve you in any stead, you may make bold, and haveno less the ofme, remaining still a private person. So they create Tribuns military, ten in number. But all this while was the army as unquiet in the Sabins country. For even there also, by the instigation of Icilius and Numitorius, the souldiers fell away from the Decemvirs and departed. For their minds were no less troubled and disquieted with the remembrance renued, ot the late murder of Siccius, that kindled and fet on fire by the fresh news of the death of Virginia, so villanously, so shamelesty laid unto and challenged, and all to satisfie the lust of another. Icilim, so soon as he heard say, that there were ten military Tribuns created in Aventine, searing lest the Election in the City should follow the prerogative of the military Election in the camp, as a predecent to create the felf lame men Tribuns of the Commons, being a man well feen and experienced in these popular affairs, and reaching himself at the same dignity and promotion, wrought to with his adherents and friends, that before they went to the City, they should likewise elect the felf fame number with equal authority. Who entred the City with banners displayed, at the gate Colling, and marched through the midt thereof in warlike order, up to the Aventine. And E there joining and uniting themselves unto the other army, they gave in charge to the twenty military Tribuns, to create out of their number twain for loveraign governors to rule all. So they cledted Marcus Oppius, and Sextus Maniliu. The Senators being ingreat care for the Common-weal, fat in Councel every day: where they spent time oftner in wrangling and jarring, then in sage advice and politick counsel. The murdering of Siccius, the wanton lust and loose life of Appius, the shameful diigraces received in the wars, were laid in the Decemvirs dish. At length they concluded, that Valerius and Horati-201 should go to the Aventine. But they refused and would not go, but upon condition that the Decemvirs would give up the Enfigns and Ornaments of that Magistracy and government, which by right they should have forgon and departed from, a full year before. The Decemvirs were grie-F ved and complained, thus to be fet down & made no better then private men, andiaid flarly they would not be deposed from their place of rule, before those laws were fully enacted and confirmed, for which at first time they were created. The Commons having intelligence by Duilling (who had been a Tribun of the Commons) that by reason of continual debate and contention in the Senat house, there was nothing done and agreed upon, removed from the Aventine unto mount Sacer. For Duillius ceased not to suggest, and plainly affirm unto them, that the Senators and An-

mind of the constant resolution of the Commons: and that they should well know, that matters would never be seeded and brought to concord, without they restored unto them their powGer and authority again. So they take their way by Nomensans Fish, which at that time was named Ficulenss, and encamped themselves in the mountain Sacer; doing no harm to any creature as they passed along: following therein the modelty of their forestathers. The whole Commonalty followed after the host: there was not one who for age was able to travel on foot, that drew back and tarried behind. Their children and wives bare them company, in piteous wise moaning the selves, and asking them: whereto they would leave them behind in that City, where neither their honest chasting might be guarded, not yet their liberty secured and kept sate. When as now, by reason of his uncount and strange desolation, all seemed at Rome waste and void, cients of the City would never fadly think upon any care and provision to be made, until they faw the City abandoned and desolate : moreover, That the mount Sacer would put them in and none to be seene in the publick place, besides a few of aged men; and when the Senators were H called into the Senate house, the common place appeared empty, naked and forlom: then there were more befides Horatius and Valerius that cried out and faid. What look you for fill my LL of the Councel? What? and if the Decemvirs will make no end of their peevish frowardness, will ye let things run at fix and seven, until all come tumbling down, or be of a light fire? And what goodly dominion is this, that you embrace so in your arms, that you clip and hold so fast? Will ye minister justice and give laws to empty houses and bare walls? Are ye not abashed and a-" shamed, that there should be seen in the Place, a greater number well neer of your Lictors and " officers, then of gowned Citizens, and of all other men whatfoever? How and if the enemies "Thould come against the City, what would ye do? Nay, what if shortly the Commons should I manh in arms, seeing we weigh their insurrection and departure so lightly? And when these and such like reasons were on all hands often alledged and laid K abroad, the Decemvirs overweighed with the general confent and unity of the house, promised: That seeing it was so thought good, they would be wholly ordered and ruled by the Senators. This only they befought at their hands, and admonished them of, by way of a proviso, that they would take order for the fafety and fecurity of their perfons; and not by shedding their blood to flesh the Commons, and to train them up, and acquaint them with exercising cruelty upon the nobles and Senators. Then were Valerius and Horatius ient with commission to reclaim and call home the Commons, upon such conditions and capitulations, as they should think convenient: yea, and to fet all things in good order and make a final composition, with a special charge to provide for the safeguard of the Decemvirs, against the raging ire and violence of the multitude. These mediators took their journey, and were received into the camp with exceeding joy of the L Commons, as being doubtles, their very saviours and redeemers, approved both in the beginning of their troubles, and now also at the very end and upshot of all. In regard whereof, they were welcomed with thanksgiving. Icilius was the mouth of the multitude, and their prolocutor. Who when they came to debate and reason about the articles of covenants, and that these Delegates and Committees, required of the Commons, What the demands and points were that they flood upon? Being already provided aforehand of purpose what to say, demanded such conditions, as it mons in mount was well feen, that they reposed more hope, and relied themselves rather in equity, and indifferency, than inforce of arms, Forthey require, Imprimis, to have the Tribuns power onfoot again, and the appealing unto the people revived: which before the creation of the Decemvirs had been the only help and succour of the Commons. Item, that no man should be called in question, nor M any way touched in life, limb, or goods for gathering the fouldiers or Commons together by way of commotion, for recovering again their liberties and franchifes. Only, their demand concerning the punishment to be inflicted upon the Decemvirs, savoured of cruelty. And if e-" ver at any time you mean to shew your selves dread and to be seared, when you have once re-" covered your Magistrates and Ordinances again, when ye have the law in your own hands to " censure and judge according to your own discretion, then may ye give your doom of our lives "and goods, as each cause requireth. Now for this time it sufficeth, that ye claim and have your o 66 freedom again, Hereupon they all submitted themselves to the deputed Delegates, permitting them to do what they would. Who feeing they had brought all matters to fo good a conclusion, promised to return with all speed. So they took their leave. And when they had declared to the Senators the demands of the Commons, all the rest of the Decemvirs, perceiving no mention at all made of their punishment (a thing more then they looked or hoped for)denied no one point thereof. But Appius, a man of a fell and cruel nature, and who above all the other was most odious, and lay open to the malice of the people, and measuring the harred of others toward himA felf, by his own spleen that he bare against other men: "I wot well (quoth he) what ill fortune wil "betide me shortly: and I see plainly, that our adversaries hold off to wrangle and consend with " us no longer then until they have weapons given in their hands. Then was an A& made by the Senat, that the Decemvirs out of hand should surrender their place : and that Q.Furise the Arch-Bishop or High Priest, should create Tribuns of the Commons: provided always expressly, that the mutiny of the fouldiers, and insurrection of the Commons should turn no man to displeasure and harm. As this multitade passed along forward, they were encountred upon the way, with another joyful company from out of the camp. Who rejoyced mutually one in the behalf of the other, that both freedom and concord were reflored to the City again. Then the mediators in the general affembly of them all tpake and faid: "To the great good, happiness and felicity of you and of the C. Great was the accord, alacrity and cheerfulness, that they shewed in approving all that was propounded. So from thence they turn their standards and enfigns, and as they marched to to Rome, they throve with all they met on the way, who could they most joy and gladness: they Common creepass on through the City armed as they were, yet peaceably and without noise, until they came ated again. into the wentine. Sicinius election of descended from him in right line who was the first Trib, of Comm, created in mount Sacer, (as we find in records) and M. Duillius, who before the chufing of Decemvirs, had right worthily and notably born the Tribun(hip, and in all combats and commotions with the Decemyirs fluck close to the Commonalty and never failed them. After these were elected, more for hope then any former detert, M. Titinius, M. Pomponius, C. Apronius, Ap. Julius, C. Oppius. Then C. Iciliss immediately in the very entrance into the Tribunship, preferred a bill unto the Commons, and the Commons enacted it. That the departure and infurrection of the common people against the Decemvirs should not be laid to any mans charge, nor bring him into trouble. Then without farther delay M. Duilling went through with an act of his own to wit. That there should be Con-E fuls created, with refervation of liberty to appeal unto the people. All thele things paffed in the Comices of Commons, affembled in the meddows named Flaminia, which now they cal Circus

Then, by an Inter-regent were Confuls created, L. Valerius and M. Horatius, who prefently Confuls elections began their government. Whose popular Consulfhip, as it was without wrong doing to the Se-ed against nators and Nobles, fo it was not without some offence committed of their part: For what soever was provided for the liberties of the Commons, they supposed it abridged somewhat of their power and authority. And first and formost, whereas it was a question and controverse not well cleared in law. Whether the Nobles were boundto stand to the Acts of the Commons: they made a law now in a general Session, by the sustrages of the Centuries, That what ordinance soever the F Commons (being parted by Tribes) had by their voices granted, it should comprise and bind the whole body of the people. By which law, the Tribunsacts were armed with a most sharp and keen weapon to strike withal. Moreover, The other Consular law concerning Appeal, the only fort and flrength of liberty, which by the Determirs absolute power had been overthrown, they not only revive again, but also fortifie the same for the time to come, by making a rew law, forbidding expressy that no man should create any magistrate absolutely without the liberty of appealing: and whosoever should creat any such, he might rightfully and lawfully be killed, and that murder should not be counted a capital crime. And when they had sufficiently strengthned the Commons, on the one fide with the benefit of appealing, and on the other fide with the Tribuns power in favour of the Tribuns themselves, that they also might seem sacrosanct and inviola-G ble (a thing now almost grown out of remembrance) they renewed that high priviledg, with certain folemn ceremonies, which having been of long time laid afide & neglected, were now brought up again and put in ure. And they ordained them to be inviolate as well in a reverent regard of religion and scruple of conscience, as also by a special law in that behalf provided : namely, that whofoever hurt either Tribuns of the Commons, Ediles, Judges, or Decemvirs, his head should be ac- * Proferoing) curied and devoted to Jupiter and his family fold in port-fale at the Church of Ceres. Liber & Li- fecunda berg. By vertue of this Act, the great Expontors of the law deny that any man is a facrofanct or man, & cic. inviolable: but (fay they) it is enacted only, That wholoever hurt any of them, shall be accurred.

And therefore, an Ædile may be attached and led away to prison by superior Magistrates. Which H although it be not warranted by law (for he is hurt, who by this law ought not to be hurt) yet it is a good argument to prove, that an Ædile is not inviolable. Marry, as for the Tribuns, they were indeed by vertue of an ancient oath of the Commons, at what time as they first created that power and authority, inviolable: as they would feem to expound and make construction of the law. Others have been, that thus open and interpret the law, That in this felf same Act of Horatius, the Confels alto, yea, and Pretors too, because they are created by the same auspicia or bird-figns that the Confuls be) were comprised, and had the benefit thereof. For a Conful is called by the name of a Iudg. But that exposition is consuted, for that in those days it was not the manner to tearm the Conful a Judge, but the Pretor only, And thus much concerning the Confular Laws. I

The same Consuls also brought up this order and custom, that all the Acts of the Senat should be brought into the Church of Ceres, and prefented unto the Ædiles of the Commons: which aforetime were suppressed and smothered, yea, and corrupted or perverted at the will and pleasure of the Confuls. After all this, M. Duillius a Tribune of the Commons, propounded unto the Commons a Law, and they let it pais and granted it, That who over should leave the Commonalty destitute of their Tribuns, or create any Magistrate absolute without Appeal, should be scourged, and lose his headfor it. Allthese Acts, as they passed against the wills and minds of the Nobles : fo they went clean without their contradiction : for that, all this while hitherto, there was no rigour and leverity that leemed to extend and reach to any one particular person among them. But afterwards, when as both the Tribuns power, and alio the Commons freedom, were once K well and furely grounded . Then the Tribuns, supposing now it was full time, that they might tafely and without peril give the onfet upon them, feverally one by one, made choice of Virginius to bethe first accuser or plaintif, and Appius Claudius the first desendant. And Virginius had not so foon arrested Appins to answer at a day, and Appins come down into the Common place, guarded with a company of tall young gentlemen of the Nobility: but presently upon the fight of him and his guard about him, the remembrance of that most cruel and detettable tyranny was refreshed and renued. Then Virginius: "Speeches (quoth he) and Orations were devised for doubtful " causes: and therefore will I neither spend time in accusing him before you, from whose cruelty " ye have by force of arms delivered your selves: nor suffer this wretch, over and besides his other "wicked pranks, to shew in the defence of himself his audacious impudence. Therefore, as tou- L "ching all other lewed parts of thine and wicked defignments, O Appius, which thou half for "these two years ungratiously and impiously enterprized and practised one on the neck of ano-

"ther, I will do thee some favour, and pardon thee: but for one crime only, unless thou canst er acquit thy selfe the better, namely, that thou being the Judge, against all order of Law, didst "not grant unto the party defendant, the benefit of liberty to go at large, during the time of the "fuit depending, until the might bring proofs of her freedom; for this, I tay, I command thee "to prison. Now had Appins no hope at all, either in the Tribuns helping hand, or in the doom and judgement of the people. Howbeit he both called upon the Tribuns for succour: and also feeing himself tugged and haled away by the officer, and no man to stay his hand: I appeal (quoth he) unto the people. This one word in maintenance of freedom, being heard to come out of that M mouth, that lately had given sentence on his side that impeached the freedom of one, and challenged the party for bond, caused silence. And when every man to himself secretly muttered in this wile: "I see well (when all is done) there are Gods in Heaven, and such Gods as neglect nor "the affairs of mortal men, Pride and cruelty (although it be long first) at length will jurely have " a fall, and throughly be punished. Lo, how he is now fain to appeal, who aforetime abolished " and took away all appeal: he humbly craveth relief of the people, who heretofore trod under "foot all rights and franchifes of the people: and fee how he is carried to prison, destitute and de-"prived of the benefit of liherty, who awarded and adjudged a free body to bandage and servi-"tude, Amidst these words, I say, that might be overheard in that confused humming of the assembly bly, Appius also was perceived to call unto the people of Rome for relief and mercy. He reckoned N "up withal, the deferts of his ancestors in the behalf of the C. W. both at home in the City, and Appius moveth "abroad in the wars: he alledged his own unhappy affection (when time was) to the Commothe people in a malty of Rome, and partaking with them: and namely how with the exceeding displeasure of the "Nobility, he refigned up his Consulship, and all for to bring in and establish equal and indifferent "laws to both parties. He rehearfed moreover his own laws, which not with thanding they remai-"ned fill in force and ftrength, he, the law-giver himself, was going to prison. But concerning his "own proper parts and deferts good or bad, he would then make trial thereof (he faid) when he " should be permitted judicially to make his defence: as for the present time, he pleaded the com-"mon benefit of the City, to wit, that being a Citizen, he might at the appointed day, speak for "himself & stand to the doom of the people neither feared he the hatred & malice of men so much o "asto repose no hope at all in the equity and mercy of his neighbors and tellow Citizens. But and 44 if he were cast into prison and not suffered to come unto his answer, then he would once again "call upon the Tribuns of the Commons for their help, and admonish them, not to follow and "imitate them, whom they would feem to hate. And in case the I ribuns will be known and avow "that they are linked in the same bond and covenant to abolish and take away the enefit of cal-"ling unto any one of them by way of mediation (against which they have charged & blamed the "Decemvirs for complotting & agreeing together) then he faid, that he appealed unto the people.

A " and had recourse for succour unto the laws concerning appeal, made as well by Consuls as Tri-"bunes, that present year and no longer ago. For who may ever hereaster (quoth he) have bene-" fit of appeal, if it be not lawful for me, who ftand yet not condemned, nor attainted, and have " not pleaded formy felf? what Commoner, what mean person may find relief by those laws, if 66 Appress Claudius may not? It will be seen in me, and my example shall be a precedent and proof to others, Whether by these new statutes, lordly rule, or equal liberty be established: whether " the calling for help by way of mediation & intercession, or by plain appealing against the wrong-"ful proceedings of Magistrates, be granted in very deed, or but onely pretended in bare shew. " under vain colourable pretences and foolish Letters Patents. Against all this, Virginius made his

B rejoinder and faid, That Appins was the man alone exempt out of all benefit of laws, and excluded from all civil and humane fociety. "Let men but look back toward the tribunal feat, the ve- The replicati-"ry well-head, as it were, and receptacle, the fortress and hold of all wickedness: whereon that on of Puginis " perpetual Decemvir practifing his cruelty upon the goods, the bodies and lives of free citizens, "menacing whipping and executing hangmans work unto all persons; a contemner both of God " and man, guarded with a crue of executioners and butcherly tormentors, rather then Sergeants, " proceeding on from spoil and bloodshed to set his hart on leachery & carnal lust splucked a maid "by birth free, from out of the very arms of her father, as if the had been taken captive in war; "and that, in the fight of the people of Rome, and gave her away to one of his followers, even to a

Amid these affairs, there came to Rome Embassadors from the Latins and Hernicks, to congratulate, and to shew their joy and great contentment, for the unity and concord between the Nobles and the Commons: in token wereof, they brought as a present unto Jup. Opt. Max. a crown of gold, not very maffie in weight, but according to their ability, which was not much, yet answerable to their devotion: which men performed rather with religion and zeal in those days, than in portly shew and magnificence. By relation and intelligence from them they were certified also that the Æquians and Volicians prepared war with all the power they could make, E Whereupon, the Confuls were commanded to part their provinces between them. To Horstins befel the Sabins, and to Valerius the Equians and Volscians. And when they had proclamed mufters against these wars, such was the forward affection and favour of the Commons, that not only the younger folk, but also a great fort of these that by law were dispensed with, and discharged from warfare, and lived of their pensions, offered their voluntary service, and were ready to enter their names into the muster-Masters book: whereby the army was not only in number greater, but also for the goodness of men, more puissant, as having the old, beaten, and experienced souldiers among them. But before they went out of the City, the Decemviral laws (which now are known by the name of the twelve Tables,) they fet up openly to be feen, engraven in brafs.

" ceffire. The Tribun let him down a day (before hand) to plead for him lelf and make his answer.

Some writers have delivered, that the Ædiles performed this office, as they had it in charge The Laws cal-F from the Tribunes. C. Claudius, who upon a detestation and deep hatred of the Decemvirs lewed led the twelve and wicked enormities, but especially above all others, of the infolent pride of his brothers for, Tables. which he could no longer abide, had removed and departed to Regillus, his old native country. He being now a very aged man, returned to fue and intreat for his deliverance out of danger. whose vices he abhorred: and in sullied weed and poor array, accompanied with those of his linage, and other his followers and vaffals, went through the common place, and laboured every man one by one, "Befeeching them not to fet that brand of ignominy, and bring fuch a " frain upon the house and name of the Claudii, as that they should be thought worthy of impri- C. As for himself, " he protested that he did thus much for kindred and names take. Neither was he reconciled un-"to him, and they made triends again: yet could he wish, that his adverse fortune and poor con-"dition were relieved. Concluding with this in the end, that as their liberty was recovered again, by vertue & prowefs, so the concord of all degrees & estates might be established sure by clemency.

"ther, of him and his daughter, and to give ear to the prayers and supplications, not of the Clau-" dii, who have had the day, and tyrannized over the Commons but to the neerest friends of Vir-" ginia, the three Tribunes, who being created for the aid and fuccour of the Commons, do now themselves implore and beseech the help and affistance of the Commons. And verily these tears were thought more reasonable, and like to speed. Thus when Appius saw all means of hope cut off, before the forefaid day appointed was come, killed his own felf. Soon after this, Sp. Oppius, who of all the rest unto Appius, was most hated: for that he was in the City at the very time when this unjust doom and sentence of his Colleague happed to be pronounced, was attached by I P. Numitorius. But Oppius was the worse thought of and more prejudiced, by occasion of an injury by himself done, then for not stopping the wrong intended by Appras to Virginia. For a witnesse was produced to depose against him, one, who having served in the wars seven and twenty years, had been rewarded and honoured extraordinarily eight times. This valiant fervitor, thus adorned with those gifts and marks of valour, in the view and fight of the people of Rome rent his garments, and shewed his back and sides, and the skin all broken with scourging : beseeching no other favour, but if Oppins the party accused, could justly charge him with any trespals and offence by him committed he should not spare him, but now a private person as he was, exercise and redouble his cruelty upon him once again. Well, Oppius likewife was had to prison: and there before the law day, ended his life. The goods of App us and Oppus both, the Tribuns did confii- K cate. Their com-partners and fellow Decemvirs fled their country and were banished, and all their goods also were for feit & conflicat. And not so much as M. Claudius, the party that laid claim unto Virginia elcaped, but he was arrefted to answer at a certain day, and was condemned. Howbeit Virginins of himself released him his life, and would not take the extremity, so he was sent away and confined to Tybur, as it were into banishment. Thus the poor spirit and ghost of Virginia, more happy after her death, then fortunate during her life, having wandered abroad, and haunted fo many houses for due revenge of her adversaries : at last, when there was not one guilty person of them left unpunished, gave over her walking, and rested quiet.

Now were the nobles in exceeding fear, beholding the fame countenance already in the Tribung, which they had observed in the Decemvirs. But then M. Duillius, a Tribune of the Commons, L. wiselv and politickly restraining and keeping within a mean this excessive power of theirs: "We "have enough (quoth he) both of our own liberty, and also of revenge of our enemies: and therce fore I will not suffer for this year, any man more to be arrested or imprisoned. For I do not like er that old faults done and pait, and now as it were cancelled and raied out, should be revived a-" gain, and brought in quettion, fince that by the punishment of the Decemvirs, satisfaction hath et been made for the new and the continual care and diligence of the Confuls both twain, for the " maintenance of your freedom affureth me, that nothing will be committed hereafter, that may require and need the power of the Tribunes. This moderation at the first hand of the Tribun, put the Nobies out of their fear : but made the Confuls to be thought the worle of, (for that they had been so addicted wholly to the commonalty) in that a Magistrate of the Commons had more M regard of the lafety and liberty of the Nobles, than the proper Magistrate of the Nobility : and because the adverse part had their ful of revenge and punishment of the Nobles, before it did appear that the Contuls would once feem to stop the course and stream of their licention snels. And many there were who gave it out, that the Confuls bare themselvs too remiss and slack in the matter, and little respected the good and credit of the Nobles, in that they had approved & confirmed the Acts that were proposed by the Tribuns. And no question, troubled as the state was their of the C. W. they were forced to give place, and do according to the necessity of the time. When the Confuls had fet all things in good order within the City, and forely grounded the flate of the Commonalty, they went either of them into their own Province, Valerius against the armies of the Equians and Volícians, which now had joined together in Algidum: where ful po-N lirickly he held off, and stood upon his defence only for if out of hand he had put it to the hazard of a battel, I cannot tell, but I greatly doubt/confidering how the hearts of Romans and enemies both, were affected presently upon the unfortunat conduct of the Decemvirs) it would have turned to their great loss, and cost them an overthrow. He therfore having encamped a mile off from the enemies kept his foundiers within the camp. The enemies ranged in battel array took up the whole ground between both camps,& when they made bravado's, and challenged them to come forth and fight, not one Roman would answer them again. At length the Voltains and Æquians, weary with long standing still, and in vain expecting battel, thinking verily that the honor was in manner yeelded unto them, departed: fome into the country of the Hernicks, other fome to the territories of the Latins, for to raise booties and make spoil: leaving behind them rather a com-O petent guard for defence of the camp, then a sufficient power to maintain a field fight. Which when the Conful perceived, he paid them again with the like measure of lear, as they before had from them received; and with his army ready embattelled, bids them battel: who being privy to themselves what forces were wanting, forbare to fight; whereupon the Romans presently took a better heart unto them, and made account that their enemies were overcome, being in such a fear within their rampart. When they had stood thus a who e day ready to fight, they retired back in the evening and gave place to the night. And the Romans full of good hope, refreshed

A their bodies and made much of themselves, but the enemies nothing so hearty and couragious. fend out messengers every way in searful hast, to call again the forragers. Such as were near at hand came running back into the camp: those that were farther off, could not be found nor met withal: Now when it was once day light, the Romans issue forth of the camp, intending to give an affault upon the Rampier, unless they would come forth and fight. But when it was far forth day and the enemies stirred not at all, the Consul commanded to advance with their ensigns. The Acquians and Volscians seeing their battell coming forward, began to chase and take foul disdain. for very shame that their rampier and trench should protect victorious armies within the camp rather than their weapons and valour defend them in plain and open field: and were earnest B likewise themselves with their Generals for the signal of battell, and at length after much impor-

tunity obtained it. Now were some of them sallied out at the gates already: and others followed hard after at their heels, keeping their array, and every man coming orderly into his file and rank. By which time, the Roman Coss, before the battel of the enemies stood surely surnished with their full frength, came on fill and gave the onfet: charged them before they were all come forth, yea, and erethey were well marshalled that came abroad, being a multitude, waving (as it were) to and fro every way for fear, and looking about themselves, and to their fellows: and to amuze their troubled heads the more, he affails them with a great shout and main violence. At first the enemies gave back: but after they had gathered their ipirits together, and were come again to themselves, and that their Captains on every side rated them, and asked them whether C they would yeeld unto them, whom before they had overcome, the fight began again to be renued. "The Conful on the other part, willed the Romans to remember, that this was the first

"day, wherein they being newly let free, were to fight likewife for the freed City of Rome: and "therefore they were to win a victory for themselves, and not after victory gotten, to be a prize Consulto his "for any more Decemvirs to prey upon. For they fought not now under the conduct and itan-foulders, "dard of Apping, but of the Conful Valerius: who as he was descended from the deliverers of "the people of Rome, to he was one of them himself: exhorting them to shew now, that in for-"mer battels of late dayes, it was long of the leaders and not of the fouldiers, that they atchieved

" no victories: faying, it were a foul shame for them, to have had more stomack against their " own neighbours and citizens, than heart against their enemies; and to have stood more in fear D" of servitude at home, than of bondage abroad. As for Virginia, she was but one, whose honesty "and chaffity was in time of peace hazarded: and Appens it was only, and none but he, that in " regard of his unbridled and dissolute lust, was the dangerous citizen. But if the fortune of war " should fail on our side, and go against us, then shall our children all be in jeopardy, to be abu-"fed and spoiled at the hands of many thousands of enemies. Unwilling I am (quoth he) to "prefage fuch miferies and to prognotlicate to the City those calamities, which both Iupiter "and our flock-father Mars, forbid and hinder to light upon it, founded upon so lucky figns and "happy foretokens, at the first beginning: I put you in mind rather of the Aventine Hill, and Mount Sacer : that where within thele few months you recovered your freedom, thither ve "may carry back again your Empire, fafe and found, unsteined and unfoiled: that all the World E"may fee that Roman fouldiers are as forward and nobly minded after the banishing of the De-"cemvirs, as they were before their creation: and that by the bringing in of equal and indiffece rent Laws, the manhood and prowels of the people of Rome, is no whit decayed nor dimi" nished. Having uttered these words among the enfigns of the footmen, he made speed to the seconnets of the Horlemen. Go to, brave gallants (quoth he) excel the footmen in valour and "and chivalry, like as ye exceed them in honor and degree. At the very first shock and en-counter, the footmen forced the enemy to retreat; and being now retired to your hand, set "fours to, gallop after them apace, and chase them out of the plain field: they will never abide "your violent charge: for even already they are at a bay, and stand rather at a stay, than make any refistance. Herevoon they gird out luftily, and run their horses among the enemies, dis-

F ordered already, and in difarray by the service of the sootmen. And having broken through their ranks, and paffed forth even to the rereward: certain of them cast about in the void and open ground, and when the enemies were about on all fides to fly, they turned most of them away from their camp, and overriding them, they got between them and home, and scared them wholly from thence. The footmen and the Conful himfelf, with the whole strength of the main battell, made forward to the camp, affailed the tents, won them, and befides a great flaughter, obtained a booty far greater.

When news of this battel was brought, not only into the City, but also to the other army into the Sabins country, it was received in the City with joy only and folemnity: but in the camp it fet the fouldiers hearts on edge, and enkindled them to strive for the like honor and renown. G Now had Horatius already partly by fending his fouldiers forth to make incursions and outrodes: and partly by training and proving them in light skirmishes, enured and acquainted them to trust to themselves, and have considence in their own good service, rather than to remember the shamefull difgrace and foil, received under the leading of the Decemvirs. And even those small bickerings had done them much good already against they should venture upon a set field, and heartned them in affured hope to win the victory. The Sabins again for their part, still lust y upon their good success the year before, cealed not to provoke and urge their enemies: very oft asking them what they meant after the guile of robbers, to run in and out in small companies, so to trifle out the time, and thus by peece meal to make of one entire battel many petty and small skirmishes? H Why rather fought they not one field for all, and without more ado, hazzard all upon a cast, and commit the whole to the trial of fortune, to fee unto what fide she will incline. Then the Romans, befides that of themselves they had gathered heart and courage enough, were with the indignity of this hallenge also set on fire : confidering, that when the other army was at the point now, with victory to return into the City, their enemies began to infult and crow over them with reproachful tearms: and if now they were not meet and even with them, when should they ever be able to make their parts good? So foon as the Conful perceived the fouldiers thus to mutter and mumble within the camp, he affembled them all together, and thus hespake: "Sirs (quoth "he) what success hath been, and how the service hath sped in Algidum, I suppose you have al- I " ready heard, namely, such as beseemed the army of a freestate and people. By the policy of my "fellow Conful, and the manhood of his fouldiers together, atchieved is the victory. As for my " felf, that course will I take, and that resolute mind will I carry, which you my souldiers shall "afford unto me. The war may be drawn out in length profitably: it may be also dispatched and "ended speedily: If protracted it shallbe, look how I have begun already to train you, with the "fame discipline still I wil exercise you, and bring to pass, that your hope and proweis may encrease every day more then other. If your hearts now serve you wel, and that you like to fight it out, "Go on in the name of God, and in token of your willing heart and valorous prowels, now fet " up such a cry and shout, as you wil make when you first join battel, and give the charge. After that they had with exceeding cheeriulness shouted aloud: God bless us all (quoth he) I wilful- K fil your defire, and bring you forth to morrow into the field for to fight. So the rest of that day was best owed in making their harness and weapons ready. When the morrow was come, the Sabins fo foon as they perceived the Romans ranged in battel array, came forth also themselves, as ready and defirous of fight, as they. Here was a battel flruck, such as might beleen two armies, that truffed on both fides in their own valour, and made ful account of that days honour, he one eager and greedy to recover their ancient glory, wonted evermore to have the upper hand, the other proudly bearing themselves, upon a new victory lately atchieved. The Sabins besides, mended their frength wel with a fratagem, for when they had equally divided their battalions every way, they referved two thousand drawn out of the rest, extraordinary without the ranks apart. Who in the very time of the conflict, should hotly charge the left point of the Romans: L they advancing overthwart with their enfigns, & flanking them on the one fide, preffed shrewdly upon that one point, and overcharged it wel neer environed all about Then the horiemen of two legions, 600, almost in number, alight on foot from their horsebacks, and as their fellows were even now ready to retreat, rush forward with all speed to the forefront: and withal, made head against the enemy. And first, they put life unto them again for that they entred equally with the footmen into danger and bare even part thereof: afterwards, for very shame, they gave more boldness and animated them to fight. For abashed they were, that horiemen should be put to double service in both kinds of fight, on horse and on foot: and professed sootmen not able to countervail the horsemen, who had taken them to their feet. So they advance forward to the battel, which on their part was abandoned, and make haste to recover the ground which they M had loft. And in a trice at one instant, not only the fight was renued, but also a battalion of the Sabins began to shrink. The horsemen closely among the ranks and files of the sootmen. gat again to their horses, and from thence rod speedily unto the other side reporting to their sellows the victory: and withal, sharply charged the enemies, who now were affrighted, because the stronger wing of their fide was discomfitted : neither were there any in this battel also, that were seen to perform better service then they. The Coninl, as an overseer, beheld all the manner of it. praising thole that flood to it manfully, and rebuking where they fought but faintly. They were not fo foon chastised and reproved but presently they bare themselves like hardy men, and did right good service: and look how much that praise excited some, so much shame stirred up others. Then with a fresh shout and outcry, they bent their whole force on all sides, and compelled the ene- N mies to turn their backs: who were not able after this, to abide the violence of the Romans. The Sabins scattered here and there all over the fields, left their tents for a spoil to their enemies: where the Romans recovered again not the goods of their Allies, as before in Algidum, but their very own, which they had loft by the forraging and spoiling of their lands.

For this two-fold victory atchieved in two fundry battels, the Senat right fparingly (fuch was their misery) decreed in the name and behalf of the Consuls, one days thanksgiving and procession, and no more. But the people, the fectond day likewise, without order and warrant from authority, solemnized the same in great numbers. And this popular procession, disorderly as it was, and without formality, was with more good will and better affection of men celebrated, then the other. The Consuls of set purpose (as it was agreed afore) came within the compass of those two O days into the City: and summoned the Senat to assemble in Mars field: where, as they were about to make some speech of their exploits and worthy acts, the chief and principal Lords of the Senat, complained and shewed themselves grieved, that the Senat was a stembled on purpose, among the soulders, to strike a terror into them. Whereupon the Consuls, because they would give no occasion of quarrel and fault-finding, called away the Senat from thence into Prata Flamina, where now the Temple of Apalbia and so have been a decreased and senated circus Apolitical where they being denied triumph with one voice and general consient of the nobles, Licitus

A a Tribun of the Commons, propounded unto the people, to know what they thought of the Confuls triumph. And among many that stepped forth to cross and diffwade the bill, C. Claudius above all others cried out aloud that the Coff, intended to triumph over the Nobles, and not over their enemies: and that they fought a thank by way of recompende for a private favour done to the Tribun, and not for an honorable reward, for any vertue and worthy act. For never (quoth he) aforetime, was there held any treaty of triumph before the people: but evermore it was referred to the Senate, to confider and determine of that honor. Neither had the Kings at any time, impaired the Majesty of that highest Court and degree: what should the Tribuns then meddle so much, and have their hand in all matters by vertne of their authority, as to suffer no publick n countel at all to remain in force? For a City can never be counted free, nor Laws equal and indifferent, but when each degree and estate retaineth still their own priviledge, and hold their proper . pre-eminence. When the rest of the principal Senators had spoken much to the same effect, all the Tribes notwithstanding in general, allowed by their suffrages that which the Tribun had propounded. This was the first time that ever any triumph was granted by the voyces of the people, without the authority and affent of the Senators. But this victory of the Tribuns and the commonalty had like to have turned to a dangerous furfeit of licentious liberty: by reason that the Tribuns conspired together and were fully agreed, to be chosen Tribuns again: and to the end that their own ambition should be less seen above others, they alledged to the Coss, for a sufficient reaion (that they likewise should continue still in place of government) the agreement and consent of the Senators: through whose holding together and drawing in one line, the liberties of the Commons, to the great difgrace and reproach of the Contuls, were infringed and indammaged. For what would come of it, say they, if before the late Laws were fully established the (new) Consuls with their factious banding, should fet upon the new Tribuns: for we must not look to have alwayes such as the Horatij and Valerij, to be Consuls, men that would not regard their own weal before the freedom of the commonalty. As it happed very well for that time, it fell to M. Duillius his lot especially, to be chief President of the Comices and Election: who like a prudent and wise man, forfeeing the heart-burning and hatred, like prefently to enfue, upon the continuance of the fame Magistrates still in place; said flatly, that of the old Tribuns he would not propound any one: and when his brethren in office laboured earnefly with him, to permit the Tribes to go to a free D scrutiny, or else yeeld up the charge to him allotted, of holding the assembly, unto his brethren, who would keep the same and manage the matter, according to Law rather than to the will and pleafure of the Nobles : Duillius then feeing their earnest contention, caused the Consuls to be called into their own pues and leats, and demanded their minds concerning the Election of the Confuls: and when they answered that they would create new, he having once got them to be the authors of a popular fentence, and not popular themselves, went forth cogether with them into the assembly of the people. Now when the Confuls were brought out into their presence, and were asked the question, what they would do in case the people of Rome should elect them Consult the second time, and that, in remembrance of their liberry received and recovered by their means, and for their good service in war, and worthy acts by them performed he finding them constant in the E same mind still, and nothing altered from their resolution: after he had commended the Consuls, for their steadfast perseverance unto the last (as altogether unlike to the Decemvirs) went prefently to the new Election. And when he had created five Tribuns only, feeing there were not other competitours enough to reach unto sufficient voyces of the Tribes, in comparison of the other nine Tribuns his colleagues, who openly flood to be chosen again : he brake up the assembly, and from that time forward called no more about any Election. For he faid, That he had fulfilled the Law in that behalf, which without fetting down any precise and definite number of Tribuns, for that there were some left behind, and rooms void, gave authority to those that were created, to chuse and take unto them more colleagues, to make up the number. And therewith he recited the words of the Law, which run in this form. If I shall propound ten Tribuns of the Commons to be F created, and they (hall that prefent day make fewer thanten : they by vertue of this Law, shall be accounted Tribuns, whom those eletted shall cause and take unto them for their fellows, and as lawful shall they be hold, authose whom this day ye shall create Tribuns of the Commons. Thus when Duillius perfifted fill resolute unto the end, saying, That in any case the flate might bear five and twenty Tribuns, and having thus conquered the greedy ambition of his colleagues: with great favor and the good liking as well of the Nobility as the Commonalty, he gave up his room. The new Tribuns now in the electing and making choise of their companions, curried favour with the Senators, and framed themselves to their will and pleasure, in chilling to them two of the Nobility, and those that had been Consuls; to wit, Sp. Tarpina; and An. Bierinis. And Consuls there were created, Sp. Herminias and Tithi Virginius Calimonianus. Who bearing themselves in a mean be-G tween Commons and Nobles, and not greatly inclining to one fide or other, had peace as well at home as abroad. Lu. Trebonius a Tribun of the Commons, being highly offended with the Senators, and ipighefully best against them, and faying withal, that in the coaptation of the rest of the Tribuns, he had been cunningly over-raught by them, and berrayed by his colleagues, proposed a Law, That who over hereafter propounded unto the Commons any Tribuns to be elected, should not give over, but still propound, until he made up the full number of ten. Thus continued he all his Tribunship in persecuting and molesting the Nobles, never letting them to be quiet: whereupon he was furnamed * After.

either do, or Tuffer injury.

After this, M. Geganius Macrinus, and C. Julius, being created Contuls, appealed the conten- 14 tions Orations of the Tribuns, which were begun and raifed against the young Gentlemen of the Nobility, so as without any bitter invectives against that authority of the Tribuns, they preferved still the loveraign Majesty of the Nobles: and by means of decreeing musters against the wars of the Volscians and Aquians, stayed the Commons, and kept the City from all sedition and discord : faying. That by civil unity, all would be at quiet abroad : whereas through discord of citizens, forrainers took heart. The care likewise of outward peace, was the cause of inward and intettine concord. But evermore the one state disquieted the moderation of the other: for whiles the Commons were fill and in good temper, the puny Senators began to offer them wrong and hard measure. And when the Tribuns would have affished the weaker side, at first it booted little, I and imali good they did: but afterwards they themselves escaped not without abuse and hurr: and especially in their latter moneths, when as they received injuries, both by reason of the meetings and packing together of the mightier fort, and also for that toward the end of the year, the edge and vigor commonly of all authority waxeth dull and groweth feeble and weak, So that now the Commons had little or no confidence at all in the Tribunship, unless they might have fuch as Icilius to be Tribuns : and as for these two years last past, they had them but in bare name, and not to any effect and purpole. The elders and ancient fathers of the Senate on the other fide. as they believed verily that their youth were too forward and lufty: fo they were of this mind. That if there needs must be trespais and excess, they had rather those of their own degree and coat should exceed measure, and have greater stomack, than their adversaries. So ticklish and K dangerous a thing it is to keep a mean in maintenance of liberty: whiles under a colour of withing and defiring equality, every man advanceth and lifterh up himfelf fo, as that he thrusteth and beareth down another and in pretending a care and regard that men should not stand in awe and fear of them, they make themselves dread and searful to others, and so the wrong that we put off

Then were made Confuls, T. Quintius Capitolinus the fourth time, and Agrippa Furins: who found neither sedition within nor war without. But yet both the one and the other was near at hand. For now could no longer the diffention of the citizens be held in, but needs it must break out. And both Tribuns and Commons rose against the Nobles. For in all the assemblies and meetings 7 of the people, one or other alwayes of the Nobles and Senators were ferved with process: whereupon grew fresh troubles and new contentions. At the first noise whereof, as if the fignal of battel had been given and the al'arm firicken up, the Æquians and Volscians took arms: and withal their Leaders and Captains (fuch as gaped greedily after spoil and pillage) had born them in hand and perswaded them to believe. That for these two years past, they could not go through with their musters proclaimed: for that the Commons refused to obey, and brake their alleagance: which was the only cause, that there were no forces sent out against them. Besides, say they, The use and manner of their warfare, is now with their licentious loofeness, discontinued and clean decayed: Rome was now no more a common-wealth and country to her citizens: For all their anger quarrels and malice, that they bare aforetime against forcein nations, was now turned upon their own felves: fo that at this time they had fit occasion and good opportunity to surprise them blinded as wolves with mutual rage and fury one against another. Hereupon they joyned their whole power, and first wasted the country of Latium: and afterwards seeing none to encounter them and make defence (to the exceeding joy of those that were the authors of this war I they came for aging and spoiling all the way to the very walls of Rome, even before the gate Efquilina, there braving and vaunting in reproachful and (cornful terms before the whole City, telling them how they had laid their fields and territories wast. From whence they retired themselves without revenge and loss, driving their booties afore them, and marched along to Corbio. Quintius the Conful feeing this. affembled the people, and there (as I have heard) he made to them a speech in this wife. " Albeit

Seldom at any time else, had there been a speech delivered by a popular Tribune, more acceptable unto the Commons, than was the tharp Oration at this present of a most severe Consul. Yea, and K the very youth, which amid such terrors of war, had been wont to refuse souldiery, the only keen and sharp weapon they had to fight withal against the Nobles, now desired war and to be in armes. Over and besides, the country kerns that sled (to Rome,) such also as were spoiled and wounded in the villages about, reported more foul and cruel outrages in their ears, than were presented unto their eyes, and set all the City in an hot an angry broil. Now when the Senators were affembled together in the Councel House, then verily they all cast their eyes upon Quintins, beholding and regarding him well, as the only patron and maintainer of the Majesty of Rome: but the chief peers and Lords of the Senate spake out and said: That he had made an Oration, befeeming the foveraign Government of a Conful, befeeming fo many Confulships by him already born, befeeming the whole course of his life, that had passed oft through many honorable dignities, and yet alwayes deserved more. As for other Consuls, they either in flattering and soothing up the Commons, had betrayed the dignity of the Nobles: or elfe infeeking by hard courses to maintain the rights, preheminencies and royalties of their state, and to tame the multitude, have thereby made them more fell and untractable. But T. Quintius, he hath made a speech, respective and tending, as well to the royal dignity of the Nobles, as to the concord and unity of the States, and principally regarding the condition of the times. They would request him therefore, together with his brother Conful, to take in hand the care of the Common-weal. They would request the Tribuns likewise, to joyn in one accord with the Consuls, and shew themselves willing and forward to have the war kept off and put back from their City walls: and in so fearful and dangerous a cale, to reclaim their Commons to their due obedience to their Nobles: faying more- M over, That the native Country, the common mother of them all, calleth unto the Tribuns and craveth their aid, now that the territories are wasted, and the City at hand to be assaulted. Whereupon, they all agreed generally to decree a muster, and presently to make a levy of souldiers. And when the Confuls had pronounced before the whole people then and there affembled that it was no time as then to hear excuses, but that all the younger fort, should betimes the next morning by day-light, be ready to attend in Mars field: and that after the war was ended, they would find out and appoint a time, to enquire into their allegations and reasons, that entred not their names: and that he should be taken for a traytor and rebel, whose excuse they allowed not: the whole manhood and youth of the City shewed themselves the morrow after in readiness. Each cohort or regiment chole their Centiners or Captains, and every Regiment had two Senators for their N Provost Marshals. All this was performed (by report) with such speed and expedition, that on the very same day, the standards and ensigns were by the Questors had forth of the Armory and Chamber of the City and brought into Mars field: and by the fourth hour (or ten a clock) the fame day, fer forward and advanced out of the field. And this new army, with a few bands of old fouldiers, who willingly of their own accord followed them, marched on and refted, at ten miles end. The day following they discovered their enemies, and at Corbio encamped close unto them. And by the third day, there was no stay on both hands, but they must needs encounter and fight, For why? The Romans for anger were sharpset: the enemies again, upon a guilty conscience that they had to often rebelled, were grown desperate. Now, whereas in the Roman army the two Consuls were in equal commission, yet gave Agrippa place unto his brother Quintins, and yeelded O unto him the entire and absolute command. A course most profitable in the managing and execution of great affairs. And being thus preferred, he again in courtefy answered and requited the others Gentleness and inclination to submission, in this wife, by imparting unto him all his Connels: by parting with him all his honor and praise, and by making him his equal, who was indeed his inferiour and underling. In the battel, Quimins commanded the right pont, Agrippa led the left: Sp. Posthumius Albus, the Lieutenant General, had the conduct of the main battel. And P. Suspitus the other Lieutenant, they set over the horsemen. The soot-

A men of the right point fought most valiantly, and the Volscians received them with equal valour. Sp. Sulpities with his men of arms, brake through the main battel of the enemies: & albeit he might have retired himself the same way again unto his company, before that the enemies could bring their ranks again into order, that were disarayed: yet he thought it better to charge them upon their backs. And in one moment he had discomfited and quite defeated his enemies, by affailing them behind, and thus affrighting them on both fides, but that the Volician and Æquian Horsemen recharged him, held him play in his own fight, and so kept him occupied a good while. "Thereat, Sulpitius faid, it was no time now to linger and to drive off, but to bestirthemselves, "crying out aloud, that they were encironed round, enclosed within their enemies, and excluded B "from their own fellows, unless they let to, and bent their whole force, quickly to dipatch the "Horse-fight: and that it would not serve, to put the Horsemen to flight and save their lives: but "kill both horse and man, that none might ride back again from thence into the battel to renew "the fight. And to make head and refutance against him and his horsemen, they were never able, " fince that the main thick battel of footmen had given him ground already, Good ear they gave to his words, and foon harkned to his direction: and with one entire affault they gave a herce charge, and defeated the whole power of the Cavallery, unhoried and dismounted a number of them and with their javelins goared both them and their horses. And there's an end of the horsefervice. Then they fet upon the battel of the footmen and dispatched messengers unto the Consuls with news, what they had done: where also by that time, the battel of the enemies began to C shrink. And when tidings came unto the Romans that were already upon the point of victory. they verily were more encouraged: but the Aquians that were about to retreat, were flrucken with greater fear. In the main battel first began the overthrow; namely, whereas the men of arms before had broken the array. After them, the left point also began to be distressed and driven back, by Quintin the Consul. But in the right there was hardest hold, and most ado. Where, Agrippa being a tall man of his hands and young withal, seeing in every part of the battel things go better than where he was: caught the entigns from the entign bearers, advanced them forward his own felf, yea, and fell to flinging fome of them against the thickest of his enemies. For fear therefore of so shameful a disgrace, the touldiers bestir themselves, and freshly assailed the enemy. And so on all hands alike, they atchieved the victory and won the field. Then came a messenger D from Q cintius, & brought word, that he had the better hand, and was now ready to give an affault upon the camp, but would not break in, and enter thereinto before he knew for certain, that they in the le't point also had gotten the upper hand, and made an end of the battel. In case therefore he had discomfited the enemy, he should joyn his forces to him, that the whole army altogether might gain the spoil and pillage of the tents. So Agripp 1, who also for his part was victor, came to his brother Conful and the camp of the énemies, and met with mutual congratulation one to the other. There, finding but a few to defend, whom they discomfited in the turning of an hand, they brake into the rampier and munitions, without conflict or skirmish and so besides the recovery of their own goods again, which they had loft by the overrunning of the country, they gained also a rich booty, and retired back with their wholearmy. I cannot learn, that either they themselves E required triumph, or the Senate offered them any : and no cause appeareth upon re. ord, why they should either refuse, or not hope for that honor. For mine own part, so far as I can guels in so long distance of times, seeing that Valerius and Horstins, who over and besides the conquest of the Vollcians and the Æquians, had the honor also of dispatching and finishing the Sabines war, were denied triumph at the Senats hand : these Consuls might not with modelty, sue for the same; having performed but half the good service of the others: lest if they had gotten it granted, there might have seemed more regard had of the persons, than of the deserts.

But this noble and honourable victory over the enemies abroad, thus atchieved, was obscured and fouly distayned with a shameful doom of the people, in a controversy of their allies, about the bounds and meers of certain Lands. The inhabitants of Aricia and Ardea, having A controverly F warred oftentimes one with the other, about some Lands in question between them, and by gi- between the ving and taking fundry foils and overthrows outweated, chose the people of Rome their Um- Ardeates and pire to decide and determine this quarrel. And when they were come with their counsel to plead ded by the the case, the Magistrates granted a Court of Assists of the people. Where was much arguing people of and dispute on both sides before them : and after the witnesses were deposed and that at length Rome. the Tribes should be called to the scrutinie, and the people give their voices, there steps forth an ,, old father one P. Scapius, a Commoner. And I (quoth he) for my part. O Consuls if it be lawful 3, to speak for the good of the State, wil not suffer the people to erre, and be deceived in this que-», flion. When as the Confuls denied him audience, as being an old fool, and of no credit; and commanded him (as he cryed still that the publick cause of the City was betrayed) to be had away, he calleth for the affiltance of the Tribuns. The Tribuns then, who lightly are ever overruled by the multirude, rather than able to rule them, yeelded unto the Commons: That for as much as they were defirous to hear what the old man could fay, Scaptius should speak his mind at large. Then setreth he the tale on end, and beginneth thus: I am (quoth he) fourscore winters old, and three on the head of it : and even upon that very ground for which all this strife and vari- The evidence "ance is, I served as a souldier, when I was no young man neither but one that had been prest to given by old "wars, and received pay twenty years afore. "worn out clean and forgotten of other men, but fresh in my knowledge and remembrance: to H "wit, that the Lands thus litigious, and in controversy, had been sometime within the confines " of the Coriolant: and after the winning of Corioli, were feiled by right of conquest, to the Com-"mons of the people of Rome. I marvel much therefore, by what cultome and prescription, the "Ardeates and Aricines, who never had right and interest, and were not possessed of the land, " (so long as Corioli stood in prosperity) should hope to defeat the people of Rome thereof, whom "being the LL, in fee of the ground, they had chosen for their Arbitrator. As for me, I have "but a small while to live, and one foot already is in grave: and yet I cannot find in my heart, but " (to that Land, which as old, I being a young and lufty fouldier, did my best to fight for, and " conquered with (word in hand) make claim now that I am aged, by word and mouth, the only I "means left me to recover it. I advise the people therefore in good sadness, that in a vain respect " of bootless modesty, they condemn not their own cause, nor give away their right. The Confuls marking well what andience was given to Scapting, and that he was heard not only with filence, but also with good liking and contentment, cryed our upon this abominable practise: calling both Heaven and Earth to witness, and therewith sent for the Lords of the Councel: and joyning with them, went to the Tribuns, fell in hand with them, and instantly besought them "not to go forward with this most lewd action for the present, and a more shameful precedent "for the time to come: namely, that Umpiers and dayes men, should convert the thing in suit "unto their own and proper vantage: especially considering, that, Admit it were a lawful thing "for a judge himself to have an eye and regard to his own commodity: yet would there not be K er fo much gained and gotten by coming thus between, and interverting the Land, as there would "be damage and hinderance another way, in alienating by those hard courses, the hearts of their "good friends and Allies. For the loffes (verily) and cracks of name and credit, are fuch as may "not be valued at any price. And should the Embaffadors indeed, say they, go their wayes home "with this goodly award : and make report abroad how they have sped? should our confederats "hear this? (hould our enemies come by the knowledge thereof? with what grief the one? with "what joy the other? Think ye that our neighbour nations will impute, attribute, and afcribe "this, unto the speech made by Scapius, a prating old busy body, and one that loverh to hear "himself speak inassemblies? Nay, this is certain: well may Scapius be famous and much talked " of in the playing of this pageant: but the people of Rome shall incur the obloquy, to have acted I "the part under the visour of Scapius, of a cunning promoter, and a falle interceptor to himself, "of other mens right in fuit. For, what judge at any time in a private matter, hath done the like, "as to award the thing in question, unto himself? Why, even Scaptins, past all shame and grace "as he is, would never have done it. These and such like words, spake both Consuls and Senators aloud in all their hearing. But the coverousness of men, and Scapius that first set them a longing and their teeth a watering, prevailed more than they all. The Tribes were called to the Scrutiny of their voyces, and gave judgment, That the Lands pertained to the common Territory of the people of Rome. Neither can it be denied, but it would have to appeared indeed, in case it had been tried before other judges. But now, for all the goodness of the cause, is not the ignominy of the arbitrement one jot the less: Nay, the Aricines and Ardeates themselves, thought not M more shamefully and hardly of it, than the very Senators and Peers of Rome. The rest of the year continued quiet, from all troubles as well domestical as forrain.

The Fourth Book

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the fourth Book.

THe Law concerning marriage between the Nobles and the Commons, was proposed, and with much ado enacted by the Tribuns of the Commonalty: notwithstanding, the Nobles withstood it. Tribuns military with full authority of Consuls were created. Under this kind of Magistracy was the State ruled for certain years, both in City and in war. The Lands of the Ardeates, which had been awarded from them by an arbitrement of the people of Rome, were restored again unto them, and Coloners sent to inhabit the same. In the time of a great dearth and famine at Rome, one Sp. Melius, a Roman knight, O dealt corn among It the people freely, at his own proper charges: by which deed he won the favor of the Commons: and thereby aspiring to be King, was at the commandment of Quintius Cincinnatus, the Dictator, flain, by the hands of C. Servilius Hala, General of the Horfemen. L. Minutius, who difclosed the treafon, had a bullock with guilt horns given him for a reward. The Embassadors of the Romans, which were murdered by the Fidenates, had their Statues or Images erected at the Roftra, or the common Cross of the City, because they died in the service of the Common-wealth. Cornelius Cossus a Colonel, having flain with his own hand Tolumnius, the King of the Verentians, wan and bare away the

Here succeeded Consuls after these, M. Genutius and P. Curiatius. A year full of broils, both at home and abroad. For in the beginning of the year, both Canuleius, a

Tribune of the Commons, proposed a law, concerning alliance of the Patritians with Commons , by way of mariage. Whereby the Nobles supposed their bloud to be stayned, and the Rights and Priviledges of Families and Houses confounded. Also, whereas at first the Tribuns by little and little had moved, That one of the Consuls might be created out of the Commons: now the matter proceeded to far, that of ten Tribuns that then were, the other onine propounded this in plain terms for a law, That it might be in the peoples power to chuse both the Cost, (if they would) either out of Commons or Nobility. Mary, if that should come to pais the Nobles thought indeed that the foveraign rule and authority, was not only made common with the balelt fort, but also translated altogether from the great men and best of the City, to the commonalty. Glad were the Senators therefore to hear fay, that the people of Ardea, for the wrongful awarding away of their Lands from them, were revolted: and that the Veientians had wasted the Frontiers of the Romans: and that the Volicians and Æquians grudged and muttered for the fortifying of Verrigo; So much preferred they any war, miserable though it were and dangerous, before a shameful and dishonourable peace. Having heard therefore these news, and taken them in the worlt manner: to the end that amidft the rumour and bruit of fo D many wars, the Tribunitian troubletome fuits might stay and be dead for the time: they command musters to be taken, souldiers to be levied, all turniture of war, and all manner of force to be prepared, and (if it might be) with more indeavour, than it had been when T. Quintius was Conful. Then C. Canalins, after some hot words which he spake aloud in the Senate; namely, that the Consuls by frighting the Commons, went about but in vain, to avert them from the regard of their new Laws: and that so long as he had any breath in his body, they should never go through with multer, unless the Commons had first ratified those things, which by him and his brethren had been propounded: forthwith affembled the people together. Thus at one instant the Consuls animated the Senate against the Tribune, and the Tribune incited the people against the Confuls. "The Confuls gave it out plainly and faid, that no longer now might these furious The allegati-E "courses of the Tribuns be endured. Now were they come to the very height and extremity, one of the Con-"and railed more war in effect, at home, than the enemies abroad. Which thing (no doubt) fuls against "and railed more war mence, an home, than the Commons, as of the Nobles, nor of the Tribuns of the Tribuns of the Commons, "more, than of the Confuls. For look what thing was best rewarded in a City, the same alwayes "most increased: thus men in peace (we see) prove excellent, thus in war they come to be singu-"lar. In Rome (lay they) leditions sped ever best, and have been reputed both to each one inpar-"ticular and to all ingeneral most honourable. But let the Senate call to mind the dignity which "they themselves had received from their fathers, and compare it with that which they were like " to leave to their children: and see, whether they may boast as the commonalty doth, how that "their condition is much bettered and more glorious than before. Well, neither is there any end F "now, nor ever will be, io long as the Authors of feditions be as highly advanced, as the fediti-"ons themselves are prosperous and formulate. See what matters and how great hath Canaleius "attempted! He would bring in a commixture or rather confusion of kindreds and houses, a " perturbation in the managing both of publick and private affairs: that nothing might be fin-"cere and intire, nothing pure and undefiled: that all difference and diffin tion being taken away, "no man might know either himself or his. For what thing else do these mixtures of states and "degrees by mariages draw after them, without all order and discretion: but that like bruit beafts "in a manner, Commons and Nobles may go and couple together? fo that the children between "them born, shall not be able to tell of what blond he is descended, and to what Religion he doth "belong, being a mungrel as it were, the one half a Noble, the other a Commoner; and not well G "Whiting and according with himself? They thought it not enough (be like) that all divine and "humane Laws, were confused and shuffled together: for now these mutinous persons, these busy "heads and troublers of the common people, address themselves to shoot at the Consulfhip. As fielt, they founded in private speeches and secret discourses, only, how to compass, That one of "the Confuls might be created out of the body of the Commons: but now they go roundly to " work and carry it before them : they are so bold to prefer laws (fortooth) that the people might "make them both either Nobles or Commons at their good pleasure. Whereby (no doubt) they "Would make choise from out of the Commons, of the most seditious persons of all other,

"We shall have then the Canulcians and Icilians to be our Coss. But Jupiter (that great good H "God) forbid, that ever the Royal and Imperial Majesty, should come to that low ebb or de-" sperate pals: dye they would a thousand deaths rather, than suffer so great a shame and indigni-"ty: knowing this affuredly, that their ancestours also, if they had once suspected or forseen, "that by granting the commonalty every thing as they defired, they would not have proved "more lovely and chearful towards them, but rather more churlish and untrastable: and when "they had obtained their first suits, to proceed still to demand worse and worse, one thing after "another: they would tooner have indured at the first, any contesting and debate what foever, " than suffered those hard conditions to be imposed, and put upon them : and because they had "once relented, that Tribuns should be created, therefore to grant them again the second time. T "So that as now, there is no quietness with them, nor end of quarrels will be none, to long as in "one and the felf fame City, Tribuns and Senators remain together. Nay verily, either this state " must be put down, or that office utterly abolished. And better late than never, to withstand " and meet with their rash and desperate boldness. What? shall they without controlment, first " fow discord at home, and then stir up forrein wars abroad? and afterwards, against those wars "which themselves have raised, debar and hinder the City, forto take arms and defend it self? and when as they have as good as fent for the enemies to come to their dores, then, not fuffer an " army to be levied against them. But let Canuleius (if he dare) speak these words out in the Se-"nate, That unless the Nobles suffer his laws, as if he were a Conqueror to be admitted and re-"ceived, he will flay the mustering? For what else is that, but to threaten that he will sell and K " betray his country, and suffer it to be assailed and lost? What encouragement will such a word er give as that, I fay not, to the commonalty of Rome, but to the Volscians, Equians and Veicn-"tians? Will not they hope, under the conduct of Canuleius, to be able to scale the Capitol and " the Castle, if so be the Tribuns shall take from the Nobility their couragious hearts, as they have "bereaved them already of their right, their honor and dignity? Let him know therefore, that "the Confuls are ready, first to shew themselves to be Captains and Leaders, against the mitchie-"vous practifes of their own citizens, before they will make head against the armed forces of "their enemies? Whiles these matters were debated of with great contention and heat in the Senate house, Canuleius for the maintenance of his laws, and to cross the Consuls, made this Oration unto the people, How greatly the Nobles have despised you, O Quirites, how unworthy T. of canulcing to they have ever thought you, to live among them within the walls of one City, me thinks I have, the Commons, as often heretofore, so now especially and most of all perceived : in that they have risen up altoagainst the No. gether so fiercely to check and withstand our proposed laws. "Wherein, what pretend we else, "but to tell them and put them in mind, That we are, as well as they, citizens : and although we " are not of the same wealth, yet we inhabit the same country with them? In the one, we request mariage; a thing to borderers, yea, and to forrain nations usually granted: and to fpeak of our "felves, we also have afforded even to our conquered enemies, the benefit of our City, which is "far more than marriage. In the other, we move no new matter, but only claim again and chal-" lenge that, which is the peoples right, to wit, that the people of Rome may bellow their offices "and dignities, upon whom they please. What reason have they then, I pray you, to set all on an M "uprore, as if Heaven and Earth should go together? and what is the cause, that erewhile I had "like to have had violence offered unto me in the Senate? What moved them to break out and " fay, they could not forbear nor keep their har ds from me, and threaten to abuse and violate the "facred authority of the Tribuns? Set case that the people of Rome may have their free voyces " and fuffriges, to elect the Confuls whom they will, and that no Commoner be denied, so he be "worthy of the highest place, for to obtain the soveraign dignity. How then? cannot this City " possibly stand any longer? and is our Empire come to an end for ever? And all one it is (be like) "and importeth as much, to disable a Commoner, for being made Consul as if a man inferred, that "a bondman or a freed libertine should become Consul. Perceive you not yet (my Masters) in wat bondman or a need inserting mound of they might, bereave you in some measure of this day N " light: that ye breath and speak, that ye have the shapes of men, they think much, they repine, "and it goes to their heart. And what elie? They give it out flatly and fay (if God will) it is un-lawful, that a Commoner should be a Consul. I beseech you hear me a little. If we may not be "allowed to read the Chronicles, nor to perufe the High-priefts records and registers, know we "not those things then, that even all strangers know? namely, That Consuls entred in place of "Kings, and fucceeded them, and have no other right, preheminence or dignity at all, than Kings "had before? Think ye that men have never heard, that Numa Pompilius, a man not somuch as " a citizen of Rome, much less then, a Patritian and Nobly descended among them, was sent for out of the Sabines countrey, and by the peoples voyces, and the affent of the Nobles, created E. King of Rome? Also, afterwards, how L. Tarquinius, who was no Roman born, no, nor yet so O "much as an Italian, but the fon of Demaratus the Corinthian, a stranger inhabitant at Tarquins, "and from thence removing, albeit King Ancus his ions were living, attained likewise to the "(rown? Moreover how Servius Tullius after him, the fon of a captive woman of Corniculum, "whose father was unknown, whose mother a bondwoman, through wit and vertue, obtained er and held the Kingdom? For what should I speak of T. Tatius the Sabine, whom Romulus him-" felf, the father and founder of this City, admitted to raign together with him? Well, so long as

"no flock was distained, no race rejected, wherein appeared sparks of vertue, the Romans Em-

A " pire became mighty, and flourished. Scorn ye then at this day, a Consul out of the Commo-" nalty, when our forefathers despited not Kings that were aliens and ftrangers? No, nor when "the Kings were expelled, was this City denied and thut against forreiners, that were valorous, and "men of action. The kinred and whole name (I am fure) of the Claudii, after the Kings were " exiled, we not only admitted into our City, from out of the Sabins, but also received into the "number of the Patritians and Noble men. And may a meer forrainer indeed become a Noble-"man, and so a Consul? And shall a Citizen of Rome, if he be of the Commonalty, be wholly dila-" bled and out of all hope for ever of being Conlin? Tell me I pray you, Think ye it not possible, "that a valiant and hardy man, approved both in war and peace, being one of the Commons, R "may prove like to Numa, L. Tarquinius, or Servius Tullius? and if he do whether shall we suffer "him to govern the Common-weal, or no? And whether will ye have our Confuls, such rather "as the Decemvirs (the most wretched and wicked persons under the sun, who, by your leave, "were at that time of the Nobility I than strangers and new-commers, which of all the Kings "were fimply the very best? But for footh, presently after the KK, were deposed and expelled, "there was not one of the Com, a Conful. What of that? ought no new thing to be ordained, "and which hath not been already taken up afore? For many things have not yet been practiled, "(as in a state newly incorporate) ought not such then to be put in use, if they be thought expe-"dient? While Romalus reigned, there were no Bishops nor Augurs: by Numa Pomp luss they "were created. There was no Seffing of the people at all in the City, no description of Hundreds C" and Classes. By S. Tellius they were instituted. Cost, were never heard of before: when the KK. "were driven out, they were elected. The time was, when neither the abiolute rule nor yet the "name of a Dictator was known. In our fathers dayes it first began. Tribuns, Ædiles, Questors "there have been none: it was ordained they should be made. Within this ten years, we have "both created and also abolished out of the common-weal, Decemvirs for the making and pen-"ning of our laws. And who doubteth, but in a City founded for ever to endure, and increasing "ftill infinitely, there will be brought in new Governments, new Priest-hoods and facerdotal "dignities, new priviledges both of kindreds and private persons? And even this one thing in " queltion, to wit, that the Com, and Nobles might not joyn in marriage, were not the Decem-"virs they that first within these few years made that Edict? A most shameful ensample and pre-D "cedent in a free state, and tending to the manifest wrong of the Commons. Can there be any "greater or more notorious injury, than that there should be in a City one part and member, as "defiled and polluted, thought unworthy of the bond of marriage? What elle is this, but to suffer " exile, and confining within the same walls, when they debar us that we should not be either al-"lied in affinity or knit in kindred? They provide (forfooth) and take order that bloud should "not be mixed, nor families confused. How then? If this do pollute this great gentry of yours, " which most of you descended from the Sabins and Albans, have not by right line from the Pa-"tritians, but by coptation and election into the number of the Nobles, as being chosen either by "the favour and grace of the Kings, or else by the peoples voyces after the KK, were expelled: "could not your wisedoms have kept your bloud uncorrupt by some private means and provisi-E "on, namely, by taking heed neither to elpouse wives from among the Commons, nor to suffer "your daughters and litters to be married to any other than Nobles? No commoner (ye might "befure) would have forced a daughter of any noble house: no, these insolencies of lascivious "Inst are appropriate to Gentlemen only of the Nobility: none of us would have compelled any of " you against his will, to make covenant and contract of matrimony. But I wot, that by an ex-" press law it should be sorbidden, and that marriage between Nobles and Commons should be " condemned, that is it, which to the commonalty is a plain contumely and open injury, And "why confer ye not and lay your heads together, that the rich may not marry with poor? That, "which at all times and in all places, hath been a matter left unto particular policy and confide-"ration; namely, That into what house soever a woman cast a liking and sancy, there she might F "be married: and into what family a man obliged himself by word, promile and covenant, from "thence he might take a wife: even that, restrainye within the bonds of a most proud and tyran-" nical law: whereby ye might break in funder all civil fociety, and of one City make twain, Why "forbid ye not by a positive Law, that a commoner should not dwell by a Noble-man, or go the " fame way that he doth, or frequent the same feast, or converse in the same market or common "place of affembly? " menace the Commons,menace Isay, the Tribun also? What? If ye had not twife already good H experience how little these goodly threats of yours prevailed against the Commons when they "agreed and fluck together, it were fomewhat. Will ye fay that ye forbare to firive, ye tendered "our good, and for pity spared us? Nay rather, to say a truth, was not this the cause that no fray "was made. For that the fronger fide was also the more cool and modeller of the twain. Neither " (O Quirites) will there now, I warrant you, be any combate, nor blows dealt: they will al-"wayes affay and found, what itomacks and hearts ye have, but never will they feel your fifts, and "try how keen your fwords be. Therefore to these wars (be they falsely pretended, or truly in-"deed reported) Ove Confuls, the Commons are ready prest to follow you : provided alwayes, "that by granting them liberty of mutual marriage, ye will make at length this City one: that I they may be linked, joyned and united unto you, by private alliance and affinity: that hardy and valiant men may have hope and possibility, to honors and dignities: that they may be allowed " fellowship and society in the Common-weal: Finally, that (which is due unto equal liberty) "they may one with another in alternative course, obey annual Magistrates, and be obeyed again " in their turns. If any of you shall gainfay and withstand these conditions, prate still and talk at "your pleasure of wars: multiply and make them as many and as great as ye will; There is not "one shall give his name, not one shall take arms, not one shall fight for those proud Lords, with "whom they can have neither fellowship of dignity in the Common-weal, nor alliance of mar-" riage in private estate. Now when as the Consuls also were come forth into the open assembly of the people, and that they fell on all hands from continued and long Orations, to short dispute K and altercation: the Tribun demanded why a commoner might not attain to a Confulthin? Unto whom the Conful returned an answer, as to the substance perhaps truly, so for the present contention not very wifely and to the purpoie: Namely, because that no commoner had the Aufpices: which was the caute why the Decemvirs ordained diffinct marriages, left upon a doubtful and mingled iffue, thereshould follow a troubled confusion of the Auspices. But hereat, the Commons flormed and stamped most of all: that as odious men unto the immortal Gods, they were flatly denied and deemed unworthy to observe the flight and linging of birds. And never gave they over their heats of clamorous debate (whiles the Commons had gotten unto them a most sharp Tribun to set them awork, and were themselves in obstinacy no whit behind him Juntill at length the Nobles were overcome and driven to grant, that the Law as touching marriage T should pals: supposing by that means especially, that the other Tribuns would either clean give over their fuit for making commoners Confuls, or at least wife put it off, until the war were ended: and that the Commons in the mean while being well pleafed and contented with marriage among the Nobles, would be willing and ready to levy a mutter. Canaleing for this his victory over the Nobles, and for the favours he gat among the Commons, became a great and mighty man. Whereupon, the other Tribuns were kindled to the like combate: and for the proceeding of their Law also, indeavoured with all their might and main. And albeit the rumour of the war encreased daily more and more, yet they hinder the levy of fouldiers. The Confuls feeing now that no decree and order could pass the Senate-house, by reason that the Tribuns interposed their negative voyce: took counsel together with the chief of the Nobility at home in their private houses. And well M they law that they must yeeld either the victory to their enemies or the buckler to their own citizens. Of all the Senators that had been Coff. only Valerius and Horatius were not present at these counsels. C. Claudius his opinion was, That the Consuls should put themselves in arms against the Tribuns: But the two Quinti, Cincinnatus and Capitolinus, abhorred all bloudshed and violent proceedings against those, whom by a folemn covenant made with the Commons, they had received and accepted for to be as facrofainet and unviolable. But in these counsels they grew to this point in the end, that they suffered military Tribuns of equal power with the Confuls, to be created indifferently from out of the Commons and Nobles: provided alwayes, that as touching creation of the Confuls, there should be no alteration from the old manner aforetime. And herewith were both Tribuns and Commons well fatisfied and contented. A general N affembly therefore was proclaimed for the chufing of three Tribuns in Confuls authority, which being once published: forthwith as many as had spoken or done ought rending to sedicion, and above all others those that had been Tribuns of the people, began in their whited robes to take hold of men and run to and fro about the common place labouring for this dignity. At the first the Nobles partly in despair of obtaining the place (seeing the Commons so set a flore) partly for disdain and indignation to bear any honourable office joyntly with them of to base condition, were scared and affrighted from standing therefore: at the last (but they were forced thereto first by the heads and the chief Lords of the Senate) they were content to be competitors and suiters for the dignity: left they might feem to be fully excluded forth of the possession of the Common-weal, and leave it entirely for the Commons. The event and effect of this Court, shewed O plainly, that mens minds are otherwise affected in contending about liberty and dignity, than prefently after such contentions laid away, they are in weighing and judging aright without paffion and affection. For the people satisfied herewith, that there was some account made of the Commoners, and that they were not shut out, elected military Tribuns all of the Nobles. This modelly this equity, this noble mind, where shall a man now adayes find in one person, which, then was to be seen in the whole people? In the three hundreth and tenth year after the City of Rome was founded, were the first military Tribuns created, that bare office in the room of the

A Confuls, to wit, A. Sempronius Aratinus, L. Attilius, and C. Cecilius: in whole government, con-Military Tri, cord at home caused also peace abroad. There be writers, who affirm, That upon occasion of the buns first Veientian war, and the rebellion of the Ardeats, because two Consuls were not able to manage created, with Veientian war, and the reognous of the Andreas possess of the Colonia without making any medionity, the colonia war, at the colonia war, and the reognous war, and the colonia wa tion of the Law published, concerning election of Contuls of the Commons: and that they were invested both in the jurisdiction, and also in the ornaments of the Consuls. Howbeit, the exercife of that government, flood not fast and fure, nor continued long. For within three moneths after that they entred, they forewent their office, by a decree of the Augurs, as if there had been some error in their creation. It was alledged that C. Curiatius, who was President of that Court B of Ejection, had taken his quarters amils for the observation of the lucky figns by flight of birds, and not according to the Augurs skill.

There came from the Ardeats to Rome, Embaffadors, complaining of wrong received, in these terms: That if it might be redreffed, and amends made, and their grounds reftored, they feemed willing to abide still in league and amity. Answer was made them by the Senate, that the judgment of the people, already passed, could not be reversed by the Senate, if it were for nothing else but for concord take and agreement of the States: besides, they had neither any precedent to lead them thereto, nor Law and authority to warrant them. Marry, if the Ardeats would wait their times, and put to the Senates arbitrement and diffretion, the redress and easement of their injury pretended, it would come to pais, that in process of time they should not repent of governing their passions, and bridling their choler: and should well know, that the Nobles had a good regard; that there should no wrong be offered unto their friends, as they were careful, that if any were offered, it should not long continue. Thus the Embassadors, promising, to make a true report, unto their citizens of the matter, wholly as it was : were triendly dismissed, and had their discharge,

The Senators feeing now the Commonweal, without any foveraign Magistrate of the chair and of State, went together, and made an Interregent: and whiles they strove whether Consuls or Tribuns should be created, the Interregent continued many dayes. The Interregent and the Senate laboured, that there should be an Election of Consuls: the Tribuns on the other side, and their Commonalty, were for the Tribuns Consular. But the Senators prevailed, because both the people feeing they were to confer the one office or the other, upon the Nobles, jurceased to strive any D more: and also the chief of the Commons, chose rather to have that Election, wherein they should not be once propounded, than wherein they were sure to take the repulse, as unworthy, The Tribuns also gave over to contend any longer to no purpose, and without effect, seeming thereby somewhat to gratify and pleasure the LL. of the Senate. So T. Quintins Barbaius the Interregent; chose for Consuls L. Papprius Mugilanus, and L. Sempronius Atratius. Whiles these were Confuls, the league with the Ardeats was renued. And this is the only evidence and proof, that they were Consuls that year, forthat neither in the ancient yearly records, nor in the Calenders of the Magistrates, they are found at all. I take it, because the military Tribuns were created in the beginning of that year: and therefore, although these Consuls were in their stead chosen, yet their names were lest out, as if the other had remained in office the whole year,

E Licinius Macer affirmeth, that they are mentioned both in the composition with the Ardeats, and also in the linen books of registers in the Church of Juno Moneta. Albeit there had been so many terrors and bravados, threatned from the borderers, yet both abroad and at home, all was quiet. And whether Tribuns only, or Consuls also chosen in the room of Tribuns governed in this year; certain it is, that the next following, had Confuls M. Geganius Macerinus the second time, and T. Quimius Capitolinus the fift time. This was the very year when the Centors office came up first. A thing that rose of a small beginning: which notwithstanding afterwards, increased to that height, that it had government of the manners and discipline of the Romans: and under the jurisdiction thereof, the Senate and Centuries of the order of knights, the diffinction of worthip and hameful difgrace, were reduced. Likewife, the survey of publick and private Ædifices, F yea, and the tributes, revenues and hibfidies of the people of Rome were at the disposition, ordering, and differentian of that office. The beginning of which thing arole upon this occasion : For that the people in many years space had not been affested and numbred, and seeing the Cense could be deferred no longer, nor the Confils (by reason of wars, from so many nations imminent) had leifure to go about and accomplish that business: the Senare therefore made a motion, that the charge being painful, and not for the Majesty of Consuls to busy themselves in, required a special Maguerate, and a peculiar officer by it felf. Under whom should attend the Secretaries and Clerks; who likewile should have the keeping and charge of the rolls and publick records: and at whole differentian thould pass the scedules and instruments of all Assessments. The Senators therefore accepted gladly of this overture, although it were but a trifling matter: yet because there G should be the more Magustrates of the Nobility. Supposing (I ween) it would come to passe, as (it proved indeed) that shortly the power and wealth of those, who bare the office, should win, more authority and credit unto the thing. Yea, and the Tribuns allomade no great ado. but suffered it to pais, being an office (as it was in truth, no other at that time) rather of necessity and attendance, than of thew, porture honor: because they would not feem to be cross and peevish in every small matter. When as therefore this dignity was of the principal of the City refuled, the people by their voyces chose to that Office; Papprius and Sempronius, of whose Confulthing there was fome doubt: to the end, that by that office they might supply and make up

Censors sist the desect and mils of a Consulship. And of the exercise and function it self, Censors were they H called.

Whiles these things were a doing at Rome, there came Embassadors from Ardea, craving as wel in regard of their most ancient amity, as also of the late league renued their helping hand for their City, welnigh undone and overthrown. For, peace (which wilely and by right good advise they had kept and maintained with the people of Rome) they might not enjoy at home, by reason of inward debate and domestical quarrels. The cause and beginning whereof, as it is reported, arose from fiding and factions, which have been and will be to most States more pernicious, than forrain wars, than famine or plague, or other advertities, which men attribute to the anger and wrath of God, as the extremity of all publick calamities what soever. There was a maid, a Commoners daughter and no better, by birth, but for her rare beauty of singular note and passing renown: whom two young men were fuiters unto. The one of the same condition or estate that the maid was of, and who relied upon her guardians and tutors, who also were of that degree and calling: the other a Gentleman, enamoured on her, only for her beauty. As for him, he had the good wills of the best in the City, by whose means the strife of partaking, entred even into the house of the Damosel. For the Gentleman in the Mothers judgment, was the more welcome and better liked of, whose desire was, that the maid should be preferred by marriage, and be most worshipfully bestowed. The Guardians also banded themselves, and laboured for their party. But when as the matter might not be ended within dores, it came to fuit in Law. And when the reasons and allegations were heard, both of the Mother, and also of the Guardians, the Judges pronoun- K ced fentence of marriage to be at the disposition of the Mother. But might prevailed more than right. For the Tutors aforefaid, openly in the market place of the City, having amongst those of their party and faction, complained of that injurious award, with a troup of men by force, fet the maid out of the Mothers house. Against whom arose a stronger power of the gentry, and following the young Gentleman, who was incepted and fet on fire upon this injury offered.

Whereupon mued a cruel fray. The Commons being deleated, went forth (far unlike to the Commons of Rome) armed as they were out of the City, and took for their hold a Hill, and invaded the Lands of the Nobles with fire and fword: and having gathered to them a multitude of Artifans and handicrafts men, whom in hope of spoil they had called forth, they purpose and prepare to beliege the City also, which aforetime had been altogether unacquainted with the like r ttorms. In such fort, as no kind of calamity that followeth war, was wanting : as if the poor City had been tainted, infected, and poisoned with the furious madness of two brain-fick young men, feeking a woful and deadly marriage, with the utter min and deftruction of their native Country. And neither part thought it enough to war and fight at home among themselves. For the Nobles solicited the Romans for to rescue their besieged City: the Commons stirred up the Volscians, to help to force and fack the City. The Volicians under the conduct of Aguas Cluilius came first to Ardea, and against the walls of their enemies, raised a countermure, and cast a trench, and blocked the Town round about. Which tidings being brought to Rome, forthwith M. Geranius Conful, went forth with an army, and incamped himself three miles from the enemies : and the day being nowfar spent and drawing toward night, he commandeth his fouldiers to refresh and make much of themselves, and take their rest: and afterwards at the relief of the south watch, he brought forth his enfigns, fet his men to work, and fped his business once begun, fo that by the fun-rising, the Volicians might see themselves invested more Rreightly by the Romans, then the City beleaguered by them. And on another fide the Conful had joyned a sconce to the wall of Ardea, by which way his fouldiers might go and come in fafety. The Captain of the Volscians, who had to that day prepared no victuals, but fuftained his army only with the corn which he had for the present from day to day robbed by sorraging the Country, seeing himself intrenched, and of a ludden to be destitute of all things, called the Consulforth to emparle, saying, That if the Romans coming was to raise the siege, he would remove and dislodge from thence. To which again the Conful made this reply, That vanquished men were to take, and not to make Articles of Condi-N tions: neither should they, as they were come at their pleasure to assume the allies of the Romans, so depart again when they lift to Vossai. He commanded therefore to yeeld their General, to lay down their weapons, confessing themselves overcome, and to be at his devotion. Otherwise he would be a bitter and mortal enemy unto them, whether they departed or tarried (ii), and carry home to Rome the victory of the Volkians, rather than their faithless peace. The Volkians, when they had affayed that small hope they had in their weapons (for all hope else was cut off) besides all other things that were cross unto them, encountred in a place of great disadvantage for fight, but worfe for flight: and feeing themselves on every side beaten down and flain, turned from fighting to intreating, delivered up their Captain, yeelded their weapons, were driven under the Gallows, and in their fingle doublet and hofe with great shame and calaminy, were let go and sent O away. And fixting them down to reft themselves, not tarknom the Town Tolcalams the Tusculans upon an oldgrudge and hatred against them for upon them thus disamed and taked as they were at unawates, and were someet with them that harrely there remained any one to carry news of their ill day and unfortunate overthrow. Then the Roman Col. appealed the troubles at Attea: beheaded the chief Captains of that commotions and conficated their goods to the common cheft and Chamber of the Andeats. And so by this great favour and benefit of the people of Rome, they improfed the injury of the former arbitrement was done away and recompensed. But yet

A the Senat of Rome, thought somewhat behind fill for the cancelling of the memorial of publick avarice. The Contul returned, triumphing into the City, leading Cluilius the Captain of the Yol- See the end of scians before his chariot, with the spoil born afore him of the enemies, whom he had disarmed, the former and brought under the yoak. Quintius the Conful again for his part, in his long robe and gown Book. of peace, countervailed (a thing not usually seen) the glory of his Colleague in his bright armor: who had so great regard at home to entertain concord and peace among the Citizens, by minifixing justice indifferently, as wel to the highest as to the lowest, that the Senators reputed him a severe Consul, and the Commons accounted him as meek and gentle a person, And more he won at the Tribuns hands by countenance and reputation, than by contention and debate, His B five Confulships wherein he carried himself after one and the self same manner and order : the course of his whole life, ever Contul-like, caused his person to be in a manner more reverenced then his honourable place. By this means, whiles these were Consuls, no words were made of military Tribuns. Then created they for Confuls M. Fabius Vibulanus, and Post humius Ebutius Cornicen. These Consuls, by how much greater and more glorious the acts both at home and abroad, were atchieued by those, whom they saw they were to succeed (and surely that year was right memorable among the borderers, as well allies as enemies, and namely, because the Ardeats in so hard distress, were by them succoured so much the more earnestly endeavoured for their part, to raze out of mens minds the infamy of that judgement aforefaid, and made an Act and Decree of the Senat in this form, That for as much as the City of the Ardeats, by re fon of Civil Ctroubles, was dispeopled and brought to asmall number of Citizens, there should be enrolled certain inhabitants to be fent that her for a Garrison, and defence against the Volscians. This was openly ingroffed in publick Tables, and Infruments, for a policy, that their fecret intent and purpose of reverfing and disanulling the arbitrement, might not be perceived by the Tribuns and the Commons. But they closely complotted, that when they had enrolled afar greater number of Rutilians than of Romans, for to inhabit Ardea, neither should any other lands be divided, but those which by that infamous and unhonest award were intercepted: nor that one foot or clod of ground should be assigned to any other Roman, before the whole lands were parted among all the Rutilians. Thus the domain that had been in question, returned again to the Ardests. The Triumvirs for the conveying of a Colony to Ardea, were created these, Agrippa Menenius, T. D. Classius Sientus, and M. Ebusius Helua, Who, besides that, they offended the Commons by their ready service and nothing popular, in regard, that they assigned and set out to their allies, that land which the people of Rome judged their own, were not well thought of neither, by the chief of the Nobility : because in the execution of their charge, they did nothing of affection, and for favour. Howbeit they avoided all troubles and dangers that were toward them (albeit they were accused by the Tribuns before the people.) For when they had registred and placed the Coloners, they remained still themselves in the same Colony, which they had as witness of their innocen-

In this year, and the year following, when Caius Furius Pacilius, and Marcus Papirius Craffus were Confuls, there was peace at home and abroad. The plays which had been vowed by the De-E cemvirs, according to the Senats decree, during the time of the Commons infurrection and departure from the Nobles, were this year fet forth. Petilize fought for some occasion of sedition but in vain. Who being made Tribun the second time, albeit he harped stil upon one string, and threatned the felf fame things that he had before, yet he could not bring about, that the Confuls should propose unto the Sente, concerning the division of lands among the Commons : and when as with great ado he had obtained thus much, that the Senators should be moved and their opinions asked, whether they would have an election of Confuls or Tribuns (Confular:) determined it was at length, that Consuls should be chosen. So, that the menaces of the Tribun, that he would hinder the muster, was a ridiculous matter of game: seeing that when the borderers were at quiet, there was no need either of war or preparation for war. After this great quietness of the State, F followeth a year (wherein Proculus Geganus Macerinus, and L. Menenius Langtus were Confuls) for fundry calamities and perils memorable: namely, Seditions, Famine, and hazard of receiving upon their necks the yoak of Kings rule again, and that, by the sweetness of a Largess. There wanted only forraign war: wherewith if the Common-weal had been afflicted roo, hardly could the help of all the gods above, have recovered the State. These calamities began with hunger. But whether it were, for that the year was unleasonable for corn, or that they were so in love with the plaufible and feditious Orations, and of the City it felf, that they flighted and neglected the Tillage of their ground, it is uncertain. For both the one and the other is reported. The Lords of the Senat blamed the idleness of the Commons: and the Tribuns of the Commons laid the weight, one while upon the fraud and naughtiness, another while upon the negligence and remit-Gnels of the Confuls. At the last the commoners enforced and drave the people (but not against the will of the Senate) to chuse L. Minutim Master of the provision or principal purveior of corn and victuals: a man who in that office proved more lucky to preferve the liberty of the City then happy in the exercise or ministery of his charge: albeit at the latter end, he deserved and had, both praise and thanks, for bringing down the price of Corn. Who, not withstanding many Em-bassages sent both by sea and land to the neighbor nations round about, and all to little purpose.

(ut that out of Hetruria there was brought some little sprinkling of Corn) nothing ealed and mended the Market and therefore he turned again to the dispensing or dealing the present dearth cy, and just dealing.

indifferently among all, by forcing every man to confesse what corn he had, to open his gastners. H to bring it forth, to vent and fell that, which he had more then would ferve a month. Bugwhen by this practile, and by defrauding fervants a portion of their dayly food; and by according the corn-mungers and exposing them to the surious ire of the people, he had with all his hard courfes and sharp inquisitions rather laid open then eased the present need and necessity a many of the common people despairing of all hope, rather then they would live thus milerably commented. pining and wearing away in hunger, covered their heads, and threw themselves headlone into Tyber, Then Sp. Melius, by calling a Knight or Gentleman of Rome, a man (as in thote days) exceeding rich, enterprised a thing, commodious I must needs fay, but a dishonest precedent of dangerous consequence, and proceeding of a worse mind and intent of his. For having with his own I. mony bought up the corn out of Hetruria by the means of his friends and vaffals, whose miniftry he used: which thing (I believe verily) was an hindrance that all the publick care and providence, took small effect, and nothing helped the general want and scarcity, he devised to bring up a free dole and distribution of corn: and to the end that when he had once by this benefit and liberality won the hearts of the Commons, then he might, what way soever he went carrying a port and majesty with him above the degree of a private person, draw after him a train of the people, promiting him by their favour of inpport, undoubted and affured hope of a Confulthin. But himself (as mans nature is unsatiable) not content herewith, aspired to higher matters then fortune promifed him, and those unlawful, and beyond his reach. And for as much as even the very Confulthip was to be wrested from the Nobles against their wills, he plotted to make himself a K King, and thought that, the only guerdon due for fo deep reaches and deligns, and worthy that great contention and firite which he was to abide with much toil and sweat of brows. Now drew the Election on apace for Consuls, which thing prevented him afore he had brought his devices to full ripeness and persection. Consul was created L. Quintius Capitolinus the fixth time. a man most unfit for his turn that should go about innovations and to change the state: and with him was joined Agrippa Menenius, surnamed Lanatus. And L. Minutius, was either made again the mafter victualler, or else created he was at first without limitation of time, to continue so long as the case should require. For there is no certainty thereof, but only the name of Corn-master, recorded both years in the linnen Books or Registers among other Magistrates. This Minutius was vigilant, and as careful for the Common-weal, as Melius for his private wealth: and upon oc- L casion that men of the same quality, to wit, the Commons, were conversant in both houses, namely, in his own and in the house of Melius, he came to the knowledge by their means; of Melius his treason: and declared unto the Senat the whole complot, Namely, That there was armor and weapons good flore, carried into the house of Melius: that he kept conventicles there; and made feditions Orations, and that it was past all peradventure that he practifed to be King. As for the time of working the feat and to put it into action, as yet it was not determined and certainly known: all other things were already agreed upon. Item, that the Tribuns were bribed and hired to fell and betray the liberty of the City: That to certain Captains of the multitude divers charges were appointed. And herewithal, he excused himself (and said) That because he would not be reputed the author of any uncertain or vain intelligence, he uttered these matters somewhat M with the latest, and later well-neer, then might stand with the common safety of the Weal-publick. Which news after they were heard, and that on every fide the chief Senators had given both the Cost, of the former year a check, for that they had suffered those, Largesses of corn, and tollerated meetings of the Commons in a private houle: and rebuked the new Confuls also, for that they had stayed so long and waited till a matter of so great importance was by the corn-master detected and declared unto the Senate, which required a Cof. to be not only the informer, but also the reformer: Then T. Quintim answered, That the Consuls were blamed without just cause, who being bridled with the laws of appealing, tending to the great prejudice and dilanulling of their foveraign government, had not commission sufficient by vertue of their place, to punish the thing according to the hainouinesse and quality thereof, as they had courage and heart thereto: N and that there was need now, not only of a valiant and four man, but also of one that was freed from all bonds of laws and tied to none, And therefore he would name L. Quintim for Dictator: in whom there was courage answerable to that absolute authority. When all men liked wel therof, Quintins himself at the first refused: demanding what they meant, to object and expose him, an unweldy man& fo far stept in years, to so great trouble, and manifest danger. Afterwards, when as they replied on all hands, and alledged how in that heart of his for all his age there was more valour, and in his head more policy then in all men besides; heaping on him right due and deserved praises, and commendations; and whiles the Consul also importuned him still and gave not over : then Cincinnatus, after he had prayed to the gods immortal, that his decrepit old age in fo fearful a case, might not turn either to the losse or dishonor of the Common wealth, was by O the Consul pronounced Dictator, And he forthwith nominated C. Servilius Hala General of the horsemen. The morrow after when he had set and disposed certain guards in divers places of the City, and was come down into the common place: the common people wordring at the strangenesse of the matter, had their eyes upon him: and the adherents and complices of Melins, and he himself their Captain, saw well that the force and power of this so great a magistrate was bent against them. But they that were not acquainted with those plots and defigns that tended to the setting up of a King, asked one another, what tumult or sudden war, should require either a

A Dictators majefty, or that Quintius after fourscore years of age, should be the only Rules of the City. With that, Servilius the General of the horiemen was by the Dictator feet to Melius: Who laid unto him, The Dictator calleth thee. Whereat he being airaid, asked again, What he would? and Serullim faid, That hewas to make his answer and purgation, of actime that Minimius had informed against him, before the Senat, Then Melius began to retire himselfe back into the rous of his followers, and looking about at the first, thrunk only away from him, and remied to lobey. At the last the Apparitor at the general of the horsemens commandment, began to force him to go with him : but he being rescued by the standers by, sound his sect and began to fly, and besought the aid of the Com-R monalty of Rome: faying, That the faction of the Nobles compired his overthrow, and perfecuted him for the good he had done unto the Commons, and for his liberality be-Howed upon them: beseeching them to help him in that extremity, and not to suffer him to be musdered afore their face and in their very fight. As he make these words, Hala Servilius overtookhim, and killed him out-right : and being tprinkled with his blood thus flain, and guarded with a company of tall Gentlemen of the Nobility, he bringeth word to the Dictator, how Melius, being cited to some unto him, put back the Apparitor, and railed the multitude and now had suffered due punishments for his deserts. Then (quoth the Dictator) On forth in this valor and vertice of thine, O C. Serviliar, thou defervest great praise, and hast delivered the Common-wealth this day from tyranny. Then C as the multitude murmured and made a fir upon some doubt, what they should think of thefact, and what might be the occasion thereof; he commanded them to affemble together, and openly avowed the deed, and pronounced, that Melius was juffly flain: yea, albeit he had been cleer from feeking to be King; for that being summoned and convented before the Dictator, and that by the General of the horiemen, he refused and came not: "for my self (quoth he) was set judicially to examine and enquire of the cause: and The Oration "upon the trial thereof, Melius should have sped no worse then his cause deserved: but the Diction, ce because he went about by violence to withdraw himself from judgment; by violence to the people "therefore was he restrained. I find, that this Minutine for look the Nobles and went to the Commons, and was taken to in to be the eleventh Tribun of the Commons, and appealed the mutiny that arole upon Melius his death. But it was not like that the Senators suffered the number of the Tribuns to be encreased: and especially, that such an example should be given and taken up by a man of their coat : or that the commonalty would not keep it still, if it had been once allowed, or at leastwife attempt it again. But above all, this confuteth and reproveth the false title of Tribune set upon his image, for that a few years before, it was by a statute expresly provided, That Tribuns might not chuse and take unto them a Colleague in office. Q. Cecilius, and Q. Junius, and Sextus Titinius were the only men of all the Colledge of Tribuns that propounded not the Law for the honour of Minnins, but rather acculed 1 unto the Commons, both Minutius and Servilim, and ceased not to make complaint of the cruel and unworthy death of Melius: and in fine prevailed to much, that there should be an election for military Tribuns rather then for Confuls: nothing doubting, but if his were chofen (for so many at that time might be created) some of the Commons also, by promiting to revenge the death of Melius, might step in and be elected. The Commons for all they were toffed that year with many and fundry troubles chose no more then three Tribuns with Confuls authority; and among them, L. Quintins the fon of Cincinnatus: Upon the hard conceit and hatred of whose Dictatorship patt, they thought to pick some occasion of quarrel and tumult: and Mamerous Emylius, a man of great credit and reputation, was by voices preferred afore Quintius, and obtained the first place. And L. Julius they created for the K

Whiles these bare soveraign rule, Fidene the Colony of the Romans, revolted to Lars Tolumnius, the King of the Veientians, and to the State of the Veientians. And besides their revolting, a more horriblefact they committed. For at the commandment of Tolumnius, they slew C. Fulcinius, and C. Julius, Sp. Nancus, and L. Roscius the Roman Embaffadors, who came to demand the cause of this their change and sudden alteration. Some here do excuse and elevate the act of the King, saying that upon a lucky cast of dice he uttered a doubtful speech, which was by the Fidenations so taken, as though he seemed to bid the Embassadours to be killed, and that (for sooth) was the occasion of murdering the Embassadours (a thing incredible, that at the comming in of the Fidenatians, his new allies, L who were to confult with him and ask his advice, about a murder that should break the law of Nations, his mind should not be turned away from earnest studying about his game) and so this hainous fact proveth to be but an error. More credible it is, that he had a further meaning and deeper reach: namely, that the people of the Fidenatians should be bound unto him, and only rely upon him, being attaint with the guiltinesse of so foul a murder, and not to look and hope for any mercy or favour at the Romans hands. The statues of these Embassadors which were at Fidene murdered, were set up openly at the charges of the City in the Restra. [A publick crosses of as it were) or pulpit in Rome, out of which the Macistrates made Orations to the people, beautified with the beak heads of ships and their brasen pikes called Rostra. Thus was there like to be a cruel conslict with the Veientians, and Fidenates, M Who besides that they were people confining on their frontiers, had also in the beginning of their war given so wicked and horrible a cause of quarrel. Therefore when as the common people and their Tribuns, in regard of the care for the publick State, were at quiet; there was no question, but that M. Geganius Macerinus the third time, and L. Sergius Fidenas (namad (I suppose) so, uponthe war which afterwards under his conduct was fought) should be created Consuls. For this manfirst encountred with the King of the Veientians on this fide * Anio, and gat the victory: but not without much bloodshed of the Ro-Called Teveron, mans. So that the grief was greater for the loss of his own fouldiers, then the joy for the discomfiture of his enemies. And the Senate, as in all fearful times and dangerous occurrents. ordained Mamereus Emplies to be created Dictator. Who, out of the brotherhood of N Tribuns military in Confuls authority, the year before, named for the General of his horsemen, L. Quintim Cincinnatus, who had been a Tribun with him, a toward young Gentleman, and a worthy fon of so worthy a father. To those souldiers that were by the Conful mustered and levied, were the old Centurions, experienced and skilful warriers, adjoined: and the number of those, which in that last battel were slain, was supplied. The Distator commanded to follow him as Lieutenants, Quintius Capitolinus, and M. Fabius Vikulanus. This greater power and authority, and the man likewise nothing thereto inferiour, drave the enemies out of the Roman ground, and set them farther off, even beyond Anio. Who removing their campstill backward, seized upon the hills between Fidene and Anio: neither durst they come down from thence into the open plains, before that the Le-O gions of the Falifet came to succour. Then at length, the Tuicans encamped themselves under the walls of Fidene. And the Roman Dictator likewife refled and abode upon the banks of the Confluent (where both rivers run into one) and flanked himself thereby. And when he had cast up a trenchand rampart afront, reaching across from the one river to the other, the morrow after he brought his power forth, and fet them in order of battel. The ene-

A mies were offundry minds. The Falifcians, who hardly could away long with military fervice farre from home, and trufting withal in their own felves, that they were good enough, required battel. The Veientians and Fidenates had more hope in drawing our the war on length. Tolumnius, albeit the advice of his own men liked him better, yet because the Falitcians should not endure lingting warfare, sendeth a trumpet, and proclameth battel against the morrow. The Dictator and the Romans, for that the enemies for the present shifted offfight, took more heart unto them: and on the next morning, when as now the fouldiers gave out brave words, and menaced, That unleffe they might have battel, they would affault both the Camp and the Town: the armies of both parts came forth n into the midst of the plain, between the two Camps. The Veientians, as being more in number and having to spare, sent covertly out certain companies to setch a compals behind the Hills, who in the time of the conflict should set upon the Roman Camp. And in this order flood the main Army of three Nations together embattelled. The Veientians kept the right point, the Faliscians the left, and the Fidenates the middle of the battel. The Dichator in the right point advanced his standard against the Faliscians, and on the lest Capitolinus Quintius charged the Veientians: and against the main battel between both, marched the Coronel of the Cavalry, with his Cornets of horse. Thus as they flood arranged in battel array, for a pretty while was there silence oneither side, and all quiet. For neither would the Tulcans begin first, unlesse they were urged: And the Dictator looked ever and C anon backward toward the Capitol of Rome, that the Augurs should set up a signal alost (as it was agreed between them) so soon as the flight of fowls gave approbation accordingly: which he no sooner espied, but he put out presently the men of arms, with a great shout against the enemies. The army of the sootmen followed hard after in the tail, and seconded them with a lusty charge. But on no hand were the Tuscan legions able to abide the force of the Romans. The Cavalry stood hardest to it, and made head still For the King himselfe, the best horseman and most valiant of them all, when as on every fide his enemies charged and prefled fore upon him, rode airon them, held out and maintained fight. There chanced then to be among the Roman horsemen, a Tribune or Marshal, one A. Cornelius Coffus, a goodly tall man of body, and as valiant and strong withnal, who let before his eyes the noble house from whence he was descended, and carried this mind, as it was right honourable already by his ancestors left him, so to recommend the same to his posterity more glorious and renowned. This man seeing the troops of Romans waving to and fro, for fear of the violence of Tolumnius, which way loever he bent and turned; and knowing him by his rich and royal furniture, wherein he bare himself like a brave Knight, riding all over the battel. "Is this (quoth he) the for worn breaker of "humane league, is this he that hath violated the laws of arms, and of nations? Now "will I prelently, if it be Gods will that any thing in the world should remain wholly and "inviolate, be his Prieft, I will facrifice and betake him to the ghofts of our Embaffadors "deceased. Herewith, setting spurs to his horse, with bent spear in rest, he rade full a-E gainst that one enemy, fingled from the rest; smote him, and dismounted him from his horse. Then bearing upon his staff, alight presently on foot, and as the King was getting up again, he overthrew him backward with the bots of his target, and laid him firetching long & after many wounds given him, at length fast ned him with his spear to the very ground. And when as he was once dead, he difarmed and dispoiled him, and struck off his head and carrying it aloft on his lance, presented a fearful spectacle to the enemies of their King flain, and so discomfitted them. Thus was the strength of the horsemen defeated also which only had made the battel doubtful. The Dictator having put likewise the legions of footmento flight, pursued them till, and drave them to their fort, killing them all the way in the chafe. Many of the Fidenates which knew the coasts of the Country, fled into the F mountains, and escaped, Coss with his horsemen passed over Tyber, and brought home into the City a great booty out of the country of the Veientlans. As this battel was in fighting, there was a skirmish also in the Roman camp, with that part of the forces, which (as it is aforefaid) was fent by Tolumnius to surprise it. Fabius Vibulanus first defended the rampart, ordering his men all within, in compass like a garland : and while the enemies were whosly bent about the affault, he with the Triarii or fouldiers of the rereward, suddenly issued forthat the gate, called Principalis, on the right hand, and gave an hot charge upon them : Upon which they were affrighted, but there ensued the less slaughter, because the number was smaller. Howbeit, they fled no lesse in disarray, than those in the very battel. Thus the Dictator having prosperous success every where returned with triumph into the City, by G the decree of the Senat, and grant of the people. In which triumphs the greatest shew and goodlieft fight of all, was Coffus, bearing the rich & royal spoils of the King, flain by his own hand. For of him the fouldiers chanted divers rude ballads without rime and metre, comparing him in their longs with Romalus. Which spoils with a folemn manner of dedication he bestowed and hung up in the Temple of Jupiter Ferencius, neer unto those of Romalus, which were the first and only spoils, until that time, called Opima Spoilia. And as he went he withdrew from the Dictators chariot, the eyes of all the people unto himselfe, and hee in manner alone, carried away the magnificence and glory of that testival day. The Dictator by order from the people, presented in the Capitol for the honour of Jupiter, a golden Crown, weighing one * pound weight, raised out of the common money of the

Thus have I fet down (as following all other writers before me) that Aulus Cornelius Coffus, a Colonel or Marshal, brought into the Temple of Inpiter Feretrius, the second royal spoils. Howbeit, over and besides, that those spoils onely are by right accounted Opima, or royal, which a General hath taken from a General, and we acknowledge none I for General, but him under whose conduct an high Commission a war is managed, the very title also written upon the spoils, doth check and reprove both them and me. The words whereof are these, That Cossus being Conful, won those spoils.] When I once heard say, that Augustus Casar himself, the sounder or repairer of all Temples, entred into the house of Jupiter Feretrius, which he re-edified, being by injury of long time fallen to decay, and read it so written in a linnen Jack or Curaze: Ithought it little better then sacriledge, to discredit and cancel the testimony of Coffus himself concerning his own spoils, and of Augusur Casar, the benefactor of that very Temple. Which error, if it grow hereon, That is ancient Records and Chronicles, and that the Books of the Magistrates, which being of linnen, and laid up in the Temple of Moneta, Macer Licinius doth very often quote and K cite as his Authors, do represent unto us Aulus Cornelius Cossus, the seventh year after Conful, with Titus Quintius Pennus: let every man abound in his own fense, and have his opinion by himself freely. For more then all this may be alledged to prove, that so samous a battel could not be transferred to that year: because that for three years space about the Confulship of Cossus, there was no war at all, in a manner, by reason of pestilence and dearth of corn : so as some records, as it were, mourning, and bewraying the calamity of the time, deliver unto us nothing but the bare names of the Confuls. In the third year, after that Coffus was Conful, he was military Tribun in Confuls authority, and in the same year General of the horsemen also: in which government he fought another notable battel with horsemen. But hereof a man may conjecture and guesse what he will. L But (as I think) we may tols these things of small importance to and fro, according to every mans opinion: and when all is done, the author of this battel his own felfe, having fet up thesefresh and new spoils in a holy place, in the sight of Jupiter himselse standing thereby, to whom they were vowed, and Romulus also, two witnesses, not to bee despised nor abused with a false title, hath written himself, [A. Cornelius Cossus Con-

When Marcus Cornelius Maluginensis and Papyrius Crassus were Consuls, the Armies were led forth: the one into the Veientian's Country, and the other into the Faliscians, and booties both of people and cattel were from thence driven and carried away. As for the enemies themselves, no where in the Country were they to be seen, nor any battel was M fought: and yet for all that, the towns were not affaulted, because the people at home died of the pestilence. And within the City, Sp. Melius Tribune of the Commons sought occasions and pretences to move seditions, but without effect. Who supposing by the popular favour of his name to prevaile and raise some mutiny, both arrested Minutius to make his answer, and also put up a bill for the confication of the goods of Servilius Hala: laying hard to Minutius his charge, that Melius was falsely accused and circumvented by him: and burdening Servilius with the murdering of a Citizen uncondemned, All these surmises were with the people of less credit and importance, than the author himselfe. But the violence of the fickness still encreasing more and more, troubled them: besides the searful and strange prodigious tokens: but especially, the fresh news that divers houses in the N Country were by many earthquakes cast down. Whereupon the people went in solemn procession and made their supplications, whiles the Duumvir going afore pronounced the prayers, and the people faid after him word for word. But the year following, when C. Iulius the second time, and L. Virginius were Consuls, was more contagious by reason of the plague, and caused both in Town and Country, so great a fear of utter desolation, that not only there were none let forth in any roads without the territory of Rome to raise booties, whiles the Nobility and Commons had no mind of making war: but the Fidenates also of their own accord, who before time had kept themselves either within their Towns, or Mountains, or Fortresses, entred now into the lands about Rome, and forraged all the Country, After this, having gottenalso unto them a power of the Veientians (for the Falisci-O ans could not be induced either by the calamity of the Romans, or prayers of their confederates, to take arms again) these two Nations passed over Anio, and not far from the gate Collina displayed their ensigns. So the fear was no lesse within the City than in the Country. Then Iulius the Conful bringeth the forces abroad, and placeth them upon the rampart and

A the walls: whiles Virginius affembled the Senate in the Temple of Quirinus, for to ask their opinion. Where agreed it was, to create for Dictator, A. Servilius, surnamed (as some fav) Priscus, or as other, Structus, Virginius making no longer stay than until he had consulted with his Colleague, by his permission declared the Dictator in the night season, And he nominated for his General of the Cavalry, Posthumeus Ebutius Helua. The Dictator commanded every man to be ready without the gate Collina, by the break of day: and fo many as were able to bear arms were in a readinesse. The Standards and Entigns were taken forth of the treasury or chamber of the City and brought to the Dictator. Whiles these things were in doing, the enemies were retired and withdrawn to the higher grounds and B and places of advantage; and thither marched the Dictator with his army in order of battel. And encountring with them not far from Nomentum, he discomfitted the legions of the Tuscans, and drave them into the town of Fidene, and cast a trench about it. But neither could the town be scaled for the high site thereof and the strong walls about it: and to lay fiege unto it might not avail: for that they had corn not only to suffice the ordinary need of men besieged, but also plenty to spare, of their old store and provision gathered aforehand. Thus the Dictator being without all hope both of winning it by affault, and also of forcing them to yeeld by composition, purposed in certain places for the neernesse to him well known, at the backfide of the City which was flenderly guarded, most neglected, and for the natural lituation the furest, to undermin unto the Castle. And he him-Fidme won by

C felf in places farthest off from thence, approached close under the walls, with his army di- a Strategeore vided into four parts, to succeed one another by turns in order: and so, by continual skirmishing day and night, he kept the enemies at a bay and withdrew them from all perceiving and intelligence of the work under ground: until fuch time as by digging through the hill from the Camp, there was a way and passage made straight up into the Castle. And when as the Tuscans were wholly amused upon the vain threatnings, and bravado's of their enemies before them, nothing minding the present danger wherein they stood : behold, the alarm of their enemies even over their heads, made an out-cry, that the town was taken. In this year Cn. Furius Pacilius and M. Geganius Macerinus, Cenfors, appointed and dedicated the Large Hall, named Villa Publica in Mars field: and there first by them was Villa Publica. held the Seffing and numbring of the people. I find in Macer Licinius, that in the year following, the same Consuls were made again, namely, Julius the third time, and Virginius the second time. But Valerius Antias and Q. Tubero, do name M. Manlius and Q. Sulpitius for the Consuls that year. Howbeit in so different report, both Tubero and Macer professe that they followed the linnen Records: and neither of them both conceal, that which the ancient writers have let down, namely, That the lame year were Tribuns military, in Confuls authority. Licinius without doubt is addicted to those linnen Registers, and Tubero is uncertain of the truth. But among other antiquities, not known by reason of long time, this also is left in doubt and not cleared.

After the winning of Fidene, great was the fear in Hetruria: whilest not only the Veien-E tians were scared, fearing the like destruction: but the Falifei also, remembring thewar A General Dibegan first with them, albeit they were not affistant in their rebellion. When as therefore et of all Tusthele two States had fent their Embassadours abroad to the twelve Cities about them, and canie at Fanum obtained a Diet or General Parliament of all Heiruria should be assembled at the Temple of * Viltrba at *Votumna: the Senat, as if some great troubles were like thereof presently to ensue, thought this day, as it good that Mamereus Emplius, should be created Dictator the second time. By whom, is thought. A. Post humius Tubero was named General of the horsemen. And with so much greater en- Oriel. deavor made they preparation of arms than in the last war afore, by how much more danger there was from all Hetruria banded together, than had been from two nations combined and no more. But this business was much more quiet than all men looked for. When r as therefore news came by Merchants, that the Veientians were flarly denied help, and biddento end that war by their own means and forces, which they had begun on their own heads: nor feek to embark them in the affociation of their mifery and advertity, unto whom they had not imparted their mind & hope in their upright state, and when they were in their height: then the Dictator, to the end he should not feem to be created in vain, seeing all matter of acquiring renown by war was cut off, defirous yet in time of peace, to doe some notable piece of work for a monument, fetteth in hand to abate and diminish the Censorship: either supposing it to be too high an office, or else offended not so much with the greatnesse of the honour, as with the continuance and length thereof. Having therefore The Oration affembled all the people together: "For as much as the immortal Gods (quoth he) have under- of Mamercus G" taken to govern the Common-Weale abroad, and performed all fafe and fure: I for my pret Amilus, to the "concerning that which is to be done at home within the walls, will take order and pro-"vide for the freedom of the people of Rome. Book, disfranchised and disabled him from giving his voice, and made him no better then a Tributary. Which difgrace (they fay) he took with a noble flomack, looking rather to the cause of this shameful note, than to the ignominy it self. Moreover, the Lords of the made Erarine. Senate, albeit they were willing enough that the Centorship nails should be pared and their power taken down, were offended yet, with this example of the rigour and severity of those in place: for as much as they all saw plainly, that they should be both longer time and oftner under Cenfors, then Cenfors themselves. But so great an indignation of the people (by report) grew hereof, that by the authority of no man but of Mamercus himselfe, could they be reflrained from offering violence to the very persons of the Censors. And the Tri- K buns of the Commons, with their continual Orations and Remonstrances, prohibited the Election of Confuls. When as the matter was well neer brought to the point of an Interreign, they obtained at length with much strife and contention, that there should be mili-Tribuns Mili- tary Tribuns chosen, with Consular authority. But reward of this their victory, whereat they shot, could they get none: namely, that a Commoner might be chosen for one. They were all of the Nobility that were created, to wit, M. Fabins Vibulanus, M. Foling, and L. Sergius Fidenas.

The plague that year was the occasion of quietness from all other troubles. A Temple then was vowed to Apollo for the health of the people. Howbeit, great lois was there both in town and country, by the the mortality of men and murrain of cattel, one with another L indifferently. And fearing lest the husbandmen of the country should be famished, they sent for corninto Hetruria and the country of Pomptinum, to Cumes, and at last even into Sicily. And not a word all this while about the election of Confuls. So there were military Tribuns elected, with Confuls authority, all again of the Patritii, namely, L. Pinarius Mamercus, L. Furius Medullinus, and Sp. Posthumius Albus. That year the violence of the ficknesse abated: neither was there any danger or fear of scatcity of Corn, because they had made provision aforehand. Great sitting and consultation there was in the general Diets of the Volscians and Equians, and in Hetruria at the aforesaid Temple of Votumnia about making war. There, the matter was put off for one whole year: and by an Act or Decree it was provided, that, no Assembly or Parliament during that time should be held:notwithstanding the M people of the Veientians complained but all in vaine, that the same fortune was like to happen unto Veii, which had fallen already upon Fidene, even the utter subversion of the State: In this mean season, at Rome the chiefe heads of the Commons having aspired and gaped now a long time, but still in vain, after higher place of dignity and honour, took their vantage whiles all was quiet abroad, and began to have their conventicles and meetings in the houses of the Tribunes, and there entertained secret Counsels. Some complained that they were much despised of the common people: for whereas in fo many yeares, There were Tribunes Military created with Consuls authority, yet never was there any one of the Commonalty advanced to that Dignity. Our forefathers (fay they) ingreat wisedom and deep fore-N cast, have done well to take order, that none of the Nobility at any time should have access to any office of the Commonalty: for if that were not, the Commons should have hadere this some of the Patritii for their Tribuns: so odious are webecometo those of our own coat; and are as little fet by of the Commons as of the Nobles. Others excused the people, and laid the fault upon the Senators : by whole ambition, by whole crafty fetches and subtil policies it came to passe, that the Commons were stopped from the highway to advancement and promotion. But if the Commons might have any respit or breathing time, and not be follicited and tempted by their prayers interlaced with threats: they would remember themselves and those of their own calling, in giving of their voices: and having once gotten assistance unto them, would also win the highest pitch and soveraign type of authority. For O the abolishing therefore of this ambitious feeking and standing for offices, they agree and refolve, that the Tribuns should prefer and publish a Law, that no man might wear white more then ordinary, or refresh the bright hue of his upper garment, while he sued for any dignity, A smal matter now adayes, and may seem scarcely worth the debating in serious counsel, and themselves and those of their own callings in giving of their voices and having once gotten affiftance unto them, would also win the highest pitch and soveraign type of authority. For the abolishing therefore of this ambicious seeking and standing for offices they agree and refolve, that the Tribuns should prefer and publish a law, that no man might wear white more then ordinary, or refresh the bright hue of his upper garment, while he sued for any dignity. A small matter now adays and may feem fearcely worth the debating in ferious counsel, which notwithstanding at that time, set both nobles and commons in a great heat of contention. Yet obtained the Tribuns to much, that this law passed; and it appeared. B that the Commons when their blood was once up, would affect their own, and wholly incline to them in their suffrages. But to the end that they might not have their full scope and out it in practice, an Action the Senate was, that there should be held an Election of Confuls. The occasion thereof, was a tumult or commotion; which, as the Latins and Hernicks advertised them, arose from the Equians and Volscians. T. Quintius Cincinnatus, the ion of Lucius (furnamed also Pennus) and C. Julius Mento were elected Confuls. Netther was this fearful news of war entergained any longer. For the enemies having by a facred law (which amongst them was of greatest force to levy an army) mustered their power, fet forth two mighty armies from both parts, into Algidum, and there met. Where the Aquians and Volicians, feverally by themselves encamped strongly, and more earnestly fudied the Captains to fortifie their hamps; and to train and exercise their fouldiers. than at any time afore. Whereupon, the news was more fearful that the mellengers brought to Rome. So the Senate agreed to create a Dictator. Eor, although those nations of entimes shad been vanquished by them, yet now they rebelled in more forcible manner, and with preparation, than at any time before, Allo, by reason of the late sickness, the youth and flower of the Romans, was fore diminished. But above all, the private discord of the Confuls one with another, and the debate, and difference in all their counsel terrified them most. There be that write, how these Consuls had but unlucky fortune, and lost a field in Algidum: and that it should be the cause of making a Dictator. But this one thing is certain, that how loever else the Consuls disagreed, yet, they jumped in one to cross the wills of the Senators, in that they would not nominate a Dictator until such time as after news brought, fill worse and worse, and yet the Consuls would not be ruled by the Senators: one Quintus Servilius Prifeus, a man, who right worthy and honourably had born the highest offices, made this speech : " My Masters, ye that are Tribungof the Commons (quoth he) in this The speech of "exigent and desperate case, the Senate calleth for your affiliance; that in so great hazzard "of the Common-weal, ye by vertue of your authority, would force the Confuls peremp- Prifera "torily to make a Dictator. Which speech being once heard; the Tribuns supposing now they had good occasion offered, to stretch and extend their power to the full, departed afide: and in the name of their Colledge or fociety, pronounced. That it was their pleasure and will, that the Confuls should be obedient unto the Senat: and in case they proceeded to E do farther, then the conient of that most honourable House would bear them out, they would command them to ward. The Confuls chose rather to be over-ruled of them than of the Senat: faving yet withal, that the prerogative of the highest government was by the Senators betrayed, and the Confulthip made thrall and subject to the Tribuns power, if so be the Confuls might be compelled to do ought by vigour of the Tribuns authority, and (than which, a private perion could fear no more) be fentalfoto ward, or committed to prilon. The lot fell to T. Quintius (for in this also they could not agree between themselves) to nominate the Dictator: who named A. Posthumius Tubertus, his wives father, a grim Sir, and a man of most severe and stern government. By whom was L. Julius nominated for General of the Cavalry : Herewithal was proclamed a vacation or law fleed, and that through-Four the whole City they should go in hand with nothing but war. The taking knowledge of fuch as prerended to be freed and exempt from fouldiery, was put off until the war was ended.

So that they that were before doubtful fuffered themselves to be enrolled : and souldiers were levied our from the Hernicks and Latins, who from both places obeyed the Dictator to their uttermost. All these things were dispatched with exceeding expedition. Then the Dictator having left C. Julius the Conful, for the defence of the City, & L. Julius the General of the horsemen for all sudden occasions incident unto wars, that they might not be to feek for any thing whereof they had need in the camp, took with him Aulus Cornelius the High Prieft, & faying after him certain prayers, word for word, he vowed great and starely playes, in regard of this tumultuous and troublesome war : and thus departing from the City, and dividing his whole like as they had discovered the two camps of their enemies, a little space distant one from another, fothey also, about a mile from the enemy, intrenched themselves; the Dictator neer to Tusculum, and the Consul to Lanuvium. So these four Armies, and as many fortified camps, had a spacious and large plain in the middle, sufficient not only for small excursions to skirmish in, but also to display their armies of both sides. And all the time that they lay

G army between himself and Quimius the Cos, at length he approached the enemies. And encamped one against another, they reased not to make light skirmishes: for the Dictator H was well content, that his men by making proof, and comparing their firength and pullance with their enemies, and affaying by little and little to try the event of these skirmishes, should conceive aforehand some hope of the entire and general victory. The enemies therefore having no hope left, to speed well in a set field and pight battel, asfailed by night the Confuls camp, and put all to the hazard of a doubtful iffue. The judden cry and alarm, awakned not only the Confuls, Sentinels, his corps de guard, and so his whole army, but the Dictator also out of their sleep. And where need was of present help, there failed not the Coninl, either in courage or counsel. Some fouldiers ward and detend the gares, others compais the trench, ranged in a round array. In the other camp of the Dictator. look how much less flir there was, so much more leasure had they, and fludied what was most needfal to be done. Forthwith aid was sent unto the Consul his camp, under the leading of Sp. Polithumius Albus, a Lieutenant. The Dictator hintself in person, with part of his power, feeching a small compais about, gained a place most apart from all noise and rumult, and from whence at unawares he might charge upon the back of the enemies. And leaveth as Vicegerent in the leaguer Q. Sulpiting and to M. Fabinia Lieutepant, he committeth the conduct of the horsemen, commanding him not before day to fir with his horse. as being unruly and hard to be managed in tumults and troubles of the night. And all things elfe, that a provident and industrious Captain in such a case might command and do, that commanded he, and did orderly. But for one thing above the reft, he shewed singular K proof of policy and courage, and worthy no mean praise: in that he sent out first M. Geganius with certain choien Squadrons to affail that camp of the enemies, from whence he knew by his espaids there was departed a greater part of the forces. Who after that he furprifed the enemies there, amused wholly upon the event of other mens danger, carelesse and secure for their own selves, and therefore neglecting their secure and guards, wan their hold, in manner before the enemies knew well it was affailed. From whence the Dictator having descried a smoak (which was the signal agreed between them) crieffi aloud; that the enemies camp was won, and commandeth news thereof to be carried every way. Now it waxed broad day light, and all wastlearly to be feen: by which time both Fabins with the horsemen, had given the charge, and the Consul also had made a fally out of the camp, up-1. on the enemies that now already were scared. But the Dictator on the other fide, charging upon the reseward and the middle battel, came on every fide with his footmen, and horsemen in train of victory against the enemies: who were forced to turn round and fight every way; according to the difforant outries, and ladden alarms. Thus being environed round about; they had in the midt diedfor it every one, and fuffered punishment due for their rebellion, had not Vettius Messius, one of the Volscians, a man more renowned for his valiants acts, then noble by his parentage, rebuked with a found voice his fellows, being rea-

What of Vettus may be seen with your armour and weapons? Why began ye war first? Are you trouble- M low souldiers. cc some and unruly in peace, and cowards in war. What hope have ye in standing still? "Do you look for some god from Heaven to protect and deliver you? You must make "way by dint of fword. Gotothen, and flick to it like men, and that way whereas ye " shallseeme go afore, follow ye after, as many of you as mind to see again your home, "vour parents, your wives and children. It is neither wall, nor rampart and trench, bur armed men that must withstand armed men. In valour ye are their matches, but in respect " of necessity (which is the last and strongest engin of all other) ye are the better, When he had these words spoken, and done accordingly, with a fresh shout they followed after, and made head to that quarter whereas Posthumius Albius had placed against them his cohorts: and compelled the victors to lose ground, until such time as the Dictator came to succour his N men thus diffressed, and now ready to retreat: and so he bent thither all the force of the whole battel. In one only man, Messius, rested all the hope and fortune of the enemies, Manv a man was there hurt on both parts, and many a one flain outright, and left dead in the place. So as now the very Roman Commanders, fought not without bloodfied. Only Po-Abumius being finitten with a stone, which had broken and bruised his head, went out of the throng: for neither the Dictator, wounded as he was in the shoulder, nor yet Fabius, albeit his thigh was almost nailed to his horse, nor the Consul, for all his arm was quite cur off, once retired or departed out of that dangerous combat. But Messius amidst the enemies that there lay dead on the earth, with a guard about him of most hardy & tall men passed through in forcible manner, and elcaped clear to the Volkians leaguer, which as yet was not loft: and o fo the whole bartel inclined thither. The Conful, after he had chased them, scattered in parties here and there, even as far as to the trench, affaileth the very camp and the rampart. Thither also bringeth the Dictator his power to another side. Neither was the assault less hot there then the fight was sharp afore. It is said moreover, that the Consul threw an enfigh within therampart, to animate the fouldiers, that they might more eagerly get up after it:

A and so by recovering the banner again, was the first breach and entrance made. Thus the Dictator having broken through the mure, came to close fight and hand-firoaks even within the camp; Then began the enemies every where to fling from them their weapons, and to yeeld themselves prisoners. So being themselves and their pavillions taken, they were all sold, but those of Senators calling. Part of the pillage was restored to the Latins and Hernicks, namely, to as many as knew their own goods: part thereof the Dictator fold in port-fale, And leaving to the Conful the charge of the camp, rode himself triumphing into the City, and gave over his office. Of which his noble and famous Dictatorship, they blemish the memorial, who write, that A. Posthumius (the Dictator his ion, for that upon advantage offered of a fortunate service he departed without leave from B his quarter and guard) was after his victory atchieved, by his fathers Commandment beheaded. But I lift not to believe it. And lawful it is for me to to do, among fo divers opinions : and a good proof it is on my fide, that fuch imperious and rigorous proceedings were called Imperia Manli- Imperia Manand, and not Post humiana. For like it is, that he who had given the first example of such cruelty, liana. should have gotten afore all others, that noted title of cruelty. Belides, Manlius it was, that was furnamed Imperious. But Posthumius is not marked with any odious note at all. C. Inlins Conful, in the absence of his Collegue, without any casting of lors, dedicated the Temple of Apillo. Quintius having discharged his army, when he was returned into the City took not that well, But it was no boot to complain in the Senat house, Moreover, in this notable year, to full of brave and worthy acts, there is recorded one thing, that was thought in those days no-C thing pertinent to the State of Rome, namely, that the Carthaginians (fo great and mortal enemies in time to come) passed the seas then first: and (upon the occasion of civil dissention and discord among the Sicilians) with a power landed in Sicily, for to take part with a fide and faction. In the City of Rome the Tribuns of the Commons laboured, that Military Tribuns might be with Confuls authority chosen: but it could not be obtained. Consuls were made, Lu. Papyrius Crassus, and L. Inline. The Aquians Embaffadors fuing to the Senat for a league, and for that league, pretending very often to yeeld themselves, and be in subjection, obtained a truce only for 8, years. The Volicians after their overthrow in Algidum fell to continual debate and contention, whiles fome perswaded peace, and others war: so long, until at length they grew to brawls and mutinies. So on every fide the Romans were at reft. The Confuls understanding that the Tribuns of the D Commons were complotted (for one false brother among them bewrayed and detected all) to put up a bill, and make a law, concerning the estimation of fines and penalties (a thing right plea- An act for fing and acceptable to the people) they themselves prevented them, and preferred it. Then were fines and pe-

Servius, Quincus Servilius, and Mamercus Amilius, Some of them were confined to Holtia, for that they could make no found excuse, and justifie their absence for certain days out of Fidene. So E the number of the inhabitants there, was encreased; and their lands, who were slain in the wars,

The scarcity of water besides about springs that were dried up, and much mortale the small rivulets and brooks caused a great death and mortality of cattel for default of drink: tie thereupwhereof some died of the scab: by contagion whereof the people also were diseased generally. on. The malady first began among the rustical fort, the bond-slaves and hinds: and afterwards spread into every corner of the City. Neither were men only tainted and dileased with this insection: Rome addited bur their minds also were troubled and possessed with fundry forts of supersitions religious, and to supersition F those for the most part strange and forrain: whiles upon vain and foolish propheses, they brought ons. new rites and ceremonies of facrificing into menshoules; and made good gain of fuch as were given to superstitious devotion, and made conscience of every little thing: until such time as now it grew to a publick offence, and the chief of the City were ashamed to see in every street and chappel, strange and unaccustomed purgatory sacrifices and expiations, for to procure the favour and mercy of the gods. Whereupon the Ædiles had in charge and commission, to look streightly to this diforder : and that no other gods were worshipped, then those of the Romans : nor after any other manner than had been usual in their native country. So their anger against the Veientians, and defire of revenge, was put off unto the next year following, when C. Servilius Hala, and L. Papirius Magilanus were Confuls. And even then, they made some ictuple to proclaime G war immediately, or to make out any power against them: but they thought good to send their Heralds afore, to make claim for their own and challenge restitution. For whereas of late years there had been a field fought with the Veientians before Nomentum and Fidene: whereupon there followed no peace but only a truce concluded: both the time was now expired, and also before the day they had rebelled. Yet were there Heralds fent unto them. And when they had demanded amends by a folemn oath and other ceremonies according to the ancient manner, they might have no audience, neither were their words regarded. After this there as rose some question whether the war should be proclamed with the peoples allowance & suffrages or the Senates decree were alone sufficient. The Tribuns by giving out and threatning that they H would from the musters, obtained in the end, that Quinting the Consul should propound this matter concerning the war unto the people. And it patied clear through all the Centuries, Herein also had the Commonalty the better of it, for that they prevailed that there should be no Consuls chosen the year following. So there were four Tribuns military created with Confuls authority, T. Quin ius Pennus immediately from his Confulship. C. Furius, M. Posthumius, and Cornel us Coffus: of which Coffus had the charge and government of the City. The other three after they had mustered, took a journey to Veii sand made good proof how hurtful in war is the rule of manv Commanders. For whiles every man was inclined to his own counsel and advice, and took divers courses one from another, they made way for the enemies and gave them advantage. For y the Veientians taking their opportunity and time, entred upon the army thus distracted, whiles some commanded to sound a retreat, others the alarm and to strike up the battel. Whereupon they were disordered and put to flight. But for as much as the camp was neer at hand, thither they retired themselves in safety: so, as the shame they gat was more then the harm in this deseat. The City was pensive and hereupon forrowed, as not used to take foiles and overthrows. The Tribuns they hated, and required a Dictator; in whom refled ever the whole hope and flay of the City. And when as even in that behalf, they made a matter of conscience, because there might not be any Dictator nominated, but by a Conful, the Augurs were confulted withal: who refolved them of that doubt and rid them of their scruple, So A. Cornelius (a consular Tribun) nominated Mamerous Amilius Dicator: by whom he was himself also pronounced Grand Ma- K fter of the horsemen. At such default was the City then, of right valour and true vertue, that notwithstanding the prejudice by the Censors, yet there was no remedy, but the whole government of the state should rest upon that family, which had been wrongfully disgraced and unworthily noted by the Cenfors. The Veientians proud of their late good success, albeit they sent their Embassadors about all the nations of Hetruria, boafting and vaunting that in one battel they had discomfited three Roman

them in publick action: but they procured divers from all parts for hope of ipoil, voluntarily to aid and affift them. The people of Fidene only agreed to rebel. And as though it had been in no wise lawful, to begin any war but with some wicked, heinous and execrable fact: like as aforethey had embrewed their hands, and bathed their swords in blood of Embassadors, so then, they began with murdering their new received Coloners: and so banded themselves with the Veientians. Then consulted the Princes and States of those two nations, whether they should make Veii or Fidene the seat town of the war, Fidene was supposed the fitter and more commodious, So the Veientians passed over the Tyber, and translated the war to Fidene. Great fear was there at Rome to see the army of their enemies'removed from Veii, and implanted at Fidene, And being shrewdly danted by their late overthrow besides, they encamped even before the gate Collina. On the walls were armed fouldiers placed, vacation in all courts of law was ordained, shop windows shut up, and all more like a Leaguer then a City. Then fem the Dictator the Criers about into all streets and lanes, to summon the Citizens thus terrified, to a general affembly. Where he rebuked them M for carrying such wavering and doubtful hearts upon to small accidents and events of fortune having received but a flight loss and smal foil: and that, not through the manhood of the enemy, or cowardise of the Roman army, but only through the disagreement and difference of the Leadezs. "Also for that they were atraid of the Veientian enemy, whom five or fix times afore they " had put to the worst and vanquished and especially of Fidene, which had been oftner in a man-"ner won, then assaulted. As for the Romans and their enemies (saith he) they are even the "fame fill that always for fo many hundred years, they had been: bearing the fame minds, the "fame bodily strength, and the same armor, and even my self am the same Mamercus Emilius, "and no other, who heretofore discomfitted at Nomentum, the Veientians and Fidenatians, with "the Falicians power also adjoined unto them. And as for A. Cornelius, he wil no doubt be the N " same General of horsemen in this battel, as in the sormer war he was: at what time he being a "Knight Marshal flew Lars Tolumnius the King of the Veientians, in the fight of two armies: "and brought into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the rich armor of him despoiled. Wherefore "ve ought to remember this, that we have on our fide triumphs, spoils and victory: whereas "with the enemies remaineth the wicked and detectable fact of killing the Embassadors, against "the law of all nations: also the massacre of the Fidenatian inhabitants, in time of peace: the brea-"king of truce, and their revolting now seven times to their ruin and overthrow. Take weapon "therefore in hand like men: for I trust assuredly, that so soon as we shall join our camps together, "and encounter these most wicked enemies, they shall have no long joy of the shameful discom-"fiture of the Roman army. And the people of Rome shall understand, how much better they of " have deserved of the Common-weal, who made me Dictator now the third time, than those, " who for clipping the Cenfors wings and abridging them of their kingly rule, had distained "and disgraced my second Dictatorship with the shameful blot of ignominy and reproach. After this speech, when he had made his vows accordingly: he encamped a mile and an half on this fide Fidene, flanked on the right hand with the hills, and on the left with the river Tyber. And commanded T. Quintius Pennus his Lieutenant, to gain the hills afore, and be possessed fecretly of that cape or hill, which was on the back part of the enemies. Himself the next morrow

A when as the Tuscans, I full of pride and stomack for the prosperous success of former dayes, which was much better than their lervice in fight) came forth into the field: after he had flayed a while . until the foots and e pials brought word , that Quintus was gotten fafely unto the Hill top near adjoyning to the Cattle or fort of the Fidenatians, he advanceth forth his standards: and with his footmen ranged in battel array, marched against his enemies with full pace: com-"manding his General of the Horsemen not to charge without his warrant: for that he himself "as need should require, would give the signal for the aid of his cavalry to come in, willing him "then, to quit himself like a brave Knight in remembrance of his glorious combate with a King: " of his rich present and oblation: and of Romnius and Inpiter Ferdinus. Thus the legions assail R one another and encounter right hardily. The Romans kindled and enflamed with rancour and malice, termed the Fidenatians, wicked and godless wretches: the Veientians, Robbers and

Theeves; truce-breakers both, polluted with the abominable murder of Embaffadors: fleyned with the execrable massacre of their cohabitants: saithless and treacherous allies, cowardly and dastardly enemies: thus both in word and deed they satisfied their hatred to the full; And at the very first shock forced their enemies to shrink. At which instant all at once, there issued out of the open gates of Fidene a strange army, not heard of nor usual, before that day; A mighty number armed with fireworks, and shining all over with burning lights, after a fanatical and mad manner, ran as if they were carried with spirits, upon their enemies: and with the uncouth fight of this kind of fight, amased the Romans a prety while. Then the Dictator busy in fight, ha-C ving fent both for the General of the Cavalry with his troups of Horlemen, and also for Quintius from the mountains, haltened himself to the left point: which being terrified with a scarefire more like than a battel, had given place unto the flame, and flepped back. And will ye not every man for his part, if we mult needs fouldiers, " fight with fire, and not with weapons, pull from them their torches and firebrands, and fline "them again at their own heads? Go to, I fay, like hardy men, mindful of the renown of Ro-"mans, remembring the prowels of your Fathers, and your own telves. Turn this fire upon your " enemies City, and consume Fidene into ashes with her own slames: this disloyal Fidene, which n " by no favors and good turns of yours, ye were ever able to win and pacifie. The bloud of your

" Embassadors, the bloud of your Coloners thither sent to people their City, your Frontiers and

"Borders by them wasted, put you in mind of no meaner revenge. At the Dictators commandment, the whole battaillon was moved and encouraged. Some catch the firebrands as they flews others by force match them from them, fo that now both battels were armed with fire. The

out of their Horses mouths, and was the first himself, that setting spurs to, rode with bridle in

Horseneck, into the midst of the fire: and the other Horses also being pricked sorward, and eased of their bridles, carried the riders with full carier against the enemy. The dust rising together with the smoke, took the light from menseyes, and Horses both. And that sight which had terrified the E souldiers, nothing at all affrighted the Horses: Wheresoever therefore the men of arms rode, they bare down all afore them as if some Houles had come tumbling upon their heads. Herewith hapned a new al'arm to be heard, which having caused both armies to wonder and listen thereunto, the Dictator cryeth out aloud, That Quintius the Lieutenant and his Regiment, came upon the back of the enemies: and himself reenforcing the shout, advanceth his ensigns forward more freshly. When as now two armies, and two divers battels, pressed fore upon the Tulcans, and environed them both before and behind: and that the enemies could neither flye back to their camp, nor yet retire or withdraw themselves unto the mountains, from whence a fresh supply of enemies, made head, and affronted them: and that the horses being unbridled, carried the riders every way hither and thither the most part of the Veientians ran scattering in disorder, and highing F them apace, toward the Tyber: and the Fidenatians that remained to the City Fidene, But in that fearful flight they ran upon their own death. Some were killed on the banks of the River, others were driven into the water, and the stream and whirlepits carried them away. And even they that were cunning swimmers, what with wearinesse, and what with faintness of their wounds and with fright, funk and were drowned: so that few of many swam over insafety. The other army fled through their camp into the City. The same way also the Romans followed for ibly after and Quintius especially, together with them who erewhile came downstom the mountains, and were the freshest souldiers for fight (as who came last into the battel) and so afterwards entred pell-melt among their enemies into the gate climbed upon the walls, and from the walls fet up a banner to their fellows, in token that they had won the Town. Which as foon as the Dictator G espied, (for now by this time had he made an entrance into the foriorn, and abandoned camp of his enemies) he brought the fouldiers, upon defite to run to a spoil, and hoping of a greater faccage in the City, streight unto the gate. And being gotten within the walls, marcheth directly forward to the Castle, whereinto he beheld the multitude to slye for refinge and fafety. The execution in the City was no less than in the field: which continued until they threw away their weapons, and craving nothing but life yeelded themselves to the Dictator. So both City and camp was spoiled and sacked. The morrow after, the Dictator disposed of his prisoners thus He drew them by lot, and gave to every Horseman and Centurion one, and to as many as had done more valiantly than other, two apeece: the rest he fold in portsale. And to with triumph brought home H to Kome his victorious army, enriched with a great booty: and having commanded the General of the Horsemen to refign up his office, himself also surrendreth his own, upon the fixteenth day after his creation, yeelding up his government in peace, which in time of war, and in a fearful flare he had received.

There be some that have recorded in their Chronicles, that there was a battel fought with the Veientians at Fidene by thips upon the water. A thing verily, no less impossible than incredible. Considering that even at this day, the river is not broad enough for such a purpose; and at that time . (as by ancient men we have learned) it was far narrower than now it is. Unless haply in croffing over the river some vessels or bottoms, that were put out to meet and to receive them, I were hayed. And to, men making the matter greater (as usually it cometh to pais) have defired a vain title of a naval victory at Sea. The year following, there were military Tribuns, with Confuls authority, A. Sempronius Atratinus, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Furius M. dullinus, and L. Horatus Barbarus. Then was there a truce granted unto the Veientians for twenty years, and to the Æquians for three years, whereas they had made juit for more. Refl there was also from all feditions and booils in the City. The yearfollowing, having neither war abroad, nor yet fedition at home, was famous yet for the playes which in time of war had been lowed; both in regard of the great preparations that the Military Tribuns made, as also for the frequent re ort and concourse of the Nations adjoyning. The Tribuns with Contuls authority were Cl. Craffus, Sp. Nauwhereunto those firangers were come by publick consent of their States, was unto them more

After these " playes there enjued feditious Orations of the Tribuns of the Commons, who rebuked the com-"mon multicude, for that they being belotted with admiration of those whom they had 10 ha-"ted, kept themselves in perpetual thraidome. And not only durst not attempt to put forth them-" le ves for to bring in again the possibility to have Consuls of their part as in time past : no. nor "fo much as in the restion of Military Tribuns (the Election of whom was indifferent as well " for Commons as Nob es) were mindful or thought either upon themselves or their friends. "and those of their own body : And therefore they should surcease to marvel, why no man pleaed ded for the benefit of the commona ty. For travel is well beflowed, and danger well adventu-"red, where profit and honor might be hoped and looked for. And nothing is so difficult but "men would employ themselves to enterprise the same, if for the adventuring of great exploits, "there might be proposed as great rewards, But, that any Tribun of the Commons should run de-" (perate y and blindly into a world of brawls and troubles, with great hazard of his perion, and "no hope at all of fruit and profit in the end : for which contention he might be fure that the No-"bles against whom he vrived would perfecute him with deadly and in econcitable malice; and " at the Commons hands, for whom he thus contended, he should be honored and advanced " never the more, it was a thing neither to be expected, nor required. The only means to get "courage and magnanimity, is advancement to high place of honor and dignity. And as for them, they would not diddin the meanest commoner that was, if they themselves might be no more M "de piled. To conclude the matter were worth the tryal in one or two, whether any commoner "were inflicient to bear a great office of state; or whether it were a wondrous thing and strange "miracle, that a valiant and hardy man should arise out of the commonalty. With much a do "(fav they) we got and obtained that Tribuns military with Confu's authority might likewise be "Choien out of the commonalty: and men approved both in war abroad and in affairs of Stare "at home had fued therefore. In the first years they being nipped by you, and so having the re-" pulse, were had inderifion of the Nobility: so that at length they sorbare to give themselves "thus contumeliously to be misused and made fools. We see no cause therefore, why that law al-" fo should not be repealed, wherein a dignity was granted, and never like to be obtained. For "less shame would there arise, if the law were not indifferent nor respective unto them, than as N "unmeet persons and unworthy, thus shamefully to be passed by and take the repulse. These and fuch like peeches were heard with fo good an ear and general applause, that some of them were in ited forward to sue for the Military Tribunship: whiles every one promited in the time of his office to do great matters, and to propose, some one thing, some another, for and concerning the benefit of the Commons. Pretending great hopes of dividing the common Lands, and planting of colonies abroad, and laying tributes and impositions upon landed persons, for to pay souldiers wages. But the Tribuus military then in place, devised to spye out a time, when upon some occasion of the abience of much people departed out of the City, the Senators by a privy and fecret warning, should at a certain day be called home: and then, whiles the Tribuns of the Commons were away, an act of Senate should passe in this form: That for asmuch as it was o noised that the Volsaians were entred into the Lands of the Hernicks to forrage and rob. the military Tribuns should go to see whether it were so or no, and that in the mean while there should be held a general affembly for the Election of Confuls. The Tribuns military took their journey accordingly, and left Appius Claudius the Decemvirs fon, Governour of the City, a from young Gentleman and a forward, who from his very cradle bare an inward grudge and hatred against the Tribuns and the Commons. And bootless it was either for the Tribuns of the Commons to find themselves grieved with those, who made the decree, now that they were

A absent, nor yet had they cause to quartel with Appin Clanding, because the thing had been contrived and patt afore his time. So, Conline were created. C. Sempronius Atratinus, and Quintus Fabius Vibulanus.

A forrein matter, but yet worthy to have more and bere intered, is teponed to have hapned that year: to wit, that Vulturuum a City of the Tulcanes, which now is Capua, was by the Samnites taken : and that it came to be named Capua of one Capus their Captain, or (which towns deth more like a truth) of the champian field. But they wan it by this means. For upon occasion that the Tulcans were wearied with former wars, they were admitted into the lociety of their City and territory. And on a solemn seastival day, when as the citizens had filled their bellies, and R were found affeep, these new Coloners the Samnits, set upon the old inhabitants, and in the night ieason slew them all.

But now to return. Things passing thus (as I faid before) the Confuls abovenamed upon the *13 of De-*Ides of December, entred their government. By which time not only they which were of purpose sent to learn the news of the Volcians, brought word that war was at hand but Embassadors alio from the Latins and Hernicks, gave intelligence of the same. And namely, that never at any time afore, the Volscians were more buly and occupied, either in chusing of good Captains, or in levying an army, giving out their speeches abroad and in every place, That the time was now come, either to forget warfare, and lay away fouldiery, and for ever make account to bear the voke of thraldom; or elfe not to give one foot, nor come behind those with whom they strove C for foveraignty, either in manhood or in painful travel, or in Discipline of warfare. And surely they were no vain tidings that those medengers reported. But the Senators would take no such knowledge, nor be greatly moved at the matter. And withal, C. Semp oniss, unto whom the charge of that war was allotted, preluming upon fortune, as if the were alwayes right constant and at command, and leading an army of a people nied to victory, against those that were wont to be overcome, did all things rashly and negligently. So as to speak a truth, there was more Roman Discipline in the Volscian host than in the Roman. And so fortune (as oftentimes else) went with vertue. At the first encounter, which by Sempronius was unheedfully and unadvitedly begun, before that either the battaillons were reinforced and threngthened, with fresh supplies of succour, or the Horsemen ranged in convenient place, they ran together, and came to handstrokes. And the first

D token which way the victory would encline, was the manner of shout at the first charge; which by the enemy was more loud, more shrill and continual; but by the Romans dissonant, unequal, dead and cold, often begun, and often requed; and by their uncertain and variable noise, they bewrayed the inward fear of their hearts. Whereupon the enemies so much the more eagerly tharged them, pressing upon them with their shields, and laying at them thick with their bright swords: on the other fide, the Romans helmets wag, and their crefts, nod every way as they look about them : and as they were to feek what to do, to they tremble and run together on heaps : one while the enfigns stand still, and were abandoned of the formost fighting in the vanguard another, while they retired in again amongst their own squadrons. Yet was not the flight certain, nor yet the victory. The Romans fought more to cover and shrowd themselves than to fight : to ward E blows rather than to strike. The Volstians set forward their entighs, pressed upon the main bat-tel, and saw more enemies under foot slain than running away. And now in all places the Romans retired, notwithstanding Sempranius the Consul both rebuked and also exhorted them to flick to it: for neither his commandment nor the authority and Majetty of his countenance availed ought. And immediately had they all turned their backs on their enemies, if Sex. Tempanius, a Decurion of Horsemen, had not in this desperate case, with a resolute courage and ready The valor of advile, helped at a pinch; Who cryed with a loud voyce, that those Horsemen which would the safety of the common-wealth, should dismount off their Horses, And when the Corners of Horses men bestirred themselves at his words no less than if the Consul had given commandment; "Un-"less (faith he) this troup of men of arms, stay the violence of the enemies, we see the last of the F "Roman Empire. Follow therefore in stead of banner displayed, the point of my lance: let

"both Romans and Volscians see, that no nation is comparable to you, either for foot or "Horse. Whose encouragement being approved and received with a shout, he advangeth forward, bearing his staffalost: and what way soever they go, they enter and make room with forcible sway: and where they see their fellows in greatest distress, thither they make speed, oppoling their targets afore them. And thus in every place whereas they thrust themselves forcibly, was the fight renued: and doubtless the enemies had turned their backs, if possible it had been, for so sew to have performed every thing at once Now when as the General of the Volscians, saw his men not able to withstand them, he gave a signal and charge to give way to this new band of enemies, to wit, these Targettiers: until such time as they had put themselves so for-

G ward that they might be excluded from their fellows. Which being done, these Horsemen were enclosed on every fide: neither could they break through that way which they went, because the enemies were there thickest, where they had made their lane before. The Col, then, with the legions of the Romans, having lost the fight of those that had been a shield of defence and bulwark ere while to the whole army, lest that so many hardy men thus invironed, should be overpressed by the enemies; refolved to adventure any peril or hazard what foever. The Volicians were likewife diverfly occupied & troubled. For on the one fide they bare off the Col, and legions: on the other fide they affronted Tempanius fore, & the Horsemen: who seeing that after many assayes and offers't hey could not break forth to their fellows, gat up unto a certain little Hill, and call them- A felves into a ring and flood to their defence, not without doing fome milchief to their enemies! neither gave they over fighting until night. The Conful also maintained the battel fo long as he could fee, and kept the enemy play. So the night parted them afunder, and uncertain it was who had theupper hand. And for that the event was inknown, who fped the better, to great a terrour came upon both parts in their camps, that leaving the wounded and a great part of their cariages behind, both armies as taking themselves losers, recovered the mountains that were next unto them. Howbeit the Hill or bank aforefaid, continued fill befet round about, until midnight. But when word was brought thither to the Asiailants, how that their camp was abandoned: they thinking their fellows vanquified, were also for their part affrighted, and made shift and fled in x the dark as well as they could. Tempanius, fearing an ambushment, kept his men there together until day light. Then went he down with a few to discover the coasts: and finding by enquiry made of the wounded enemies, that the tents of the Volicians were left and for taken: he was full glad thereat, and called down his fouldiers from the mount, and entreth into the Roman camp. Where feeing all yold and forlorn, and finding the fame defolation which was amongst the enemies: before that the Volscians upon knowledge of their errour should return again, he took with him those hurt souldiers that he could; and not knowing to what quarters the Conful was gone, marcheth forward the next way to the City of Rome. And thither already the bruit of this unlucky fight, and of abandoning the tents, was arrived. But above all the reft, those Horsemen were bewailed, and great moan and lamentation was made for them as well in private as in pub- K like. The Cof. Fabius, feeing the City also terrified with this news, kept ward before the gates: by which time, they might discover the Horsemen aforesaid afar off: but not without some sear of their parts, doubting who they were. But being foon known, they caused so great contentment after former fear, that in most joyful manner, the noise went through the City, how the Horsemen were returned fafe with victory, And out of those mourning and forro will houses, which a while afore had bid adieu to their friends and kinsfolk; and bewailed their death, they ran into the Afreets and high waves by heaps. The fearful dames also and wives, forgetting, for joy, all decent and womanly modesty, went out to meet the army, fell every one with open armes upon their own husbands and fons, took them about the neck, clipped and kiffed them, and with all their hand and heart received them; yea, and the exceeding joy were almost past themselves.

The Tribuns of the Commons, who had challenged and accused M. Posthumius and T. Quin-

tim, for that by their default, there was an unlucky fight before Vej: feemed to have good occa-fion and opportunity offered now, by bringing the Conful Sempronius into fresh and new hatred and displace, for to reme the concerved displeasance and malice of the people against them, Having affembled therefore the people together, with open mouth they declared, that the Commonwealth was betrayed first, at Veil by the leaders, and afterwards, because they went clear away withal, and unpunished, therefore the army in Volsci was likewise lost by the Consul: and that a troup of most valiant knights were thus call away and given to be murdered, and the camp shame-Tempanius by fully left and forfaken. Then C. Julius, one of the Tribins, commanded Tempanius the Horseman to be called, and before them all said, "I would know of thee O Sextus Tempanius, whether thou M Tribun of the "think that C. Sempronius the Conful, either began battelingood time, or strengthned his bat-

Afterwards, when thou and thy men of arms were "fhut out from our battel, whether either the Conful himself came to rescue, or sent any succor "unto thee? "and the army? And to conclude, whether we have loft or won the field? To these demands, Tempanius made (as they fay) no fine Oration, but a grave pithy speech like a fouldier : not full of felf-praises, nor shewing any gladness for the fault of another, and answered in this wise: How great skill (quoth he) of mattial feats, and what infliciency is in C. Sempronius, it is not for me a fouldier to judge, nor yet to make any estimate of my General: but it was for the people of Rome to determine thereof, at what time as by their suffrages and voyces, in a solemn Election, they chose him Consul. "And therefore yeare not to enquire of me, and to be informed, either of the "policies of a General Captain, or vertues and duties of a Conful: deep points to be examined, O "weighed, and discoursed by great wits, reaching heads, and high minds. But for that which I "with mine eye faw, I am able to make report and teffify; namely, That before himfelf was ex-"cluded out of the battel, I beheld the Conful fighting manfully in the vanguard, encouraging his men earneftly, and even among the Roman Standards, and Pikes of the enemies, bufily "employed. After which I was carried from the fight of my fellows, how beit by the ftir, noise and "shouting, I well perceived, that the conflict continued until night. Neither was it possible (as "I thought) for them to break through unto the Hill which I kept, by reason of the multitude

The fourth Book of T. Livius.

Whiles these things thus passed, the Consul by that time, had marched by the way of Lavicum B as far as to the Temple of Quies: thither were wains, draught-beafts and imprer Horses sent * The godden from the City, to receive and ease the army, toiled out with fight, and tired by journying all of reft and Renight, Within a while after, the Cof, entred into the City: who endeavoured not more, to put pole. the fault from himself, than to extol Tempanius, and give him his due deserved praises. Now whiles the City was sad and heavy for this hard hap, and angry also with the Captains: behold, M. Posthumius, who before had been accused, was now presented unto the people, for to wreak their choler and malice upon. He had been a Tribun Military in place of a Cof. at Veij, and now was condemned, & a fine let on his head often thouland Afles of brais. But as for Titus Quintius, 311th, 5 fb. fler, his fellow in government, because that among the Volk ians behad served fortunately as Conful, under the conduct of Posthumius Tibertus the Dictator: and likewise at Fidene, as Lieutenant of C the other Dictator Mamercus Amylius, and laid the whole fault of that other time from himself, upon his collegue before condemned he was found unguilty and acquit by all the Tribes, It is faid that the fresh remembrance of his father Cincinnatus, late a right worthipful citizen, helped him much: Yea, and Capitolinus Quintius a very aged man, did him no hurt, who humbly befought them that they would not suffer him, having but a while in this world to live, for to be the carrier of to heavy news unto Cincinnatus. The Commons made Tribuns of the commonalty, Sex. Tempanius, A. Sellius, Sex. Antiftius, and Sex. Pompitius in their ablence: whom also the Horsemen had chosen for their Captains or Centurions, in the former exploit, by the advise and counsel of Tempanius. But the Senators, because now for hatred of Sempronius, the name of Consuls milliked and offended them, determined that military Tribuns with Confuls authority, should be created. So D there were chosen L. Manlius Capitolinus, Q. Antonius Merenda, L. Papyrius Mugilanus,

In the very beginning of the year L. Hortenfins the fifth Tribun of the commonalty, accused C. Sempronius the Consul of the former year. And when as his other four fellows in office, in the fight of the people of Rome belought him not to trouble their guiltless Captain, in whom nothing could be blamed or found fault withal, but adverse fortune: Horte ofins could hardly abide, but thought it was but to prove and trye his resolute constancy: and that the party accused, trusted not upon the prayer and intercession of the Tribuns, which only for a shew was pretended, but upon their support and assistance. And therefore turning one while to Sempronius himself, demanded what was become of that hauty courage and stomack, so ordinary in those of Senators calling? and where was that magnanimity which refted and relied upon innocency? fince that he ha-

E ving been a Consul, was fain to shelter and shrowd himself under the shadow and protection of the Tribus? Another while directing his speech to his fellow Tribuns: but you my Masters (quoth he) what will ye do? if I profecute mine action against him still, and convict him in the end; Will ye take from the people their right and overthrow the authority of the Tribuns among the Commons? When they again faid and inferred, that the people of Rome had abiolute power to do what they would, both with Sempronius, and all others: and that they neither would not could abridge the people of their judgment. But if (fay they) our prayers in the behalf of our General, who was to us in flead of a father, may not avail, then will we together with him change our weed for company. Nay, God forbid (quoth Hortenfins) The Commons of Rome shall never fee their Tribuns arrayed in foiled and mournful apparel. And as for C. Sempronius, I have now no F more to say to him, since that he hath carried himself so, whiles he was General, as that he hath gained thus much, as to be so dearly beloved of his souldiers. Neither was the kindness of those four Tribuns more acceptable to the Commons and Nobles, than the good nature of Hortenfius, who at their reasonable request, was so easy to be pacified and intreated. It was no long time that fortune fawned upon the Aquians: who embraced the doubtful victory of the Volicians, and took it as their own. The next year after, when Cn. Fabius Vibulanus, and T. Q cintius Capitelinus, the son of Capitolinus, were Consuls: by the leading of Fabius, unto whom was allotted that Province, nothing was done there worthy of remembrance. For when as the Æquians had made semblance of a battel, and brought their army only in fight, they were in fearful wife foon discomfited, and shamefully fled, ministring no matter of great ho-G nor to the Cos. And therefore was he denied triumph. But yet because the ignominy of the losse which happened by Sempronius was partly allayed it was granted that he might enter Ovant into the City. A General was said to enter Ovant into the City, when ordinarily without his army following him he went on foot, or rode on Horseback only, and the people in their Acclamations Thu within for joy redoubled Ohe or Ohe. Whereas, none usually might triumph, unless H he were Dictator, Cof. or Pretor, and had flain in field 5000 enemies at the leaft, won much spoil and pillage, and augmented the State of the Roman Empire. Like as the war was dispatched with less ado than they leared: so in the City, after a calm and peaceable state, there arose between the Commons and Nobles, a world of discords and troubles more than they expected. Which began upon occasion of doubling the number of Questors. For when the Consuls had propounded, that besides two Questors or Treasurers of the City, there should be other twain ready to attend upon the Confuls, for all fervices and charges belonging to war: and when the Nobles also with all their power had approved it, the Tribuns of the Commons entred into a contention with the Confuls, and required that some of the Questors (for until that time they had been cre- I ated from out of the degree of the Patritij only) might be likewise of the Commons. Against which demand, at the first, both Consuls, and also the Nobles, laboured with might and main. But afterwards having granted thus much, That as the use and practise was in creating of Tribuns with Confuls authority, to in like manner, in the Election of Questors, the people should have their free liberty to chule. And feeing they gained little thereby, and could effect no good, they wholly let fall their former matter, about increasing the number of the Questors. But although it were thus by them given over, the Tribuns took it in hand again, and fet it on foot: yea, and other feditions actions befides very often sprang forth, and among the rest, those also concerning the Law Agraria. Upon which troubles, when as the Senate was of mind, that there should be Confuls rather than Confular Tribuns created; and by reason of the Tribuns stepping between K with their negative voyce, no decree of the Senate could paffe, the government of the Common-*The vacancy weal was devolved from Confuls to an *Interreign, but not without exceeding great debate: for that the Tribuns kept the Patritij from meeting and packing together. Now when as the greater part of the year following was spent, with much strife and contention between the new Tribuns and certain Interregents, whiles one while the Tribuns stayed the Nobles from assembling together about the chunng of an Interregent, and another while croffed the Interregent for granting out any Act of Senate or warrant, for the election of Conjuls: at the last, L. Paprises Mugillanus, being declared Interregent, fometimes rebuked the Nobles, and fometimes blamed the Commons, and faid: "That the Common-wealth neglected and forlorn of all men was "taken into protection of the Gods, and guided by their care and providence: flanding upright the Nobles & "and fafe only, upon the truce observed by the Veientians, and the flow speed or small hast that "the Aguians made to war. First therefore was the High Court held for choosing soveraign Tribuns: and Tribuns there were created in Consular authority, all of the Nobility; namely, L. Quintius Cincinnatus the third time, Sex. Furius Medullinus the second time, M. Manlius, and A. Sempronius Atratinus, When this Tribun last named, was prefident of the Election for Questors, and the son of Antificus a Tribun of the Commons, and a brother befides to another Tribun, one Sex, Pompilius stood for the dignity, among certain other of the Commoners: neither all their own means that they could make, nor all the voyces they could procure, were able to prevail, but that the people preferred perions to the place, according to their gentry and high birth: namely, whole fathers and grand-fathers they had feen Con-N fuls. All the Tribuns of the Commons stormed and chased at this, but especially Pompilius and Antiftius, being fet on fire at the repulse of these their friends. "What should this mean say "they) that none of the Commons, neither in regard of their own merits, nor confidering the "injuries at the Nobles hands nor yet for defire they might pretend to the first hansel of that au-"thority, which now was lawful, and never heretofore: that none of the Commons (I fay) was "created, if not a Military Tribun, yet not fomuch as a Queffor? What, that neither the fathers "prayer in the behalf of his son, nor a brothers suit in favour of a brother, being Tribuns both of "them, invested in that facred authority, and which first was erected for the maintenance of com-"mon freedom, could ought at all prevail? Surely there is some fraud and jugling in the matter: "and A. Sempronius, bath in the Election used more art and cunning than truth and fidelity, O Complaining that by his injurious and indirect dealing, their friends had taken the foil. When as therefore they might not by any violence touch his own person and attach him, being senced with innocency in this Action, and secured by vertue of the office which then he bare : they wreaked their felves and discharged their choler upon C. Sempronius, the count germain of Atrations by the brother: and with the help of M. Canuleins, one of their collegues, arrefted him for the ignominious fervice in the Volician war. Ever and anon, also the same Tribuns made some words and motion in the Senate-house, concerning the division of Lands, and revived the law

A Agraria (which C. Sempronius at all times most sharply and eagerly had withstood, Supposing, as it fell out indeed, that the accused person should either by giving over the cause, be less esteemed of the Nobles: or if he tood to it still until the time of judgment drew near, he should displeate and offend the Commons. But he chose sather to be the object of the displeasure and malice of the people, that were opposed and bent against him, and so to wound his own private estate: than to betray the common and publike cause: and persisted resolute in the same minde still, that there thould no bribing donative be granted, that might win and procure favour unto those three corrupt Tribuns: "For it is not land and living (quoth he) that they shoot at, for the benefit of the The singular

And the C. Attainss. "Senate ought not to effecm either of me, or of any citizen elfe so highly, as to buy the sparing " of one man to dear, even with the harm and dammage of the whole state. The day of judicial tryal came. When as he had pleaded for himself, and seemed nothing daunted at thematter: yet, for all that ever the Nobles could do, who tryed all means, but in vain, to mitigate and delay the heat of the Commons, condemned he was in "fifteen thouland Affes. The same year was Cumes, a City inhabited at that time by the Greeks, taken by the Campanians.

The year following had military Tribuns with Confuls authority, Agrippa Menonius Lanatus, P. Lucretrus Tricipitinus, Sp. Nau ius Servilius. A year, by the happinels and good fortune of the people of Rome, more notable for a danger cleaped, than for any harm received. Certain A confpiracy bond-fervants had conspired to fire the City in divers places far afunder: for this intent, when the of bondflaves people should be bushly occupied, here and there, to save their houses, then by force and armes to D surprite the Cafile and Capitol. But Jupiter turned away and disappointed their wicked designs.

For by the peaching and information of twain, the rest of the malefactors were taken and executed. But those that disclosed and revealed the compiracy, had ten thousand pound in brass mony 31 libs. Sh. st. (which was in those dayes thought to be great riches) weighed them out of the City chamber, and freedom befides, for their reward.

After this, began the Æquians to renue war: and word was brought to Rome by redible perfons, that certain new enemies also, to wit, the Lavicans, joyned together in counsel with the old. These Æquians, were good neighbours: for once a year ordinarily, they nsed to put the City of Rome to the pains of warring with them, and not mils. Embassadors then were sent to Livieos, who brought doubtful answers from thence: whereby it appeared that neither at that instant they E were ready to war, nor yet were like to continue long in peace. The Tukulans were charged, to take good heed, and have an eye that way, that no new firs and troubles should arise at Levicos, There came Embassadors from Tusculum, to L. Sergius Fidenas, M. Papyrius Mugillanus, and C. Servilius, the fon of Q. Servilius Priscus: (by whom, being Dictator, Fiden: Was won) who were Military Tribuns in Confuls authority the year following. These Embassiadors brought news that the Lavicans were out, and in armes, and joyning with the Æquians army, had forraged the country of Tusculum, and encamped themselves in Algidum. Then was war proclaimed against the Lavicans. And when by a decree made by the Senate, that two of the Confular Tribuns should go to war, and one manage the affairs of Rome: there arose a contention on a Sunday, among the faid Tribuns, Every one thought himself the meetest and most sufficient man, to be General of F the war, refusing the charge of the City, as a bale, dishonourable, and thankless office. As the Senators mused and wondred, to see amongst those that were fellows in government so undecent a firife and contention; then Q. Servilius: "Seeing that (quoth he) there is no reverent regard, either of this honorable house, or of the Common-wealth: the father his countenance and "dread Majesty, shall end this debate. My son without any lot casting, shall govern the City as "President. God grant, that they which love war so well, may manage it with more discretion " and concord than they wish it. As for a general muster to be levied out of all the people indifferently, that was not liked of. So ten Tribes were drawn by lot, out of which, the yonger fort were press forth to war under the conduct of the two Tribuns. The strife which began to be kindled among them in the City, through the same defire fill of soveraignty, brake forth and G grew much hotter in the camp. In nothing agreed they, striving whose opinion should stand: each one would have his own way: his own commandments obeyed and none else: one despifed another, and were despised one of the other: until at length, upon the Lieutenants reproof, they grew to this point, and this order was taken: That they should each other day, rule one alone by him elf absolutely. Which news being brought to R.me, it is reported that Q. Servilius, a man for his years and long experience right skilfull, prayed of the immortal Gods, that by the variance and discord of the Tribuns, the Common-wealth inflained not more harm, than they had received at Veios. Ad as if there were no doubt, but that some great loss and overthrow was ready to happen, he was instant upon his son, to levy souldiers, and to provide munition for war. H Neither proved he a false and vain Prophet. For by the leading of L. Sergius, whose day it was to rule, when as the enemy under a colour of fear, withdrew unto the trench, and to trayned them thither upon a foolish hope to win the camp, even under the very camp of the enemies in an uneven ground of diladvantage, they were juddenly charged by the Aquians, discomfitted and chaled down the valley: and many in their fall, which was greater than the flight, were trod under foot and slain, and with much ado that day kept they their own tents. The morrow atter, when as now the enemies had befet a great part of the camp, they shamefully fled away, at the back gate, and for look the camp. The Captains Lieutenants, and the strength remaining of the army, which kept to their enfigns and colours, went to Tulculum. Other that were scattered here and there I about the fields by fundry wayes, made half to Rome, and reported there the overthrow to be greater than indeed it was. Lefs was the trouble and forrow, because men looked for no better iffue and success: and also for that, there was help and succour (which they were to have an eye unto in to feasful a case) provided by the Tribun aforehand. At whose commandment, when as the tumult was by the inferiour Magistrates appealed in the City, espials were sent out in hast: who brought word that the Captains and the army was at Tulculum: and that the enemy had not removed his camp. And then (which encouraged them most of all) by the Senates decree, Q. Servilius Priscus was chosen Dictator, a man whose Providence over the Common-weal, the City as many other times afore, so in the event of that war had experience of: for that he only suspected the contention of the Tribuns afore this unhappy foil. Who having nominated Gene- K ral of the Horsemen, his son (as some say) by whom being military Tribun, himself was declared Dictator (for others there be that write how Servilius Hala was that year General of the Horse) went forth with a fresh army to war, and having joyned unto him those which were at Tusculum, he pitched his tents, two miles from the enemy. But fee the fruit of good fuccefs. The pride and negligence which had been amongst the Roman Captains, went from them to the Aquians. Therefore in the first beginning of the conflict, when the Dictator with his Horsemen whom he fent against them, had disordered and put out of array the formost ranks of the enemies, then commanded he the enfigns of the legionary footmen with all speed to follow hard upon: and one enfign-bearer of his own, who made fome stay, he slew with his own hand. Then were they to earnestly set to give an hot charge, that the Aquians could not abide their force: and being in L fight overthrown, when as they fled all amain to the camp, the affault thereof was both shorter and with less ado, than was the battel. When the camp was taken and spoiled, and that the Dictator had given the pillage unto the fouldiers: and that the Horsemen, which chased the enemies from the camp, had brought word back, that all the Lavicans were overthrown, and a great part of the Æquians were fled to Lavicos: the day following was the army also led thither, and the Town compassed and beset round about, scaled, and sacked. The Dictator having brought home to Rome his victorious army, upon the eight day after he was chosen, gave over his office. And in very good time, before there was any tedition stirred up about the Law Agraria, by the motion of the Tribuns of the Commons, for the division of the Lavicans Lands: the whole body of the Senate appointed that a Colony should be sent to Lavicos. So there were sent from the City M planted at La. a thouland and five hundred to inhabit there, and two acres apiece given them of Land.

A Colony

After the winning of Lavicos, there were created Military Tribuns with Confuls authority, to wit, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, and L. Servilius Structus, with P. Lucretius Tricipitinus (all three the second time) and Sp. Veturius Crassus: and the year following A. Sempronius Airatinus, the third time, and these twain, M. Papyrius Mugillanus, and Sp. Nautius Rutilius the second time: for these two years there was peace abroad, but discord at home about the Laws Agraria. They that troubled the people, were Sp. Mecilius, who now the fourth time, and Metilius, who the third time were made Tribuns of the Commons, both abient. And when they had published their Act, That all Lands conquered from the enemies, should be divided by the poll: by which Ordinance, the possessions of a great part of the Nobility became confiscate, (for fince their City was N scituate and built in a strange ground, there was in a manner no Land lay to it, which had not been purchased by the sword; neither enjoyed the Commons any, but that which either had been fold or affigned to the Commons) this feemed to be a bone cast between the Nobles and the Commons, to fet them together at strife and contention. Neither knew the Military Tribuns any way to take counsel in this case, albeit one while they affembled the Senate, and another while met in private conference with the Nobility. Then Appears Claudius, (the nephew or grandfon of notorious Appius the Decemvir, created for the making of Laws) the puny of all the countel

R horting, and affuring them, that they should every or emprivate gratify not only, but also the whole body of the Senate in general and never gave over, until they had procured fix of them to interpose their negative; and to cross the Law. The morrow after, when as of purpose a matter was propounded afore the Senate, about the sedition which Mecilius and Metthus had raised, by a Largels of dangerous consequence; such speeches were by the principal of the Nobles delivered, that each one for himself confessed, that now they were to seek for counsel; and saw no other help nor remedy but in the authority of the Tribuns: to the protection and fategard of which Magistracy, the Common-weal berook her sells, and sled for succour, as being beset with danger, like some poor private person, and had no other means to save her self: saying, That it would be both for themselves, and also for their authority, an honorable thing, if it might appear, that the Puissance of their Tribunship were not more imployed in molesting the Senate, and making discord among the States than in residing the peevish wilfulnes of their collegues. Whereupon arose a great notife through the whole company of the Senators, whiles out of all parts of the Court there affembied, they called upon the Tribuns for their helping hand. Then fter filence made, they (who for the favour of the Lords of the Senite, were made aforehand to their cause) declared and onfelfed that they were ready to cross that act, by their fellows published, seeing the Senate judged it to be prejudicial to the Common-wealth. These Tribuns for the offer of their good fervice, were by the Senate highly thanked, But the Authors and Patrons of the Act aforefaid, calling together an affembly of the Commons, when they had inveighed against their fellows most sharply, terming them betrayers of the Common-wealth, and slaves to the Nobles: and st-D fing other bitter speeches, gave over their action and suit.

Two grievous wars had continued all the year next following (wherein P. Cornelius Coffut, C. V. lersus Potitus, Quintius Cincinnatus, and M. Fabius Vibulains; were military Tribuns in Coff. authority) but that the Veientian war was deferred by the superstitions fear of their own Princes whose grounds, Tibris (overflowing the banks) had spoiled; and overthrown also the villages and houses that stood thereupon. The Equians likewise by reason of their loss received three years before, made no great hast to aid and assist the Volans, a people of their own nation. For they had made certain rodes into the Lavicans Country, confining upon them, and warred upon the inhabitants, lately there planted. Which trespais by them done they hoped to have been able to maintain, by the banding and affiltance of all the Aquians: but being fortaken of their allies, they E lost both their Town and territory, only by fiege, and one light skirmish, and never sought for it any memorable war. L. Sextius also Tribun of the Commons, assayed to make an Act that there might besent to Vole as well as to Lavicos, Coloners to people it but by the negative of his Affociates, who shewed, that they would not suffer any Statute of the Commonstopals without the affent of the Senate, it came to nothing. In the year following, the Æquians having recovered and won again Vola, and brought a Colong thither, fortified the Town with a fresh power, at what time were Tribuns Military in Confuls authority at Rome, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, L. Valerius Potitus, Q. Fabius Vibulanus the second time, and M. Posthumius Regillensis. The war against the Equians, was committed to this Postbumius, a man of a crooked disposition, as his victory shewed more than the whole course of the F war. For having levied an army in haft, and brought it before Volu, after some small skirmishes, he tamed the Equians, and at length entred the Town, And when he had done with the enemies, he began to quarrel with his own fouldiers: for whereas during the time of the assault, he had given out by Proclamation, That they should have the saccage after the Town was once won: he brake promise with them. For I am induced to believe that this was the cause rather why the army mutined and was discontented, than for that in a Town lately facked before and in a new Colony, there was found less spoil than the Tribun made boast of. But this displeasure and anger once conceived was made the worse after that he returned into the City: for being sent for by his fellows, upon occasion of the Tribunitian seditions, there escaped him an indicreet speech I must needs (ay, yea, and without all fence, wit, and honefty. Which he let fall in an affembly of the G Commons: wherein it happed, that as Secret, a Tribun of the Commons, was preferring the law Agraria, and faying withal, That he would propose an Act, that Coloners should likewise be sent to Vala for that they were worthy to have both the Town and Lands of Vala, who had by sword and spear conquered the same. Posth mins caught the word out of his mouth: And that shall my fouldiers, deerly abide (quoth he unless they be more quiet. Which word being overheard offended not so the Com presently there in placeassembled, as the Lords of the Senate awhile after. Mercover, the Tribun aforefaid an active man, and eloquent withal, having among his advertaties met with a proud humorous spirit, and an insolent and imemperate tongue, which walked fo freely and fo long by his provocation, that he uttered these speeches, which bred not only ill H will and displeasure to himself, but also wounded the cause, and the whole state of the Patritij, This Sextus (Liay) was bufy, and quarrelling with mone of all the Military Tribuns, more than with Polthamius. And even at that time, taking advantage of the fame cruel and inhuman speech of his: Hear ye not, O ye Commons (quoth he) how he threatneth mil hiel unto his fouldiers, as unto bondflaves? "And yet this beaft ye will think more worthy of so great dignity wherein "ye have placed him, than those that indue you with house and lands that send you abroad to in-"habit Colonies; that provide habitation for you against old age, that tendring your wealth, take " part and defend you against so cruel and proud adversaries. Begin now henceforth to marvel why so sew take in hand to maintain your cause: For what may they look for, and hope at I "vour hands? for honors, which ye bellow rather upon your adversaries, than those that are "affectionate defenders of the people of Rome. Ye fighed even now and groaned again, at the " words uttered out of this foul mouth. But what matter makes that? If ye were now to go to "an election, and to give your voyces, ye would no doubt for all that, prefer this man (who "threatneth to milchief you) afore them that are willing and defirous to establish your Lands, your dwelling places, and the whole state of your substance and living. But when that lewd language of Posthumius was reported once to the souldiers, it bred a far greater indignation (be fure) within the camp. How now? (fay they) is he, who hath intercepted our booty, and defrauded us poor fouldiers of our due, not content therewith, but mult menace mischief bendes unto us, as his variets? When as therefore they openly muttered thereat, and the Quettor or K Treaturer P. Sellius thought that the mutiny might be restrained with the same violence by which it was first raised: he sent an Officer to one clamorous souldier, that kept a noise above the rest, Whereupon arose an outcry and a brawl: and he got himself a good rap with a tione for his labour, that he was fain to go out of the preffe. And he that mote him spake aloud bendes, and bad the Oneffor take now that for his pains in a mischief, which the General had threatened his fouldiers. Posthumius in this hurliburly was sent for, and he, when he was come, made all worse and worle with his sharp examinations, tortures, and cruel punishments. At the last, when he could not see to mike an end nor bridle his choler: they ali ran on heaps together, at the lamentable cry of those whom he commanded to be choked in the mire and killed under the hurdle: and he half besides himself, tuil soolishly stept down in more hast than good speed from the Tribunal I feat, to chaftife one that contested with him, and made a great brawling. Now when as the Li-Stors and Centurions every where laid about them to make way, and ill intreated the multitude in the throng they moved their patience to much, that in that furious fit of the fouldiers, the Military Tribun was by his own army floned to death. Which horrible act, after it was notifed at Rome, and the Military Tribuns by the Senates authority, were about to fit in commission for the by his own fol. examination of the death of their collegue, by way of rigour and torture: the Tribuns of the Commonalty opposed themselves, and resisted them. But that contention depended upon another quarrel. For the Senate doubting left that the Commons for fear of those examinations intended would in their anger create Tribuns military from out of their own body and degree; were very careful, and fludied all they could, that Confuls might be chosen again, But when as the Tri- M buns of the Commons would not suffer an act of the Senat to pass, and hindred also the election of the Confuls, the matter came to an Interreign. But in the end the Nobles had the apper hand. For when as O. Fubius Vibutanus the Interregent, held a Court for the faid Election, there were created Confuls A. Cornelius C ffus, and L. Furius Medullinus. In the beginning of these Consuls year, the Senate made a decree, that the Tribuns with all speed possible should propose unto the Commons concerning the inquisition of Posthumius his death and that they should make thief Commissioner and Judge whom they would. The Commons by the confent of the whole people, gave the Confus commission to see it done, and performed accordingly. Who notwithflanding, that with exceeding moderation and lenity, they dispatched and ended the matter, by punishing a few, who (as it was credibly thought) made N themselves away: yet could they not for all that bring about, but the Commonalty took it very hainoully, and in the highest degree, saying, That the Acts and Ordinances, which had been propounded concerning their weal and commodities, those lay a long time afleep in the deck, and nothing done: but an order granted for their bloudshed and death, that was presently put in execution. Of so great force and importance was it. Now this had been the fittell time, that after these mutinous souldiers were chaltised, the division of the Volane territory, should have been offered unto them for to comfort their poor hearts again. By which deed (no doubt) their hot defire and longing after the law Agrana, had been abated, which tended to disposses at length the Nobles of the common grounds, which they injuriously were seized of. But this indignity fluck in their flomacks, and was taken neerer to the heart when they faw the Nobility fo fliffly o bent, not only to keep the common grounds in their hands, which they held by force: but also unwilling to divide among the people to much as the wast and void ground, lately gotten by congueff from the enemies: but that it was like, within a while (as all the reft) to be a booty, and divident to be shared among a few.

The same year were the legions led by Furing the Consul. against the Volscians: who forraged the borders of the Hernicks. But finding not the enemy there, they wan Ferentinum, whither a great number of the Volicians had retired themselves. The booty there was less than they hoped The fourth Book of T. Livius.

A for: by reason that the Volicians, seeing small hope of keeping the Town, trusted up and carried away, both bag and baggage in the night, and quit the Town: which was won the morrow after; being left well near delittute and empty. All the Lands were given freely to the Hernicks. When this year now was passed in good quiet by the modesty and peaceable carriage of the Tribuns, then in place: there succeeded another Tribun of the Commons, L. Icilius, when Q. Fabius Ambrifius and C. Furius Pacilius were Confuls. Whiles this man in the very beginning of his year, was buly in firring new feditions (as if it had been a task imposed upon his name and linage) by proposing of the Agrarian laws: behold, there arose a pestilence, more fearful than hurtinl, which turned A pestilence; away mens minds, from their publick affemblies and accustomed contentions, to tend their

B houses, and to care for the cherishing of their bodies. And (as men verily think) the sickness was less dangerous than the seditions were like to have been. When as the City was now excused, as it were, and well escaped with the fickness only of many, and death of very few: presently after this petilent year, followed (as it is commonly feen) a great dearth of corn, by reason of the neglect of tillage. M. Papyrius Atratinus, and C. Namius Ruslim being Confuls. This famine would Afamine have been more grievous than the plague, had they not provided well for corn, by fending forth their Embassadors to the neighbour nations all about, inhabiting along the Tukan Sea and the Tyber, for to buy grain. Proudly were the Embassadors prohibited all commerce and trassique with the Samnits, who held at that time Capua and Cumes: but contrary-wife bountifully were they relieved by the Tyrants or Potentates of Sicilie. And fuch was the willing endeavour of

C Harraria, that great flore of victuals came downthe Tyber. In what defolation the City was,during this affliction, the Coff, tryed by this: that when they could not furnish an Embassiage, but with one senator, they were compelled to adjoyn two Knights unto them. And letting alide the fickness and dearth, there was no trouble either at home or abroad for those two years. But when these storms were once overblown, and that care past: then began again the old troubles wherewith the City had usually been disquieted: dissention at home, and war abroad. When M. Emplius and C. Valerius Potitus were Confuls, the Equians made preparation for wars, and banded with the Voliciaus. Who albeit they took arms by no publick commission; yet fuch as would of themselves serve for hire or wages sollowed the wars. At the bruit of which enemies (for they were already, come over into the Country of the Latins and Hernicks) whiles Va-D Terins the Conful mustered his menand levied souldiers: M. Menenius a Tribun of the Commons, and a publisher of the Agrarian laws, opposed himself against him. And when as by reason of the protection and affiltance of the Tribun, no man would be compelled to take a fouldiers oath a-gainst his will: suddenly newscame, that the Castle of Carvensus was by the enemies forced. This dishonorthus received, as it was a cause that Menenius was hated among the Noblemen, so it gave to the rest of the Tribuns, who were already framed and prepared to withstand the law Agraria, more just cause to resist their collegue. The matter being thus for a long time protracted by much debating, the Confuls called both God and man to witness, that whatsoever shame or loss, either had been already received, or were like to-be fuffeined by the enemies: the blame should be imputed to Menenius, who hindred the mustering. And Menenius protested again aloud, that if the E unlawful Land peds, would furrender the tenure of the common fields which they unjustly deteined, he would not flay the musters. Then the nine Tribuns, by setting down a decree between

assist C. Valerius the Cos. (all contradiction of their collegue not withstanding) to award any penalty reffreint or chastilement, upon them that refuled to be enrolled for warfare. The Cof, being armed with this decree and warrant, after he had caused some few to be had away by the neck and laid fast, that called upon the Tribun for help, the rest for fear were sworn to serve. Thus the army wasled forth to the Castle of Carvenius. And although the souldiers were as odious to the Conful. as wickedly bent against him, yet at the very first coming, having mansully and lustily dispossessed the garrison, they recovered the fort. The souldiers who were slipt away from the hold, and F gone a plundering, by their negligence gave the Romans a opportunity to enter and to surptile it. And a good booty there was by reason that they had continually gotten prizes, and laid up all there as in a place of fafety. Which being fold in portfale, the Conful commanded the treasurers for to bring the mony into the common Chamber of the City: giving out thele words withal, that the army should then have part of spoil, when they denied not their service in war. Hereupon both Commons and fouldiers were more angry with the Conful. And therefore when as by a decree of the Senate he entred the City Ovant, in a pery triumph, the fouldiers according to their li-Centions manner (in that case permitted) followed after with songs and sonners, answering one another in rude rime and gross meeter by alternative staves. Wherein the Conful was greatly blamed, but Menenius the Tribun, his name was fet out to the height his praifes were blafoned and G extolled aloft, and at every time that he was named, the affectionate favour of the people that stood in the streets appeared, by clapping of hands and great applaule. striving much to exceed the longs chanted by the fouldiers. Which cauled the Nobles to look to it, and troubled them more than the malapert sauciness of the souldiers with their Consuls, which is an ordinary and usual falhion among them. And Mentuius (who doubtless had been one of the Military Tribuns, if he had fued for it.) was excluded from that dignity by an Election of Coniuls. So therewere created Confuls, Co. Cornelius Coffus, and L. Furius Medullinus the fecond time,

Never took he Com, the matter more to the heart, that the Election of Tribuns escaped their hands: which grief of theirs in the Election of Questors, they both shewed and revenged. For H this was the first time that the Questors were made of the commonalty: 10 that in chuling of 4. there was but one place left for C. Fabius Ambustus, a Nobleman: and 3 of the commonaity, & Silius, P. Elius, and P. Pipius, were preferred before young Gentlemen, of most noble houles. I find that the perswaders of the people to use their full liberty in bestowing their voyces, were the three Icil is (descended of that house, which ever was most malitiously bent against the Nobles) who were for that year chosen Tribuns of the commonalty, and possessed the peoples heads with a world of great matters, after which they gaped greedily: but so, as they flatly gave out and said, They would not fir at all, if the people had not courage enough, so much as in the election of Queffors, which only the Senat had left indifferent to the commonalty and Nobility, to effect I that which so long they had defired, and now by law was warranted. Thus the Commons assured themselves hereby of a mighty great victory: and esteemed not the dignity of Questorship to be the end and type of honor, but that thereby they feemed to have made a way and overture for new risen upstarts, to be advanced to Consulships and triumphs. The Nobles contrary-wise stormed, not for that their dignities were made common and imparted to other, but for the utter losse thereof: protesting that if things went io on end, they would neither get, nor bring up children any more; who being put from their Ancestors place, and seeing others in possession of their dignity should be disabled for bearing rule and authority in the state, and be good for nothing but only to be made Priefts for Mars, and Flamines for Jupiter, imployed about nothing else but to sacrifice (forfooth) for the people. Thus on both parts were their minds netled and provoked, K whiles the Commons took heart, and had three champions of great reputation to back them, and maintain their cause: and the Nobles, seeing all would prove like to the Questors Election (if it lay in the peoples choice) addressed themselves to the Election of Consuls, which as yet was not fo free, and indifferent both for Commons and Nobles. Contrary-wife, the Icili perfifted ftill, and urged the point, that in any hand Tribuns Military should and must be created. For now it was more thantime that the Commous had their part in offices of state. But no Action hitherto belonging to the offices and charge of the Confuls had been presented unto them, by the hindering whereof they might wring from them, that which they defired and fought for. But fee, how even then, in wonderful good opportunity, word was brought that the Volscians and Aouians were departed out of their own Confines, and made an expedition into the Latine pale for to rob T. and spoil. To the which war, when as by vertue of an order from the Senat, the Consuls began to muster: the Tribuns laboured tooth and nail to hinder it: giving our that this occurrent fortuned happily on their fides and the Commons. Three there were of them and all most quick, active and conragious men: yea (and for commoners) of good birth, and worshipfully descended. Whereof twain took in hand, by their continual travel to attend and watch the Confuls, to keep them awork, and either of them to hold one occupied: the third, was appointed to entertain the commonalty: and in all affemblies, with their Orations, one whiles to rein them in, another while to give them the head, as occasion required. But all this while, neither Consuls went through with the musters, nor the Tribuns with the election which they defired. But afterwards when fortune began to incline to the Commons fide, Messengers came with news, that whiles the fouldiers that M lay in garrison at the Castle Carveniana, were stept aside to get a booty, the Æquidn's having slain a few warders that kept the hold, entred it: and that all the fouldiers were flain: fome as they ran into the fort again, others as they were scattered in the fields. This thing falling out so cross against the whole State, gave strength yet unto the designments of the Tribuns. For being dealt withal, that now at length they would surcease from hindering the war, nothing would prevail: for that they neither gave place to the publick calamity and necessity, nor yet regarded their own private peril of displeasure: and they obtained in the end that an Act of Senat was granted for to thuse Tribuns Military. Howbeit with this expresse proviso, it was capitulated; That none of them who had been Tribuns that year of the Commons, should be eligible and propounded : no, nor choten again Tribuns of the Commons for the year following. Whereby no doubt, the Senat N noted and pointed at the Icily, whom they charged to feek to be Confuls, for a reward of their seditious Tribunship. Then went the mustering forward, and preparation of war, by consent of all the States. Sundry Authors write diverfly and make doubt, whether both the Confuls went to the Caffle

Carventara or whether one of them stayed behind in the City for to hold the foresaid Election. In this they differee not, but fet down for certain: that when they had affulled the Cattle a long time without effect they were compelled from thence to remove and that Verrago in the Country of the Volicians by the fame army was recovered, and that great forraging there was, and driving of boories, both in the Country of the Equians and also of the Volicians. Now at Rome, as the victory of the commonalty reflect in this, that they had the Election which they defired: fo o in the iffue and fuccesse of the Election, the Nobles had the better. For besides all mens hope and expectation, there were three Tribuns Military chosen with Consuls authority, all of the Nobility, C. Julius Tullus, Cn. Cornelius Coffus C. Servilius Hala. Men fay that the Nobles used a subtile practife and cunning device, which even then the Icilii charged them with: to wit, that by intermingling a many of unworthy and unmeet competitions with others of mark and quality, they had alienated the peoples hearts from the commoners, feeing them to be men of no worth, and loathing the notable basenesse that appeared in their persons.

After this, tidings came, that the Volscians and Equians (were it that the Castle of Carventus which they held and guarded fill, put them into some hope: or their garrison and fort lost at Vorrigo drave them into anger) were up in arms, with all force ready to make war: that the Antiats were the principal and chief in this intended action: that their Embassadors had sollicited the people of both nations, rebuking their cowardize, for keeping within their walls, and fuffering the Romans the year before, to forrage and drive booties in their territories, and the garrifon of Verrugo to be surprized and lost. Moreover, that not only hosts of armed men were sent against them, but Colonies also were planted in their frontiers and marches and that the Romans not content to divide their lands and goods among themselves, had bestowed upon the Hernicks

B the town Ferentinum, which they had won from them. At these speeches they were kindled and fer on fire; and in all places whither they went to follicit, the younger fort and able men in great number were levied. So the youth and manhood of all those nations, gathered together to Aztium, where they encamped themselves, and expected the enemy. Which tidings being brought to Rome, caused more sear then need was. And the Senat presently (which in all searful occurents was ever their last remedy and refuge) gave order that a Dictator should be created. Which thing Julius and Cornelius, two military Tribuns (they fay) took in great displeasure. And hereof ensued much heart-burning and diffention, whiles the LL, of the Senat of one fide complained in vain of their grievances, That the Tribuns Military would not be ordered by the authority of the Senat:

and at the last had recourse to the Tribuns of the Commons for helpsalledging wirhal, that the very C Confuls power upon the like occasion had been by their authority overruled and set down. And the Tribuns of the Commons on the other fide, rejoycing at the discord of the Senators, made anfwer again, and faid, "That for their parts, they were not able to yeeld any fuccour at all, who were of no reckoning themselves, being reputed neither in the roll of Citizens, nor yet so much "as in the number of men. But if so be (lay they) dignities and honors were communicated to "us, then would we provide and take order, that by no pride of any magistrate what soever, the "Senats decree should be made frustrat and disanulled. And in the mean whiles, seeing the No-66 bles were exempt from all reverence of laws, and regard of magistrates, let them of themselves " also exercise the Tribuns authority if they would. This discord falling out so unfitly, when so great war was in hand, occupied and possessed mens heads a long time: whiles Julius and Corneli-D no one after another, thus reasoned and discoursed: That seeing they themselves were Captains good enough for the conduct of such a war, it was not meet, that the honour once bestowed upon them by the people, should be made void and taken from them. Then Servilius Hala, who also was a Tribun Military spake and said: "I have been silent thus long, not for that I was doubt. The Oration "ful in mine opinion, or to feek what to fay, (For what good Citizen (quoth he) would have his of Servillus "advice by himself, and go from the publick Councel?) but because I had rather, that my bre-"thren of their own accord should give place to the Senats authority, than to suffer the Tribuns "power to be called for, against them. And even now also, if the case would permit, I could wil-

"nion. But feeing that the necessities of war, wait not upon human counsel, I will have more re-E " foed and confideration of the Weal-publick, than of the favor of my brethren, Wher. fore, if the 66 Senat perfift still in that mind and resolution of theirs, I will the next night following nominat a "Distator, And if any one withstand me, I will ask no more, than the power and vertue of the Se-"nats Act, By which speech of his, having won deserved praise and thanks of all men, he declared Publius Cornelius Distator, and was himself by him nominated General of the horsemen, A singular example to teach as many as beheld him and his Collegues, That otherwhiles favour and honor foonest fall to them that least defire the same. The war was smal and nothing memorable for in one easie and slight battel were the enemies overthrown and slain at Antium. The army upon this victory wasted the Voscians Country, won by force the Cassle upon the lake Fucinus, and within it took three thousand prisoners: having chased all the rest of the Voscians within their walls, F not able to keep their frontiers. The Dictitor, after he had performed this war in such fort, as only he might not feem to neglect his wonted fortune but keep it still in ure, returned into the City with greater felicity than glory, and refigned up his place.

The Tribuns Military, making no words at all of the chufing of Confuls (for anger, I suppose, that a Dictator had been created) published the election of Tribuns Military. But then the Senators were in greater care and perplexity, seeing their cause betrayed even by rhose of their own company. Wherefore, as in the former year, by foilting in the basest of the Commons for competitors, they had caused even men of good worth to be despised : so, now by procuring the principal of the Nobility, both for honour and for favour, to fland for the dignity, they obtained all the places to themselves: so as no one Commoner could be chosen. So there were created sour, Gall having aforeborn that Magistracy, L. Furius Medullinus, C. Valerius Potitus, Cn. Fabius Vibulanus, and C. Servilius Hala. This man was chosen again to the place, as well in regard of other vertues and worthy parts, as for the late favour which he won by his rare moderation, and fingular carriage of himfelf.

In that year, for as much as the time of truce with the Veienrian Nation was expired, they began by Embaffadors and Heralds of Arms, to challenge of them amends and restitution, Whom as they entred into their territory, the Embassage of the Veientians encountred in the way requesting them not to go forward to Veii, before they had presented themselves to the Senat of Rome.

Who being thither come, obtained of the Senat, that for as much as the Veientians were at civil discord among themselves, they would not claim any amends at their hands. Lo, how far they were from feeking their own vantage by other mens diffreis and calamity. Also at the Volscians hands they sustained damage by loss of their garrison at Verrugo. But (see what a thing it is to flack the time) For whereas the fouldiers belieged there, by the Volfcians and fending for aid in due time, might have been rescued if speed had been made, the army which was sent for fuccour, came too fhort, and after the fray was ended. Only this exploit they did: The enemies, who after their fresh massacre committed upon the garison, were gone abroad stragling for to raife booties, were by them overtaken and put to the tword. The cause of this flackness was imputed to the Senat, rather than the foveraign Tribuns: who because intelligence was I given, that they in the garrison refisted and defended themselves most mansully, little considered, That there is no prowels of man what soever, but by valour again it may be overmatched. Most brave and valiant souldiers they, that neither whiles they lived, nor after death were un-

The year following, when P. and Cornelius both furnamed Coffus, C. Fabius Ambustus and L. Valerius Potitus were Tribuns Military in Consuls authority, began the Veientian war by occasion of a proud and arrogant answer returned by the Senat of the Veientians: Who commanded that the Embassadors which came to claim amends, should take this for their dispatch: That unless they departed presently out of the City and Country, they would serve them as Lars Tolumnins had done others before. The Senators of Rome hardly could digelt that: and therefore decreed, it that the Military Tribuns should propose unto the people as speedily as might be, even the day before to morrow, concerning proclamation of open war, and fending defiance to the Veientians Which as foon as ever it was noised and published, the younger fort and men of service, murmured and muttered in this manner: "That as yet they had not fully ended the war with the Volici-" ans: that even of late two wholegarrifons were loft, and their throats cut, and the forts kept still "with danger and great hazard. There is not (say they) a year passeth over our heads, but one field " or other is fought: and as if we had not work and trouble enough already, there was now in-"tended new war with a most mighty nation confining upon us, and which was like enough to " raile against us all Hetruria. And as they were forward enough of themselves to conceive thus. "and utter these speeches, so the Tribuns of the Commons were not behind to buzze more mat-"ters into their heads, and fet all on a light fire: Who gave out still, That when all was done, the "greatest warring was between the Nobles and Commons: and that the Commons on purpose "were to be toiled out with travel or warfare, and exposed to the enemies for to be murdered: er and that they were to be kept far off from the City, and as it were confined and fent out of the " way : left by being quiet at home, and minding their freedom and Colonies, they should con-"fult and devise, both how to dispose of the common grounds, and to give their voices freely. "And ever as they could meet with any old beaten fouldiers, they would hold them with talk. " take them by their hands, reckon up how many years they had done service in war, fall to tel-" ling of their gashes and scars, asking them what whole place they had left in their bodies to " receive new wounds, and what blood was behind to spend and shed, in the quarrel of the M "Common-wealth? When as by iterating these and such like speeches, both in their private talk and conference, and also other whiles in their publick assemblies, they had turned clean away the hearts of the Commonalty from taking war in hand: the foresaid Act propounded, was put off until a farther day, and lay ftill for the time. Which no doubt, had been nipt in the head, and never would have passed farther, in case it had been referred and subject to the hard opinion and conceit of men, as then they flood affected. In the mean whiles agreed it was, that the military Tribuns should conduct an army into the Volscians country. Cn. Cornelius alone was left at Rome. The three Tribuns, after that they perceived the Volicians in no place encamped, and nothing minded to try a battel, parted themselves three ways to wasteand forrage the frontires. Valerius he marched to Antium, Cornelius to Ecetre. And every way as they went, they spoiled all before N them, both house and field, and all to amuse & keep the Volscians occupied that way. But Fabrus without any forraging at all, came directly to affault Anxur, which was the service most defired. Now Anxar was that, which at this day is called Tarracine, a City feated upon marishes. And on that fide Fabrus made shew of affault. But there were four cohorts under the leading of C. Servilie us Hala fent out to fetch a compais: who having gained the hill that over-looketh and commandeth the town, from that higher ground, with a mighty shout and outcry assailed the wall, where it was disfurnished of guard to defend it At which sudden alarm, they were amazed who manned the wall of the base town against Fabius: and suffered them to set ladders to, and to scale. By which means every place was full of enemies. And upon the walls for a good while there was nothing but killing, as well those that fled, as those that resisted armed and unarmed, one with ano- o ther. So that, a beit they were too weak, yet forced were they to fight: because in yeelding they faw no way but one. But upon proclamation once made, that none but armed men should be killed, all the multitude befides willingly were difarmed. Of which number there were upon 2500. takenalive, From the saccage Fabius kept the souldiers, until his Colleagues were come: saying, that Anxur was taken as well by those armies, which had driven away the rest of the Volicians from the defence of that place, as by themselvs. Who being come, the three armies jointly ranfacked it, & had the pillage for their labor of that rich town, that had gathered wealth a long time.

A Which courtefie and bountifulness of the commanders, was the first thing that reconciled Commons and Nobles together. Over and besides this muniscence of the Rulers, the Nobles also began in a most happy hour to be liberal unto the multitude. For before that either the Commons or Tribuns made the motion, the Senar decreed, that fouldiers might have their pay out of the City chamber; whereas before that time, every man in that tervice had born his own charges. Never was there any thing, by report, fo joylully accepted of the Commons: who ran by heaps together to the Councel house: took the Senators by the hands as they came forth, and faid, They were now truly called Patres, i. Fathers, confessing that now the day was come that in the "quarrel of so bounteous a City, there was no man would so long as his breath latted, spare ei-Be ther limb or life, Seeing that this commodity they should have to help them, namely, that du"ring the time that their bodies were imployed, and bufily occupied in the defence of Common-" weal, their private effate-should stand at one yer, and not decay. And forasmuch as it came of "themselves, and never moved by any of the Tribuns of the Commons, nor called for and craec ved importunatly, by their importune speeches; that was it, that multiplied their joy; and made "the boon it selfmuch more acceptable. But the Tribuns of the Commons (who only had " not their part in this common joy and concord of all States) came in with their opinion, and "faid, that it would not prove so joyous and happy to the Nobles all in general, as they supposed: "that this course and order taken, was at the first fight better then it would be found in the pra-" chile and execution, For how could that money possibly be made and raised, but by levying a tri-

C " bute or payment of the people? they were therefore liberal; but of other mens puries. But " admir or fay that the relt would bear it, yet those neither could nor would endure it, who " were past war-fervice, and lived upon their pensions and annual salary: who would grudge and "regine, that others hereafter should serve in war for more gain then they had in their time "dore; who having been charged with the pay of their own fervice, should now again be put " to contribute to the wages of others, With these words they moved part of the Commonalty, Last of all, when there was a levy exacted, the Tribuns also proclamed, That they would bear as many out, as would not contribute to the fouldiers pay. The Nobles continued still to maintain that which they had so well begun, and were the first that opened their purie, and for that as ver they had no alver coin, some of them carried gross pieces of brass in Wains to the creature

D house, and made a goodly shew of Contribution. When as the Nobles had most faithfully paid according to the rate of their wealth : the chief of the Commons also, friends of the Nobility, as it was afore agreed, began to lay their penny to theirs: whom when the common fort law both to be commended of the Nobles, and to be admired and reverenced of the fouldiers as good Citizens: they all upon a sudden, resusing the Tribuns assistance, beganto strive who should pay first. And the decree or act being once passed, of proclaming war against the Veientians, the new Tribuns Military led an army to Veios, confifting much upon voluntary fouldiers. Now the Tribuns were T. Quimius Capitolinus, P. Quintius Cincinnatus, C. Julius Tullus the lecond time, A. Manlius, L. Furius Medullinus the third time, and M. Emylius Mamercus, And these were the first that besieged Veii.

was in the country of the Volicians.

About the beginning of which fiege, when the Tuscans held a Councel in a solemn affembly at the Temple of Votumna, they could hardly agree upon this point, Whether the Veientians should be defended by general war of the whole Nation, or no. The year following was the fiege not so hot, by reason that some of the Tribuns, and part of the forces, were called away to the Volscian war, The Tribuns Military in Coss, authority, that year were, C. Valerius Politus the third time, M. Sergius Fidenas, P. Cornelius Maluginus, Cn. Cornelius Coffes, C. Fabius Ambustus, Sp. Namins Rusilius the second time. With the Volscians there was a pight field fought between Ferentinum and Ecetra; wherein the Romans had the day, Then the Tribuns began to lay fiege to Artena a Town of the Volscians: where, by reason of a fallying forth by them attempted, the enemies were driven back into the town, and the Romans took occasion and vantage thereby, F to break in with them pell mell, and so they won all, save only the Castle. Into this for naturally fenced, a good company of armed men betook themselves: but beneath the Castle, many a man was either flain or taken prisoner. Afterwards was the sortress besieged also Neither could it by affault beforced, for that there was a guard infficient to man it, confidering the bigness of the place: nor gave the affailants any hope of yeelding, for before the town was loft, they had conveyed all their publick provision of corn into the Castle, So that the Romans had for very wearisomness departed from thence, but that a bondslave betrayed it unto them; who let incertaine, fouldiers at a fleep high place, and those were they that won the fortiefs: for when the warders were by them flain, the rest of the multitude with indden fright were soon overcome, and veelded. Thus, when both the Castle and town of Artenawas facked and spoiled the legions were G brought back from the Volicians, and all the Romans power imployed against Veit, To the traitor aforefaid, there was given befides liberty, the pillage of two housholds for a reward. And he was named ever after Servilius Romanus. There be that think extens was a town of the Veientians, and not of the Volicians: the occasion of which error is. for that there was a town of that name between Cere and Veios. But that town the Roman Kings destroyed: and it belonged to the

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the fifth Book. T the siege of Veil, the Souldiers kad holds made them for to winter in. Which being a new kind of A T the fiege of Velly the joulaters had now made such jor vo winter me reported no reliffrom fervice, firsted an heat in the Tribuns of the Commons, who complained that they had no reliffrom warfare, so much as in the winter season. Then the Gentlemen of Rome began first to serve upon their I own horses. When the Albaniake overflowed, a certain Prophet or Wizzardwas taken captive from the enemies, who bould interpret that strange wonder. Furius Camillus, after ten years siege, wan Veil : to Apollo at Delphi, The same Camillus being Tribun military, whiles he laid sege unto the Fallici, sent back again to the parents his cuemies sons that were betrayed unto him: Whereupon the Fallici, sent back again to the parents shis enemies sons that were betrayed unto him: Whereupon the Fallici, yeelded themselves; and so by his righteous and just dealing, obtained victory over them. When one of the Censors C. Julius was deceased, M. Cornelius was substituted in his place which was never done again afterwards, because inthat five years space, Rome was taken by the Gauls. Furius Camillus, being indited by L. Apuleius a Tribun of the Commons, departed into exile. When as the Senones a people of the Gauls, befieged Clusium, and the Embassadors sent from the Senat to conclude a peace between them K and the Clufines, fought themselves in person against the Gaules in the Clusines army. The Sevenes hereuvon made quarrel, and with a cruel army came against the City of Rome: and after they had defeated the Romans at the river Allia, they were Masters of the City, all but the Capitol, into which the able and serviceable young men of the City betook themselves. The elders with their ornaments of state meterming to the effices that eachone hadborn, they lew fitting in the porches and entries of their honfes. And when they were now gosten up to the top of the Capitol, by the back fide of the hill, they were difcovened by the gagling of Geese, and were turned down, principally by the valour of M. Manlius. Afterwards when through famine the Romans were forced to covenant and grant for to give them the fam of 1000. pound weight of gold, and for that to buy their redemption from the fiege: Furius Camillus, who was created Dictator in his absence, came with an army, whiles the gold was in weighing : and drove L the Gauls out of the City, after they had been possessed of it six months, and slew them. A Chappelwas built to LOCULIUS: in that place where before the taking of the City, there was a voice heard, that the Gauls were coming. Whereas it was purposed and propounded to remove to Veii, because the City of Rome was burnt and raced: that comfe by the advice and ambority of Camillus was crossed and dispatched. The people was moved thereto the rather, by occasion of the omen of a word spoken by a Centurion who being come with his band of souldiers into the Forum, was heard to say thus, Stand Souldiers, here will be our best abiding place.

The fifth Book of T. Livius.

Hen peace elsewhere was obtained, the Romans and Veians were at war, with fuch mutual malice and hatred; that it feemed, whether part were vanquished, should come to final destruction. The assemblies for the election of the Rulers of both Nations, far differed one from the other. The Romans augmented the number of Tribuns Military in Confuls authority: for eight of them (to as never afore) were created: M. Amyleus Mamercus the second time, L. Valerius Potitus the third time, Appeus Claudius Craffus, M. Quintilius Varus, M. Julius Tullus, M. Posthumius, M. Furius Camillus, and M. Posthumius Albus. The Veientians contrariwise, being weary of suing for dignities every year (a caule sometimes of civil discord) made themselves a King. Which offended the people of Hetraria: who as they abhorred all regal government, so they hated the person of the King N himself. He had aforetime oppressed that nation, in regard of his greatness and pride withall: in that he had violently put down their folemn playes, the intermission whereof was held unlawful and deteftable. For upon a time, in an anger that he received a repulse, and by the suffra-ges of the twelve Nations, another was preferred before him to be high Priest, in the very midst of their solemn Games and sports, he took from them the very Players and Actors, whereof a great fort were his own fervants. That people therefore given to superfittion above all other, and so much the rather for that they excelled in the skill of religious observing the same, decreed to deny the Veientians their aid, so long as they were governed under a King. This decree was suppressed and not spoken of at Veis for sear of the King, who would accompted him that should report such rumor, for a sower of sedition, rather then an author of news. The Romans, albeit O they heard that all was quiet from Herruria, yet because they were advertised that in all the Diets and Councels of that Nation, the question was on foot and much debated, made their fortisications at Veii, fo as they stood two wayes: some looked towards the City against all fallies and eruptions of the townsmen : others fronted Hetruria, to stop all succours that haply might come from thence. But the Roman Captains having greater hope in long fiege, then in quick affault, began to build wintring harbours (a strange thing to Roman Souldiers.) Their intent was all winter time to keep continual war. Which after it was told at Rome to the Tribuns of the

A Commons (who now a long time could find no matter and occasion of troubles and alteration) they leapt forth into the assembly of the people, sounding and solliciting the minds of the Commons, and often faying, "That this was the only matter, why a fet pay was appointed "for the fouldiers : and that they were not ignorant; I hat the gits of enemies would prove to be " beimeared with poison: That the freedom of the Commons was bought and fold: That their " young men were sent away far off, and as it were banished from the City and Common-wealth, " io that now they had not so much spare time as winter, nor any season else of the year for to viif it home and see unto their estate. What think ye (say they) is the cause of continuing this warfare? No other verily should they find it but this, left by reason of the stequent number of B " those young men, in whom the whole strength of the Commonalty consisted, there might be "fomething dealt in, and effected, concerning their commodities. Over and befides they com-" plained how they were much more hardly used, then the Veientians. For as for them, they spent "the winter within their own houses, defending their City, fortified both with goodly walls, and "alfo by natural fituation of the place; but the Roman fouldiers abode by it fill in labour and "travel, shrouded under booths of poor hides, overwhelmed with snows and frosts, not lay-"ing away their harness and weapons so much as in winter the ordinary time of tell from all wars "both by sea and land. This manner of hard bondage, neither the Kings, nor those proud and "imperious Consuls (before the Tribuns authority was ordained to take them down) nor yet the "Lordly ruling Dictator, nor the infolent and unsupportable Decemvirs, ever enjoined; thus to C "dwell in continual fouldiery, as these Tribuns Military do: who exercise upon the Com-"mons of Rome, an abiolute and kingly authority. What would they do another day, when they were Confuls or Dictators indeed, who now but representing only the Confuls govern-"men (as Vice-Confuls) are so cruel and unreasonable? But we are well enough served, and just-" ly have deserved no less. For that there was not so much as one place for a Commoner amongst " eight Tribuns. Afore time, the Nobles were wont with much labour and toil, to fill but three "rooms: and now they go eight in a rank together, to obtain all charges and dignities of " State and Government: and in that throng, a Commoner cannot have a place amongst them, "to put his Colleagues in mind (if he did nothing else) that they that go to warfare were free-"men yet, and Citizens with them, and not bondflaves. "As for this purpose intended, and plot devised by my Colleagues, whereby they would not have " the army withdrawn away from the fiege of Veii, before the service were brought to an end:

"how it would not be only profitable, but also necessary, I will hereaster argue and prove. Now H. of for this time, I lift rather to treat and speak of the present condition and state of those, that are "employed there in warfare, Which Oration of mine, if it were pronounced, not before you only, "but also in the camp, and there canvassed and scanned of, by the very army it self, I suppose, would "feem equal, and be received for good and reasonable. Wherein, if nothing else should come in-"to my head to speak, I would content my self, and rest satisfied with the only speeches given out by the very adversaries. They said of late, That pay was not to be allowed to the souldiers, " for that never before it had been allowed. How then can they now be offended, and to malecontent, if they who have some new commodity coming to them, be enjoined also new labour proportionably? For never lightly is there travel any where without gain, nor gain common- I "ly without travel and employment. Pains and pleasure, things of themselves in nature most un-"like, yet by a natural kind of fociety (I know not how) are linked together. The fouldier (afore-"time) thought much to bestow his labour & service upon the Common-weal, at his own pro-"per charges: yet was he glad with all his heart, that one part of the year, he might look to home, "husband his land, and get maintainance to find himself and his, both at home in City and abroad "in war, Now, taketh he contentment, and is well pleafed, that the Common-weal is gainful to "him : and with joyful heart receiveth his wages. Let him likewise be content, with parience to " to forbear his house and samily (since he is at no great charge) somewhat longer than ordina-"ry, Might nor the Common-wealth, if the would call him to a reckoning, justly fay : Yearly "pay thou hast, perform therefore thy yearly fervice? Dost thou think it reason, to receive full K "wages for the whole year? and to be employed but fix months for it? Much against my Sto-"mach, O Quirites, enforce I this point, and dwell fill in this one part of my Oration: for "in this wife ought they to reason that have mercenary and hired souldiers: but we will use "them as fellow Citizens, and think it meet likewise that they entreat us kindly, and speak unto "us as to their native Country, Either it behoved us, not to have begun the war at all; or elfe "to proceed forward, now it is begun: yea, and for the honour of the people of Rome, to finish "it with all speed possible. And finished it will be, if we press upon our enemies thus besieged: "if we depart not afore we have accomplished our hope, by the winning of Veii. And surely, if "there were no other cause but this, even the very shame and indignity of the thing, might force "us to continue fiege unto the end. In old time, the whole power, of Greece laid fiege full ten years L "to one City, and that for one only woman: How far (good god) from their own home? how "many lands and seas between? Are we then loth and weary being within 30, miles of our dwel-"ling place, and almost in the fight of our own City, to endure the toil of one years fiege? Be-" cause (forsooth) we have but small cause given us to war: and not griefs enough that might " justly provoke us to abide and see the end. Seven times already they have rebelled: In peace "never were they true. Our Country have they spoiled and wasted a thousand times. The Fide-" nats they have caused to revolt from us. Our inhabitants there by us placed, they have slain: and "against all law of nations they were the principal instruments of that unworthy and unhuman "murder of our Embaffadors, Ail Herraria would they have raifed up against us, and at this day " about it they go, And when our Embassadors came to demand amends, they had like to have M " run upon them and killed them. And ought we then with these kind of men to stand at a bay "and to war coldly and by leafure? But if so just an hatred as this move us not: do these things "(I pray you) nere awhit move you neither? Their City is environed and beleaguered with deep "trenches: blocked with mighty sconces, whereby the enemy is pent up and pinned within his cown walls. His fields he cannot till, and what so ever was afore tilled, hath been destroyed by " war, If we dislodge and withdraw our army back, who doubteth, but that they (not for defire " only of revenge but upon necessity also and constraint to prey of other mens goods, having lost " their own) wil invade and over run our country? So that by this means we defer not the war, " but bring it within our own borders and confines. But now as touching that which properly "indeed concerneth fouldiers (of whom our good Tribuns of the Commons would now in all N " the haste seem to have so great regard, from whom erewhile they would have wrested their wa-"ges:) but what is that (I fay?) A trench they have cast, a rampart and platform they have raised, " (matters of exceeding travel and labour) fo far about: sconces at the first a few, but after as "their army encreased, they have erected very thick in every place. Forts they have built, not "only to command the town, but also looking toward Hetraria, to impeach any relief, if any aid " should from thence come. What should I speak of the rolling frames and towers, the man-"tilets and other Fabricks? What should I speak of the Tarraces, Tortoises, Rams, and all other " engins of affault and battery? Think ye it meet, that after fo great toil and pains taken, now "that the works at length are brought to an end, these things should be lest and abandoned, that "against summer we should be new to begin again, and sweat afresh about the same? How O "much less travail rather is it to keep these munitions already made? to be instant, and con-"frant to endure, and abide? yea, and to rid our hands of all the care at once? For furely we may "foon dispatch the service, if it be plyed throughly and followed on fill without flay; and if we "ourselves by these intermissions and respits between, make not a long piece of work of it, and "draw our hope at length. Thus much of the labour and loss of time. What else? Considering "these so many Parliaments, these Diets and Councels continually in Tuscany, about sending er aid to Veii, can we forget the danger that we incur by deferring the War? Indeed (as things

A "now presently stand) I confess the Tuscans with the Veientians are angry, they have them and "deny to fend: and for any thing by them done, we might win Veii out of hand. But who dare "warrant, that if the war be delayed, they will hereafter be of the same mind? Seeing that if the « Veientians have any rest and breathing time given them, they are like to send oftner their Em-" baffages, and those more honourable than heretofore. Also the King who newly is set up and "created at Vein(the only thing that now offendeth the Tulcans) in process of time, may be chair " ged for another governor, either by agreement of the State (thereby to reconcile the Hearts of "the Tukans) or of his own accord: who will not peradventure that his princely regiment should " behuttful to the lafety of his subjects. See how many things; how many inconveniences fol-B" low and enfue upon that course and manner of proceeding. The loss of the fabrick and fortifi-" cations, with 10 great labour already prepared and atchieved; the imminent and prelent walling " our own borders: the Tukans war inflead of the Veientians, These your devices, O ye Tribuns, are much what like to his, that offering a fick mantome kind of meat or drink, for the "very present to gratifie him withal, to please his palat and to content his taste, maketh his dis-"ease long, and peradventure incurable: who might have been recovered out of hand, in case at " once, he would have resolutly endured the right cure of a skilful Physician. And furely, if it "were not material to the managing of this war in hand, yet would it import much to marrial "discipline, that our fouldiers should be acquainted, not only with the sweet fruit of a victory "atchieved, bu, also if occasion required longer time, to abide this tediousness: and to wait for C " the end of their hope, be it never to long; and if war be not finished in summer, to stay for win-"ter: and not as summer birds by and by in the fall of the leaf, to look about and seek for housing, "harbour and covert. Confider, I beleech you, and fee. The love and pleafure of hunting carri-"eth men into mountains, woods and forrests; through frost and snow, after their game: shall " not we then the like sufferance in the needful exploits of war, which passimes sports, and de-"lights, are wont to draw and tetch out of us? Think we the bodies of our fouldiers so effeminate, "their hearts so tender and delicate, that they cannot for one winter abide in a camp, and forbear " their home, but must needs war as men at sea, watching times and seasons, and observing the " quarters of the year? Cannot they endure both parching heat and chilling cold? They would " blush and be abathed verily, if a man should therewith charge them: and they would stand tisse D " in this, and avouch. That they had both in body and mind manlike infference and patience; and "that they were fouldiers as well for winter as fummer and that they fet not the Tribuns awork "for any patronage of cowardile and shelter of idleness: but remembred well enough, that their "forefathers were not under shadefor fear of sun-burning, nor had their honses over their fie ads " for taking cold, when they first created and ordained that magistracy of Tribuns. This rather is " beseeming the valour of your souldiers, this fitteth well the name of Romans, not to have their "eye upon Veii only, and this warnow in hand, butto feek for fame and glory both by other " exploits, and also with other nations in time to come. And think ye that there would ensue " hereupon a small crack of credit, and hazzard of reputation? Would ye have the neighbor nati-"ons confining upon us, conceive thus of the people of Rome, That if a City could receive their E « first brunt, and abide their assault for a very small while, it need not after to fear any more; Or "rather should not this dread and terror of our name spread all abroad, both far and neer, That " no wearisomness of long siege and assault, no violence of bitter winter, is able to raise the Ro-"man army from any town once by them invested? as knowing no other end of war but victo-" ry? and whole marker of service is not by way of violent force more then of obstinate continu-"ance, which (as in all other military occasions) so in besieging of Cities is most needful: the e greatest number whereof, being enther by strong bulwarks and other fortifications, or by natural "fituation impregnable, yet by famine, by hunger and thirst, process and tract of time only doth. "force and overthrow. As it will (I doubt not) Veii at length: unless the Tribuns of the com-"monalty succour our enemies: unless that the Veientians find that relief and aid at Rome, which F athey feek in vain throughout all Hetraria. For can there ought happen to the Veientians so " withed for, as that first the City of Rome should be full of variance, and then the Camp. (as "it were by a contagion from thence) as full of mutinies? But contrariwife I affure you, amongst "the enemies, so good order there is and government, that neither the tediousness of long siege, " nor yet the loathing of Kingly rule, hath caused any stir or commotion among them. No nor the "denial of help from the Tuscans hath one whit troubled and diftempered their minds: but "die he shall forthwith, that is the author of sedition, Neither shall any man there be suffered to "fpeak those words, which are spoken here amongst you without any punishment or controlling... "He deserveth the bastanado, to be dry beaten and wel cudgelled that for saketh his Colours, or "departeth from his guard and quarter. But here, in open affemblies, they that perswade and G " counsel not one or two fouldiers, but whole armies to leave their Standards and Enfigns, and "abandon the very camp, have audience with applause. Insomuch, that whatsoever a Tribune of the Commons speaketh although it were to betray the City, and undo the whole State, yeare "used to hearken and give good ear to him: and being ravished and carried away with the sweet-" ness of that authority, ye suffer under it to lurk any mischief whatsoever. There remaineth now "no more but this, that the words they give out here with open mouth, the same they might "iterate in the camp among the fouldiers, to corrupt the army, and not suffer them to obey their "Captains. For to such licentious liberty they are grown at Rome, that they sear and reverence

" neither Councel nor Magistrate, neither Laws nor ancient Customs, neither Decree of Senators, H

Now was Appius with his Orations good enough for the Tribuns, and able to meet them at every turn: Butfee; (a thing that no man would have thought) a lofs and foil received before Veil made App us to have the better hand of the caple, wrought a greater unity among the States, and kindled an ardent defire to affail Veit more hotly, and to befrege it with more relolution. For when they had raifed up a mount neer unto the City, and approached in a manner to the walls thereof, with their colling towers and roofed mantlers, whiles (Ifay) they were not fo vigilant in the night feason to tend and watch these Fabricks, as they were busie and earnest in the day time to rear and plant them; behold, all of a fudden the enemies opened a gate, and armed in great I numbers, especially with burning firebrands, set all on a light fire: and in the space of one hour consumed both the mount and the mantlets, which had cost so long time in making. And many a man besides that came to help (but in vain) by sword and fire lost his life. Which being reported at Rome, made all men heavy and fad, and caused the Senators to take care and fear, how upon this accident, they might possibly prevent and stay, either commotion in City, or mutiny in camp: doubting lest that the Tribuns would have insulted over the Common-weal, as if they had gotten a great conquest. At what time, they that were by calling Gentlemen and so affested, and had no horses of service assigned them from the City, after some consultation together among themselves fuddenly came into the Senat: and having liberty granted of speech, promised to serve in the wars with horses of their own. After that the Senat had right honourably thanked and given them K most gracious words, the newsthereof was no sooner bruited through the market place and whole City, but behold, all on a fudden the Commons came running unto the Councel house. faying, that as they were then to serve as footmen, so they offered their service to the Commonweal extraordinarily without mustering, whether they should be led, either to Veii, or to any other place what soever. And if they were conducted to Veis, they would not return again (they (ay) from thence, before they had won that City from their enemies. At which words, the Sena tors so exceedingly joyed above measure, that hardly they could temper themselves. For they took not order, as they did by the Gentlemen and horsemen afore, that they should be praifed by the mouth of the Magistrates thereto appointed, nor called them into the Councel house, there to give them an answer, neither could they keep themselves within the Councel house I door, But every one of them in his own behalf, so well as he could signified from aloft, both by word of mouth, and gesture of hand, unto the multitude standing in the Comitium, a general joy conceived: faying, That the City of Rome in that concord and unity would be happy, invincible, and perpetual: commending the horsemen, praising the sootmen, extolling and magnifying that very day, and confessing that now they had surpassed the courtesse and bounty of the Senat. So that Nobles and Commons both, for joy wept again who could weep most, until the Senators were recalled into the Court: where a decree wasmade, That the Tribuns Military should afsemble the people, and give thanks both to horsemen and footmen, and promise in the name of the Senat, that they would be mindful of their affectionate kindness to their Country: and to fignifie that it was their pleasure, that they all, who had offered extraordinary service so willing- M ly, should have their pay notwithstanding: yea, and for the horses also there were assigned a certain rate and proportion of wages. This was the first time that the Gentlemen began to serve on horseback for money. This voluntary army marched to Veii, and not only repaired again the works which had been destroyed, but also went in hand to erect new. And from the City was provision of victual brought, with greater care of convoy than afore, that nothing might be wanting to an army so well deserving of the Common-weal.

The year following had for their Military Tribuns in Consuls authority, C. Servilius Hala the third time, Q. Servilius, P. Virginius, Q. Sulpitius, A. Manlius the second time, and M. Sergius the second time. In these Tribuns time, whiles every mans care was bent to the Veientian war, the fort of Anxer being neglected, by occasion that the garrifon fouldiers were disbanded and N ranged much abroad, and commonly received Volician Merchants into the town, was fuddenly surprised, by reason that the warders of the gates were betrayed. Less company of souldiers there were flain: because that all of them (besides those that were sick) found themselves occupied and traded all the country over, and in the Cities adjoining, like to lawless lackies that follow the Camp. Neither was there better success at Veii, wherein rested the chief care now, of all their publick affairs. For not only the Roman Captains were more angred one at an other than couragious against the enemy: but also the forces of the enemies were encreased by the sudden comming of the Captains and the Falleii. Which two nations of Hetruria, because they inhabited next, supposing when Veii should be forced and lost, that their turn would be next to be warred upon by the Romans: and the Faliscians besides, upon a special grudge and old quarrel of O their own, for that aforetime in the Fidenat war, they had intermedled and intereffed themfelves, sent their Embassadors to and fro, and by binding themselves by a solemn oath one to the other, came unlooked for with their power to Veii. And by chance they affailed that fide and quarter where M. Sergius a Military Tribun had the charge of a sconce, Who gave a great alarm and caused exceeding fright: because the Romans supposed certainly that all Hetruria was raised out of every part, and there present, with all the power they could make. The same imagination animated the Veientians also within the City, to make a fally. So was the Camp of

A the Romans affailed on both fides. And whiles they ran together up and down, and turned their enfigns every way, and could hardly keep the Veientians within the fitength of their fortreffe, nor yet repulie the violence from their own fortifications and ramparts, and defend themselves from their fortaign enemies behind: their onely hope was to have help from the greater leaguer: that the legions in fundry places might make head, fome against the Capenats and the Falitic, others against the fally of the townsime. But Virginian had the charge of that main camp, one that bare a privat grudge and inward malice against Sergius, and was bated again of him. This man, when word was brought that most of the Fabricks and bulwarks were assumed that the ramparts and trenches were won, and that the enemies on both sides charged instity, kept his

Fampairs and trennes were won, and that the enemies on both fides charged infility, kept his fouldiers well appointed in arms: faying, that if there were any need of help, his Colleague should find unto him, if he would, And he lor his part was not fo arrogart and infolent, but once rave aid at his hand, choic rather to be vanquished of his enemy, than to overcome him by help of a fellow-Cirizen. Thus between them for a good while the poor fouldiers went to wrack, and were shain. At the last, for saking their ramparts, a very sew of them escaped into the maine laid all the fault upon his fellow in government, it was thought good that Figning should be fent for out of the camp: and that in the mean while their Deputie, and Lieutenants should command the forces. Hereupon was the matter debated in the Senat, and the two Tribuns kept a Few therewere that tendered the common good, but took part either with the one or the other, as each of them were chanced and beloved. Howbeit the LL, of the Senat thought good, howbeeverthat to shameful chance happed either through the default, or unlucky fortune of the Captains, not to espect the ortone into their office on the * Calends of October, To which opinion when they were all agreed, the other Tribuns military nothing gainfaid it. But Sergius and Virginius (for whose lake it appeared that the Senat was weary of the Magistrates that year) at the first made means & belought them norto disgrace and discredit them so and afterward affayed to cross the decreaching that they would give over their place, before the * 1648 of December, which weather contents are the first made means as the sound.

they would give over their place, before the 'Ides of December, which was the fee and ufual and Do entring yearly into new offices. Amid this business, the Tribuns of the Commons, who had kept inline even against their wills, so long as men were at unity and the affairs of the City profected, upon a sudden brake out and threatned sharply the two Tribuns Military, that unless they would submit themselves, and selt in the authority of the Senat, they would commit them to ward. Then C, Servisinst Halas, a Military Tribuns, stood up and said, 'A as for you and your threats, 'O ye Tribuns of the Commons, in good faith, I would gladly see once, that there were no more 'p power and authority in these here, then will and stomack in you. But who seeth not that there is no stirring against the authority of the Senat? And therefore hold ye content: and forbear you to seek opportunity and occasion upon our variance to offer wrong. And the Senators being glad that without the terrors and affrightments of the Tribuns authority, there was found out another greater power to bridle magiltares: the two military Tribuns aforefaid were overweighed with the content of all parties, and held a new election of military Tribuns, to begin their government on the "Calends of October: and before that day they refigned up their places. Thus were L. Valerius Pansus the fourth time, M. Furius Camillus the fecond time, M. Emilius Mamercus the 't, day et hild time, Cn. Cornelius Cossus the second time, C. Fabius Ambustus, and L. In whose time many worthy Acts were performed both at home and abroad. For not onely if they had war in sundry places at one time, namely, at Veii, at Capena, against Falerii, and with the Velics, to the end that Answer might be won again and recovered from the epenies: but at Rome also, what about musters and paying the tribute for souldiers pays, there was much trouble. Besides, there was some variance, about taking in certain Tribuns of the Commons to the rest: and the stwo arraigniments of those, who a little before had governed in Consuls authority, caused no simal sittle. But the principal care of the Tribuns military, was that the muster should go forward. Neither were the younger fort and serviceable men only press forth, but the elder also compelled to give their names, and to keep watch and ward in the City. But look how much greater was the number of souldiers, so much more money they needed for their payment. And the same was le-Vied by a contribution: but unwillingly of as many as tarried at home. For that befides the levy G they were enjoined to become fouldiers also, in defence of the City and to serve in person for the Commonwealth. These things grievous as they were of themselves, so by the seditious Orations of the Tribuns in their assemblies, they seemed more grievous and heavy. Who argued and did coursed thus, "That wages was appointed for solldiers to this end, only that what by warfare, "and what with exactions and impositions, they might undo the Commons, and make an end of "them at once for ever. One war (say they) hath now continued three years, and the same, on "set purpose, illmanaged, that it might be drawn out the longer. to impeach and overthrow * the Tribuns law, it was effected or brought to pass that they should assume unto them for Tribuns of the Commons, C. Lacerius, and Marcus Attilius, by the might and practile no doubt of the Patritii. It hapned, to that the same year C. Trebonius was a Tribun of the Commons, who would feem to undertake the patronage and defence of the Law Trebonia, and discharge it as a duty to that name and house belonging. He spake aloud and said, "That "whereas the Tribuns Military had won that, whereof some of the Nobles had born the repulse The invedive "in their first suit, and that the Law Trebonia was disanulled, in that certain Tribuns of the Comcc monalty were taken into their fellows, not by suffrages and free voices of the people, but by the " rule and commandment of the Nobles: and that the matter was come to that pass that either K 6 Noble men, or their favourites and followers were to become Tribunes of the Commons: that "their facred laws were taken from them perforce, and the Tribuns authority wrested from our "of their hands by violence: all these inconveniencies he complained to have hapned through "the fraudulent practife of the Nobles : and the mischievous lewdness and treachery of his own " companions in office. Thus whiles there grew great heart-burning among them, and that not the Nobles only, but also the Tribuns of the Commons, as well they, which were elected, as they that were electors, were hardly thought of by the people: Then three of the Company, P. Curiatius, M. Metilius, and Minutius, fearing some shrewd turn, like to fall upon Sergius and Virginius, (the Tribuns military of the former year) and by ferving process, giving them a day to answer, turned from themselves the anger and displeasure of the Commons, upon those two perions: 1 publishing openly, "That whosoever were grieved for the mutters and the Tribute, whosoeeverthought the war long, and the continual fouldiery tedious, whofoever forrowed for the "dammage and discomfiture received at Veii, whosoever for the loss of their Children, Bre-"thren, Kinsfolk, or any of their alliance had heavy and mournful houses: to them they offered "liberty and power to venttheir publick and privat grief, upon these two guilty persons and of-"fenders, Sergins and Virginius, the very causes of all the mischies and calamities that were hap-"ned. For why? the adversary charged them with no more then was consessed by the very par-"ties: who finding themselves both faulty, laid the blame one upon the other: whiles Virginius "reproached Sergius with running away, and Sergius laid treason to Virginius his charge, in that "he denied his help in time of need. For to fay they were both of them so inconsiderate and M "foolish only, were to speak beyond all compass of belief. But much more likely it was, that "there was some packing rather, and that the matter was contrived, and practiled of set pur-" pole, and by an ordinary and common fraudulent plot of the Parrili. By whose means both "at the first the Veientians gat opportunity to fire their works, thereby to draw out and pro-"long the war, and also now the army was bought and fold, and the Roman camp betrayed to "the Falifei. And all this to no other end, but that the youth and flower of the City might wax "old at Veii, and that the Tribuns might not propose and consult with the people about the di-"firibution of lands, or any other commodities of the poor Commons, or in frequent and full "affembly of Citizens intend and follow their publick actions, and withfland the conspiracy of "the Gentry and Nobles. Moreover there is already ((ay they) a prejudice passed against these N offenders, both by the Senat and people of Rome, and also by their Colleagues. For as they "were displaced and deposed from their office, by an A&t of the Senat : so when they refused to "give over, they were for fear of a Dictator forced by their own companions to refign up their "government: and the people of Rome had created other Tribuns military to enter into their "charge, not upon the usual day which was in the * Ides of December, but forthwith in the Ca-" lends of October: as who would fay, the Common-wealth had not been able to fland any lon-" ger, if these menhad remained still in place. And yet for all this, these perions thus convicted "and fore-condemned by fo many prejudices, come now to be judged of the people: thinking " they are infliciently quit, and discharged, yea, and have inffered punishment enough, in that "they were two months sooner then ordinary, made private persons; and perceive not, that O "thereby was taken from them the power only to do any harm, and no punishment inflicted up-"on them. For as much as, even their very Colleagues, who had not offended, were likewise " discharged as well as they; Let the Quirites therefore and people of Rome, take that heartto "them again, which they had upon the late overthrow, fresh and bleeding new, when they be-" held the army running in fearful flight, fore wounded and agast, arriving at the gates, bla-

"we know afturedly that there is not one of all them here prefently aftembled, who that day cur-

Neither is it convenient, that upon whom, erewhile every man prayed that the anger "and vengeance of God would light against them now when they both may and ought, they "fhould not extend theirfull power with rigour. Since that even the very gods never lay hand "themselves upon sinners and offenders: but it insticeth that they arm the wronged and oppres-"seed persons with means and opportunity of revenge. The Commons upon these speeches mo-"ved with indignation, condemned thele two offenders in 10000, brazen Affes a piece: not- * 26, lib, 5, 60. withstanding that Sergius pleaded for himself, blamed the common fortune of war, and laid all state.

upon fortune: and Virginius befought them (but both invain) that he might not bemore un-B happy, and speed worseat home, than abroad in war. Thus the peoples wrath being diverted mpon these two, obscured and darkned the remembrance both of the assumption and admitting of the Tribuns aforelaid, and of deluding and disanulling the Law Trebonia. The Tribuns thus having got the upper hand, to the end that the Commonalty might have a present reward for awarding this doom, publish the Law Agraria, and forbid the levying of the Subfidy for fouldiers pay: feeing there was need of pay for so many armies: and sped so well they had, in the managing of warfare, as they were like to come to an end, without any warring at all. For at Veii the perv camp which was lost, being recovered again, was fortified with strong bulwarks, and surnished with good guards. The Tribuns Military, M. Emylius and Q. Fabius, had the charge there. And as for M. Fuzzus in the Faliscan, and Cn. Cornelius in the Capenat Country they could C meet with none enemies without their town walls. But they drave away booties, and wasted their marches, by firing their villages and their corn : but as for their towns, they neither affaulted nor belieged them. But in the Volfcian country, after their territory was wasted, Anxpr also was assaulted (but in vain) for that it was situate on high. Whereupon Valerius Potitus, who had the charge of that province, feeing that force would not prevail, began by trench and rampart to lay fiege to it, and invest it round. The affairs of war abroad standing in these tearms, there arose domestical strife and sedition at home: and the same was followed more earness ly and with greater ado, than the wars weremanaged without. And when by reason of the Tribuns there could no subsidies and exactions begathered, nor money for fouldiers pay sent to the Generals, and that the fouldiers called on them hard, and were hastly for their wages: the camp also had like to have D been troubled and infected with the contagion of those civil mutinies, During these heats and angry fits of the Commons against the Nobles, albeit the Tribuns of the people said, That now the time was come of establishing their freedom, and translating the chiefest dignity from the Sergii and Virginii, to the Commoners, such as were men of valour and action: Yet they prevailed no more then thus, that one only of the Commonalty, (asit were to make entrie and take possession in the right of that dignity Jto wit, P. Licinius Calvus, thould be created Tribun Military with Con- P. Licinius Calfuls authority: the rest were all of the Nobility, Pub, Manlins, and P. Titinius, P. Melius, L. E stept in years. Neither as yet is it for certain known, why he first and above all others was counted a meet man to have hansel, or make essay of this new dignity and promotion. Some think, that for his brother Cn. Cornelius his sake, who had been the year afore a Tribun Military, and had given to the horsemen triple pay, he was through savour drawn in, and called to so great honour. Others, for that himself had picked out a convenient time, and made a plausible Oration. that both Nobles and Commons liked very wel, concerning the agreement and unity of the States. The Tribuns of the Commons rejoicing highly for this their victory in the Election, remitted and called in the Inhibition of the subsidy or imposition aforesaid, the thing that most of all prejudiced the service of the Common-wealth. By means whereof paiment was made in all dutiful obedience, and fent it was unto the army. Then within short time was Anxur (in the Volscians F Country) recovered: by occasion that on a festival holy day, the watch and ward of the City was neglected. This was a year notable and famous for the cold and snowy winter, so as the high ways were choaked up, and Tyberis was unnavigable; Howbeit, by realon of provision brought in aforehand, the price of corn arose not. And for because P. Licinius, as he entred his government without any troubles, and with greater joy and contentment of the Commons than indignation of the Nobles; To also ruled and executed it all the year long accordingly: therefore their teeth watered at the next election also; to make Tribuns military of their own body. Only M. Veturius, of all the Nobility that flood in fuit for the dignity, had a place among them. But as for the o-

Wit, L. Titinius, P. Menenius Racilius, Cn. Genutius, and L. Attilius. G After this hard Winter, either by reason of a distemperature and disposition of the weather, suddenly changed to a contrary, or upon some other hidden and unknown cause, there sollowed presently a contagious and dangerous summer, by occasion of a pestilence, notion to all kind of living creatures. Of which incurable malady, when as neither the reason could be sound, nor any end thereof seen, the Books of Sibylla, were by a decree of the Senat perused: and Duumvirs appointed for Divine Rites and Ceremonies, by celebrating a Lectifletn (then first instituted in the City of Rome) to appeale and pacific Apollo, Latona, and Diana, Hercules, Mercury and Neptune ; feasted them (as it were) for the space of eight days together, & for that purpose they set out

three beds or banquetting tables, with as magnificent and flately firmiture as could be for that H time possibly devised. Which solemnity was privarly also performed. All the gates and doors through the City flood wide open al forts of viands were fet out abroad to be used in common: open house kept for all comers, one with another, as well unknown strangers as their acquaintance, with all friendly welcom, and entertainment. Kindly, and courteoutly would they talk and devile, even with their adversaries: all chiding and brauling was laid afide and put under foot. The prisoners also for that time were enlarged, yea, and conscience made afterwards, that any should be laid or kept in irons, unto whom the gods had vouchfafed that gracious meed.

But all this while much trouble there was, and many alarms before Veii, by reason that three wars were joyned now in one, For when as all at once the Capenats and the Falitic came (in ma-I ner as afore, about the fortifications and trenches of the Romans Jfor to rescue the besieged, they were forced to make head, and hazzard a doubtful battel against three armies. But the best help they had, was the remembrance of the lare condemning of Sergius and Virginius. Therefore having conducted by a neerer way, their forces from the greater camp (which before lav fill and would not come to succour) they set upon the Capenats backs, as they turned against the rampart of the Romans. The battel there begun, made the Falisci also afraid : in which affright of theirs they suddenly sallied out of the lesser hold, in so good time that they forced the enemies to turn their backs, all quaking for fear. And having got the upper hand, they followed the train of the victory, and in the chair made a very great flaughter and destruction of them. And not long after, the forragers that wasted the land of the Capenats, as they ranged abroad here and there, K encountred the refidue and remnant of this battel, as if fortune of purpose had presented them to their hands, and swept them up clean. Also many of the Veientians as they fled back into the City, were cut in pieces before their very gates: whiles they within for fear left the Romans at once should rush in, made the gates fast and so shut out the hindmost of their own men. These were the atchievances of this year.

And now approached the Election of the Tribuns military, whereof the nobles had in a manner a great care then of the war: as who faw now that the foveraign rule was not only parted with the Commonalty, but welneer on their own behalf quite loft. Therefore albeit of fet purpose they had prepared most noble and excellent men to stand in suit, whom to pass by and let slip, they thought the people would have been ashamed : yet nevertheless they themselves (as if they L had been the parties that flood) tried every way, and not only fought the help of men, but also craved it at the hands of the gods: making it great scruple and a matter of conscience : and alledging that the elections for two years past were not according to the wil of God: as appeared by this, fav they, that in the former year there was an intollerable winter, and fuch asportended some heavy judgements from above; how also the year following, there were no prodigious tokens shewed aforehand, but even the very events and effects thereof, were seen and felt : namely, the pestilence both in Country and City, through the very indignation, no doubt, of the gods, for that in the fatal Books of Sibylla it was found out, that they ought to have been pacified, for the diverting away of that pestilent influence. As if in those solemn assemblies which ought in the name of the gods & religiously to be held, the gods thought it an indignation and unseemly thing, that M the honour ible offices of state should be made common: no distinction of degrees, no difference of horses observed, but all consused and shuffled together. The people therefore being driven into amaze, not only in regard of the Majesty and Dignity of those that were competitors, but also of a very remorie of confeience, chole for Tribuns military in Coff authority all of the Nobility; and a good part of them, the most honorable personages of the rest, to wit, L. Valerius Potitus the first time, M. Valerius Maximus, M. Furius Camillus the third time, L. Furius Medullinus the third time, Quintius Servilius Fidenas the second time, Quintus Sulpitius Camerinus the second time, Howbeit in this year no great exploit worthy of record, was performed at Veii under these Tribuns. All the service that was, consisted in forraging and wasting. The two Lord Generals raised huge booties, to wit, Potitus from Falerii, Canillus from Cazena: leaving behind them nothing N whole and untouched, that might be spoiled by fire or sword. In this mean time, many fearful prodigious tokens were reported, the most part whereof were slenderly credited, for that of each there was but one only author; and because there were no soothsayers, by whom they might make procuration therefore (fince that the Tuscans were now professed enemies) they were altogether neglected. But one especially there was, which all men had an eye and regard unto, namely, for that a certain pool within the Alban forrest, without extraordinary rain from above, or any other occasion which might make the thing feem less miraculous and wonderful, was risen unto an unusual height. Cerrain Orators therefore were sent to the Oracle of Delphi, to know what the gods forefignified by that prodigious token. But they, as god would, met with an interpreter of the Destinies neerer home, to wit, an ancient Veientian. Who (upon a time, when as the souldi- O ers, both of the Romans and Tuscans, let fly one at the other taunts and scoffs from their stations and guards) thus spake in prophetical wise: That until the water were drained and let out of the Alban poole, the Romans should never be masters of the town of Veii. Which saying of his was at the first contemned as a foolish word rashly let fall from him: but after it began to be much talked of, so long, until a certain Roman souldier from out of his ward, enquired of a towns-

man that warded next unto him (for now by reason of long war they had entercourse of speech one with another) what he was who had cast out such an ambiguous riddle of the Alban Lake?

A When he heard that he was a fouthfaier, being himlelf allo a man not without some sense of religion he trained that wifard forth to communication, pretending that he would gladly be refolved himfelf, as conching a particular prodigious object that troubled his mind : & therefore requested himat his good leiture, to take fo much pain as to confer with him, and give him counfell about the ex piation and diverting the danger thereof. Now when they were both gone a good way from their fellows, unarmed, and without all fear and suspition one of the other, the Roman being alufty tall young man, caught the feeble old fellow in the fight of them all, and not withflanding a great (Lir that the Tulcans made but all in vain) had him away perforce tohis own company; Who being brought before the General, was tent afterwards to Rome unto the Senat And being de-B manded what the meaning of that should be, which he had prognosticated and prelaged concerning the Albaniake, answered thas: "Certainly the gods were offended with the people of Veii that day on which they put this into his mind to bewray the fatall and inevitable destruction of

"their State and country: and therefore that, which as then he being flirred by divine infpiration 44 had prophefied, neither might he call back again and unifpeak; and befides, happily by concealand propoened mental might be committed in the immortal gods would have to be published, there might be committed things, which the immortal gods would have to be published, there might be committed things which the immortal gods would have to be published, there might be committed to be published. ted as great fin, as by difclosing mysteries to be concealed. Thus therefore (qnoth he) is it written behrutiten in the fatall books of fortunes, and thus in the Tufcans learning, to us is delivered, That when on of Viii. the Alban water overflowed, if then the Romans with due and religious ceremonies let it out, they should have the victory of the Vesentians : but before that the gods would not for lake the wals of the Veientiant. Then went he on fill, and shewed what was the folemn and right matter of deriving the water, But the Nobles supposing authout to be the light of credit, and not of sufficient account in fo weighty a matter to believed, refolved to expect the Embaffadors, and the aniwer of the Oracle of Apollo. But before these messengers were returned from Desphi, or any expiation found out for this A'ban miracle, the new Tribuns Military with Confuls authority, L. Julius Tullus. L. Fur us Medullinus the fourth time, L. Sergius Fidenas, A. Posthumius Regillensis, P. Cornelius Maluginenfis, A. Manlius; began their government. In that year there atole new enemies, the Tarquinians; they feeing the Romans buffed with many wars at once, with the Volicians at Anxwr, who laid fiege to the fort there: with the Equians at Lavicos, who affaulted the colony of the Romans: belides, with the Veientians the Fa-D lifeians and Capenars - and that within the City there was no greater quietnels, by reason of variance between the Nobility and Commons . Supposing, I say, that hereby they had good opportunity to do tome in jury and harm, they fend forth certain bands of fouldiers lightly appointed, into the territory of Rome, to forrage and make spoil thinking that the Romans would either put up that wrong at their hands without revenge, because they would not charge themselves with a new war : or encounter them and make head with a small power and the same but slender and disfurnished. The Romans was more offended at the indignity of these bravadoes, then they cared much for the spoil done by the Tarquinians. And thereupon they neither made much ado about the matter, nor drove it out any long while. A. Posthumina and Lu. Julius levied a power without any ordinary multer (for letted they were by the Tribunes of the Commons) even in a man-Te net of voluntary fouldiers, whom they had procured with good words and comfortable speeches. And passing throughout the country of the Cariti by crois & crooked waies, surpried the Tarquinans upon the ludden, as they returned from plandering, & laden with great prizes. Many they liew, all they ealed of their loading sand thus having recovered the spoils of their lands, they returned to Rome. I wo daies were allowed for the owners, every own to own his proper goods: & on the third day, such goods that were unknown (whereof the most part belonged to the enemies) were fold in port-fale: and that mony which was made thereof was divided among the fouldiers. All other wars, and especially the Veientian, had doubtfull iffue. For now the Romans despairing of all mans help, regarded and expected only the course of destinies and the will of the gods. By which time the Embassadours were retuned from Delphi, bringing the answer of the Oracle, agreeable to the former answer made by the wilard, with was taken prisoner; and it ran in this forme: Be- The answer of ware O Romans that the Alban water be not kept too long in the pool. Bewear thou let it not the Oracle.

discharge it solf into the sea. Let it forth and wtear the fields therewith, by sundry rivu-Lets or streams than halt mast it and draw it dry. Then assault valiantly the enemies wals, remembering that out of that City which se many years thou hast besieged, victory is promised to thee afferedly, by these destinies which now are revealed. And after the war ended and conquest aschieved, fee thou bring unto my temple, an ample and benourable present : andperform the facered ceremonies of thy country according to the old sufteme, and renew those a fresh Which have of late time been negletled. Here grew this captaine prophet above faid to be greatly accounted of: and the Tribunes military, Cornelism and Pofithumius, began to take his countel and

G advice, about the procuration of the Alban miracle, and to appeale the gods indue order. And found it was at left where it was that the gods blamed the neglect of ceremonies & for letting the ancient foleamities and facrifices: and that certainly it was nothing elfe, but that there was an errour committed in creation of the Magistrats : and they so created, had solemnised the Latine bolidaies wrong and celebrated the acrifices in the Alban mount amille. The only purging or expistion whereit was, that the Tribunes military should give over their office, and that the v should take new Auspices againby the flight & singing of birds, and so to proceed to an Interreign, All which things were according to a decree of the Senat performed. gents succeeded one after another. M. Valerine, Q. Serviline Federas, M. Farins Camilles. But all this while no end there was, nor intermission of troubles and dissentions. For the Tribunes of the Commons disturbed and staid the assembly for the election to long, untill it wasagreed that the greater par of the Tribunes military should be created from the Commons.

During these affaires, the Tuscans held certain Diets and Councels at the Temple of Volumina: where when the Capenats and Falifei required that with one common affent and resolution, all the people of Herraria should raise the siege from Veis, this answer was returned : "That here-"tofore they had denied the Veientians their help in this regard, that they were not to feek for " aid at their hands, from whom in fo weighty a matter they had not fought for counfell; but now "their own fortune made answer for them. For such was the difficulty of their present estate, r "That if they would, yet they well could not : confidering especially how into that part of Hoes turia there were newly arived to feat themselves there, the Gauls, a strange nation unto them: er with whom they neither had affured peace, nor yet certain war to trust unto, Howbeit for bloud-" fake, and for the very name, and in regard of the present perils of their kinsmen, they would of grant thus much: that if any of their youth would go forth to the war willingly and of them-" felves, they would be no hindrance. Now was it noised at Rome, that a mighty great number " of these enemies were come to raise the siege. Whereby the civil discords of (as it is commonly feen upon a generall fear) began to wax more calm and to flake. For the principall Tribe that had the prerogative to give their first voice, choic P. Licinius Calvus Tribune Military, without his own fuit (but not against the will of the Nobles) a man of approved good carriage, and moderati- K on in his former government, but exceeding old. And it appeared evidently, that all the rest for that year, should be cholen anew after him, out of the Colledge of those that had been Tribunes Consular beforetimes: namely, L. Titinius, P. Menenius, Cn. Genutius, L. Attilius : who before they were elected and pronounced, P. Licinim Calvin spake in this manner (by the permission of the Interregent) unto the other Tribes, that were called in their right and orderly courfe, to their fuffrages." I fee well,my maftersO ye Citizens of Rome, That in this election, wherin ve have The Oration in remembrance our former Magistracy, ye guesse and presage happily against the year ensuing. of Licinius Cal- et concord and unity : the only thing at this time of all others most profitable : in case I say, you vm to the peo. Licia I. 4' nime. The strength of my body crasse, and feeble, the sense of my eies and ears dim and dull : et my memory faileth, the quickneffe of my spirit grown heavy and lumpish. But behold quoth the laying hand on his fon) this young man, the very image and portraiture of him, whom ye afore time made Tribune Military, the first that ever was out of the commonalty. Him trained and se brought up after my own order and discipline, in stead of my self, I bequeath, I give, I dedicate " unto the commonweal And I beseeth you O Quirites, that the dignity which of your selves you "have offered unto me, without my feeking, you would bestow upon him at his own hamble suit. " and the rather shew him this favour at my earnest request in his behalf. The father had hisdesire granted. And io his fon P. Licinius, was with them, whom before we named, declared Tribune Military in Confuls authority. Titinine and Genneine Tribunes Military, made an expedition M against the Falisci and Capenats; Who managing the war in greater heat and courage, than with fage advise and counsel, plunged themselves headlong into an ambushment of their enemies. Genntins paid for his rathnesse, and made amends by an honorable death; For he was flain even before the enfignes, valiantly fighting in the vanguard of the battell with the formoft. But Tuinus, having after much fear rallied his fouldiers, retired himself unto an high hill, and made head again. Howbeit he durft not encounter the enemy on even and plain ground. The shame of this defeat was greater than the loffe other wife. And yet it had like to have turned into a right great damage and overthrow. So great was the fear, not at Rome only, whither much news came diverily reported ; but also in the camp before Veii, that hardly could the fouldiers be kept from running away. For it was notifed all over the camp, that the Capenats and Falifcians had got the vi- N ctory, flain the Generals and the whole army and that all the flour and firength of Tuccany was not far off. But at Rome there was much more hurli-bury; For there it was verilybeleeved, that the leaguer about Veii was affaulted, and that, part of the enemies already were coming in warlike mener against the City : so as they came running on heaps to man the wals. And even the very matrons and dames of the City, whom publike fear had caused to leave their houses, fell to their beads and supplication in the churches : befeeching the gods to avert and divert destruction from the houses, Temples, and wals of the City of Rome, and to turn away that fear from themupon Veiit

Now by this time were the folemn plaies & the Latine holidaies renewed, now was the water O let out of the Alban lake into the fields, now Veit drew neer to her final end, bastned by the course of the Deftinies. Therefore there was creased M. Farine Camillus Dictator, the fatall captain, predeftined to destroy that City, and to fave his own country : who appointed P. Cornelina Scipio Collonell of the horimen. The change of the General made a change foon of all things elic. The hopes of men were other than afore, the minds of men were altered, yea, the fortune of the City icemed not the same. But first of all, he proceeded by martiall law against them, who in that featfull most, but likewise to stand in awe of their own Commander. And after he had published to take multers upon a certain day, himself in the mean while rode post to Veii, there to encourage the hearts of the fouldiers. From thence he returned to Rome, for to levy a new army : and there was not one that refused to serve under his standard. For even the youth of the forrainers both Latins and Hernicks, came & offered their fervice in that war, Unto whom, when as the Delator had in the Senat house yeelded thanks, and that all things now were in sufficient readinels, by a decree of the Senat he made a vow, that when he had won Veri, he would incommently celebrat the great games, and reedifie and confectat anew, the Temple to dame Mainta, which afore time had been dedicated by King Servius Tullius. Thus when he was gone forth from the City, and his srmy on foot, with greater expectation of the people then hope : first he fought a field with the Faliscians and Capenats in the Country of Neper, [salled at this day Nepe] where he ordered all the exploits with as great discretion and policy as might be : and as it commonly fallethout he sped as well and fortune favoured his defignes. He not only defeated his enemies in batell, but also drave them out of the field, and gained a huge booty, whereof the greatest part came to the Treasurer his coffers; and somewhat (though not much) was given to the fouldiers. From thence he marched with his armour to Veii, and there he caused more sconces and bastillons to be made, and to stand thicker together. And having made proclamation, that none should fight without speciall commandment, he wirldrew the fouldiers to the making of trenches and rampiers, from their skir-C mithes that they made oftentimes, and that rafhly, between their camp and the wall of the town. The greatest work of all the rest and most laborious, was the undermining that was begun into the Castle of the enemies. And to the end that this work should not be intermitted, nor yet the continual labour fill under the ground might over-toil them: he divided the pioners into fix parts, and each of them wrought fix hours round by turns, fo that both night and day, they never gave over before they had wrought a way to the Caltle. The Dictator feeing now the victory as it were in his hands, and a most rich City ready to be taken, and that there was like to be such faceage, as never had been the like in all the wars put together aforetime: lest that he might incur either any mutiny and anger of the fouldiers in pinching and feant parting of the pillage, or displeasure and discontenument of the Rulers and Nobles of Rome, by so prodigall a largestein sharing all: dif-D patched his letters to the Senat, to this effect, " That wheras by the goodnelle of the immortall Gods, his own policy and direction, and the travell of his fouldiers, the City Voii was now in " a maner at his devotion; what they would advite, should be done with the rich spoils thereof. "There were two divers opinions that mightily diffracted the Senat; the one of the old P. Licimus, whole mind being asked of his fon, spake first (by report) and said: that his opinion was, there should a proclamation be published abroad among the people, that whosever would be partaker of the booty, should go to the Leaguer before Veii. The other of Ap. Claudius, who finding fault with this newsprodigall, unequall, and undifferent largesse, in that they thought it unlawful and unfit, that the treasure got of the enemies should come once at least wife to the common purse of the City, which had been emptied to often by reason of wars: was of advice, "That the soul-E e diers should have their pay out of it, that the Commons thereby might be eased, in the Difference in "charges of the lubfidy levied of them : for fo should every mans house equally feel the focarages of the monay letter and the hands of idle persons remaining at home in the town, gree-"dy now of rifling, and who would be fingering of Pillage, should not plack from the hardy "warriors their due rewards. For as much as it is usually seen, that as the veliantest man "commonly aimethat the greatest part of travell and perill, to the more coward alwaies reachet at the biggest portion of the spoil, and hath his hand deepest therein: Contract wife, Li. 4 cinius, alledged that fuch mony laid up would be alwaies suspected and odious, and would mi-" nilter matter unto the Commons of criminations & finding one fault or other, whereof feditions ef and commotions may arife, and would give occasions of new laws to be preferred: and there-F "fore better it were: that by this gift and boon the hearts of the Commons were won and reconcicled: who being spent and eaten out by reason of their charges of so many years, herewith "might be well relieved. And that they ought to tast the fruit and sweetnesse of the booty out "of that war, in which they had spent their years, and were waxen old men. And that it would be more welcome and acceptable, that every man should be his own carver, and with " his own hand catch from the enemie what he could, and bring it home with him, than if they is should receive much more by a great deal at the discretion and pleasure of another. And the as Dictator himselfe (faith he Jhath avoided as neer as he could, the displeasure, hatred, and offence that might arise thereof, and therefore posted it off to the Senat : the Senat ought likewise is feeing the matter is put to them, to let the Commons alone therewith, and permit every man to G a have such share as the fortune of war will allot him. This advise which made the Senat grati-"ous with the people, was thought to be the fafer and better of the twain. Whereupon proclase mation was made, That wholoever would have part of the spoil of Veil, should shew himselfe "before the Dictator in the camp. So there went a buge multitude, that they filled the camp againe. Then the Dictator after facrifice done, and advice taken of the lucky fignes of birds. went forth and commanding his fouldiers to take armes and weapons in hand, fpake thele words

"and faid : " By thy conduct and the inftinct of thy divine power O Pythias Apollo, 1 let for-"ward to the winning of the town of Veil, & now to thee I vow the tenth part of the spoils therof.

" And thee withall (ô Queen June) who at this hour doft inhabit within the compaffe of these H "wals, I befeech, that thou wouldft vouchfafe, to follow us after conquest into this city. ours "now, and thine within awhile; whereas thou maiest be shrined in a Temple meet for thee, and "the grandent of thy majefty. Having made these prajers, with an exceeding multitude he invested the city, and affaulted it round on all parts; to the end that they within might have leffe perceivance of the peril intended towards them from the undermining. The Veientians little knowing that they were betrayed, partly by their own prophets, and partly by the Oracles abroad, and that some of their gods were invited and bidden to part of the spoil and accage, and other by vowes and praiers trained and called out of their own city; began to look after the temples of their enemies & their new habitations: little weening that this was their last day, & fearing nothing less than that I their wals should by undermining be overthrown, and that their Castle was full already of enemies: every man for himself ran armed to the wals, marvailing what the matter should be, that whereas for fo many daies frace no man flirred out of the Romans Leaguer, then of a fudden(as if it were in a wood rage) they ran upon head to rafhly to the affault. But hereto belongeth a tale: That when the Veientian King was at facrifice, this voice of the Southfaier was overheard out of the mine under ground. That he whole hap was to cut forth the Inwards of that (acrifice (hould obtain villery, and moved the Roman fouldiers, to break out of the undermning, and to catch up the entrails and bowels, and carry them to the Dictator. But as in things of to great antiquity it fufficeth me, that those which carry tome likelyhood of truth, be received for true; to for fabulous matters fitter indeed to make a flow in a flage play (where people take delight in fuch miracles) K then to be fadly believed, it will not quit for the pains either to avouch them, or difavow them. The mine or cave at the same time (no doubt)full of chosen souldiers, yeelded forth all at once armed men into the Church of June, which was in the caltle of Veii, and some of them set up. on the backs of their enemies that were on the wals : others pluck up the portcullis of the gates: fome of them, whiles from the houses the women and servants flung down stones and tiles, cast fire abroad. So that every place was full of cries and voices, partly of them that frighted others, and partly of those that were affrighted, with a confused screecking of women and children. When as now in a moment, the armed fouldiers were thrown down from the wals every where, and the gates let open: whiles some entred marching in aray, others scaled the naked wals, the city was filled with enemies a and skrmiffies there were in every place. After great mail- r. facre and execution committed, the fight began to quail and the Dictator commanded the Bedles to proclame and give commandment, to spare the unarmed. Thus the bloudsbed ended. Whereupon the unarmed people began to yeeld : and by permission of the Dictator the souldiers ran to and praied, "That if his own fortune and the felicity of the people of Rome were thought by any " god or man to be excessive, the envy belonging thereto might be mitigated with as small "privat losse of his own in particular, and with as little common calamity of the people of "Rome in generall, as might possibly be. And it is recorded, that in this maner praying and worshipping, as he turned himself about, he slipt forward and caught a fall. And as men afterwards M gueffed by that which fell out, it was supposed that the ominous roken presaged the condemnation of Camellas himself, and the ruin of the city of Rome, which hapned within a few years after to be

forced and facked. Thus was that day ipent in the flaughter of enemies, and in rifling of that most wealthy city. The morrow after, the Dictator sold in portfale the bodies of as many as were freeborn. That mony only came into the common treatury not without some anger and repining of the Commons. And as for that booty and spoil which they brought with them away. they counted themselves beholden therefore, neither to the Generall himself (who to colour and excuse his own nigardise had referred the matter to the Senat-wherein he might have used his own liberty and diferetion) nor to the Senat : but unto the house of the Licinis, Whereof, the fon propounded the matter before the Senat, and the father was the author of fo popular an over- N

When as now worldly and earthly riches, were carried forth and tumbled out of Veii by heaps, then began they to remove and have away the facred gifts and oblations of the gods with the gods themselves, but after the maner of devout worshippers, rather than of greedy spoilers. For chosen there were out of the whole army, certain youths in the flower of their age, who having their bodies clean washed, and being arraied in robes, had in charge to carry Queen June to Rome, and entred into the Church with great adoration and reverence, and at the first very charity and religioully laid hand upon her, for that (after the Tulcan maner) there used none to handle that Image but the Priest of one certain tribe. After this, when as one of them, whether it were upon a certain divine inspiration, or in some youthfull sport, cast out these words, Wile thou march to Rome dame Inno? The reft with one voice cried aloud, That the gave a nod, and feemed thereto to give affent: whereupon this also was added to the tale, that the was heard to say, I will. Bue for certain it is reported, that the was firred out of her footftall, with the help of a small lever, and that as the willingly was displaced, to the was easily removed & translated, and to fafe and found conveied into the mountain Aventine, there to abide and remain for ever; which was the place affigned inf-to her by the vows of the Roman Dictator. And there Camillou according to his yow, dedicated to her afterwards a temple. This was the finall end and fall of Vois, the richest City of all the Tuicans, which even in the last and utmost calamity showed her mightiness, and having been besieged round about continually the space of ten summers and winters, & in that time done much more annoisnce and hurt then it received, was now at last through the necessity of fatall delliny, earned rather by long fiege and fecret undermining, then won by forcible affault and violence:

When tiding come to Rome of the winning of Veri, albeit both the prodigious lights that were feen, had been expiat by facrifice, and that the answers of the Prophets and wisemen, yea, and the Oracles of Apollo were well known : and that to far forth as mens counfel and policy might help. they had chosen for Generall M. Farisa, the most noble captain and warrior of all other: yet confidering they had there warred to many years with variable fortune, and received it any loffes and overthrows, their joy was exceeding great, as if a thing had hapned unlooked for. And before that the Senat could make a decree, all the churches were full of the dames of Rome giving thanks to their gods. And the Senat ordained by an act, that suplications should continue for four daies, the like as never had been before time in any war. The Dictator alio was met upon the way as he came home by all degrees and estates in great number, and was more welcomed and honoured then any man afore time, to that day. And the triumph far exceded the usual maner of the solemnity to that day belonging. But most of all was he himself all goodly to be seen, entring into the city in a chariot drawn with white fleeds. And that was thought an bonour, not only unmeet for the quality of a citizen, but hardly befeeming the condition of any man whatfoever. For they made it a matter of confeience, that their Dicastor should be equall with Jupiter, and the fun, in The temple respect of their hories : for whichonly cause especially, the triumph was more glorious than gra- of Queen in C cious, and taken in good part. Then affigned be & let out to Queen June a church in Anventine hill, no. 1 he temple and dedicated another to dame Mainta, and so having atchieved and performed those divine and of Mainta,

After this began some speech about the Present to Apollo. Unto whom, when as Camillas said that he had wowed the tenth part of the spoil and the Pricits and Prelatethought good that the people should discharge their conscience in that behalf : there could no ready mean be found how to command them to give back again the spoil, that the due portion thereout might be set apart for the holy colation. At the length they grew to this point, which was thought the eafieft courfe. of all, that who oever would acquit himself and his house in conficience, should, after he had made an eltimat to himfelf of his own thare in the spoil, bring the value & price of the ten h part into the D common Cheft : that thereof might be made a golden oblation, meet for the flate of that Temple, befeeming the power of that god, and answerable to that dignity of the people of Rome. Yet even this contribution alienated the hearts of the people from Camillan.

human deeds, he religned up his Dictatorship.

A mid these affairs there came Embassadours from the Volscians and Equisos, to treat for peace, and peace obtained they, rather because the city, wearied with consuali wars, might now take relt and be at quiet, than for any deferts of them that fued for it. After Veij was taken, the year following had lix Tribunes Military in Confuls anthority, two P. Cornelij, namely, Coffus and Seipio, M. Valerius Maximus the second time, C. Fabius Ambuffus the second time, L. Furius Medullinus the second time, and Q. Servilius the third time, Unto the Cornelis fell out by lot the Falifcan war, to Valerius and Servilius the Capenats. Who neither affaulted their cities by force, nor westied them with siege : but forraged the countries, and drave booties away of such things as were in the fields, not a tree that bearethfruit, not any fruitful things belides, escaped their hands. This diffresse and calamity subdued the Capenats . who thereupon sued for peace, and had it granted. But amongst the Faliscians the war continued still. In the mean time, at Rome there were fundty feditions. For the appealing whereof, it was thought good to fend a Colony to Volici, and thither three thouland citizens were appointed in checkroll. And Triumvirs were thereto cholen-

who divided to every man three acres of ground and a half, and one twelfth part. That began to be despited, because they thought it but a poor comfort offered to stop their mouths withall, and to put them beside agreater hope. For why should the Commons besent away into the Volscians land, seeing there was Very within their eye-sight, a most fair city, and the land about more plen-F tifull and large than that of Rome ? And as for the city it felf, they preferred it, either for the fite, or flate of privat or publick buildings and other places, before the city of Rome. Moreover a motion also was made (which, after that Rome was won by the French, was more botly followed) concerning a General transmigration and removing to Very for ever. Marry they intended that Foi fhould be inhabited, partly by the Commons, and partly by the Nobility : laying, That the people of Rome might well enough inhabit two cities joyntly in one flate of Commonwealth. "Against all this, the LL of the Senat laboured what they might, and plainely laid, they " would coner dye in the fight of the people of Rome, than any of those matters should passe, For why? if there were now in one city fo much diffention, what would there be in twain? Would 64 any man be formad, as to prefer a conquered city, before his own country that had conquered G "any man De 10 mag, as to piere, a company to be in better effate then it was afore, even when " it was at the belt? Finally, well might they be fortaken at home in their own country by their citi-"zens, but to for take their country and citizens, they would never be brought by any force whatloever. They would not follow to Veij, T. Siemini'as their founder, for he amongst the Tribuns "of the Commons perswaded this Act) and leave their god Romains the son of a god, the first flockfather and beginner of the city of Rome, Whiles these matters were in handling with foule ftir and much debate and variance (for the nobles had won to their opinion some of the Tri-Tribunes) there was nothing elle that flaied the Commons hands from outrage, but this, that H when there was an outery made to begin the quarell, and to fet them together by the cars; the chiefe and principal Senatours first came forth to the multitude, and offered themselves to be laid at, imitten and flain. In regard of whole age, dignity, and honour, they forbeating to do violence. were likewife for shame staied in their mood, for any the like attempts besides. Camellus taking vantage hereof, ever and anon in all places, made speeches unto the people, and faid . "That is "was no marvell truly, that the city was in a rage and madnes, which being charged with a yow. "made more care of all things elfe, then to discharge their conscience thereof and see it performesed. As for the collation and gathering of a finall donative, rather then a tithe, he faid nothing of " it : feeing that every man privatly bound himfelfthereto, and the body of the people flood fre- I ed therefrom. But one thing there was that his confcience would not fuffer him to hold his peace. that out of that booty only which was of moveable things, the tenth was appointed to be levi-"ed: as for the city and ground that was won, which allo was compriled within the you "there were no words at all made. When as the debating of this matter, which to the Senat feemed doubtfull and hard, was put over to the Priefts and Prelats : their colledge calling to them Camillus, thought good, that what foever the Veientians had before the vow made, and what foever after the vow, came into the hands of the people of Rome, the tenth part thereof should be condecrated to Apollo. So both the city and the lands were valued : and mony taken forth of the city chamber. And the Tribunes military Confular enjoying therewith to buy gold. Whereof there being not flore enough, the dames of the city, having their assemblies and meetings by themselves K for to confult therabout, by a common decree made promife to the Tribines military, and brought into the exchequer their own gold, and all the ornaments and jewels they had. This was as acceptable a thing, and as well taken of the Senat, as ever any had been tand for this liberality / men lav) they had this honour granted unto them, as to vide to church and to plates in hanging or thin-coaches, and as well on working daies as holidaies, to be at their wagons. When the gold was of every one received by weight and prifed to the worth, that they might again he paid mony therfores it was agreed that a flanding ou p of gold flould be made therof, and prefented as an oblation to Apollo at Dolphi. So foon as they had eased and disburdned their minds of this religious vow, the Tribunes of the Commons began fedition anew. So as the multitude was incited and firred up against all the peers, but above all other against Camillas; charging him, that what by con-1. fileating and confecrating the booty of the Veientians, he had brought it to just nothing. Those nobles that were ablent they blamed and they cried out against mightily, but of such that were pre-fent in place, and offered themselves amouthem in their anger, they had some reverence. Now so foon as they faw the matter in quellion to be deferred and continued past that year they chose again her the year following, those Tribunes of the Commons, which were the authors of that act and law. The Nobles like wife endeavoured the fame for those that should oppose themselves against the law. So the Tribunes of the Commons (a good part of them) were chosen the very same again. But at the Election of the Tribunes Military, the Patritij after very much ado got at length, , that Furius Camillus was created. They made semblance and pretended, that they would be provided of a Generall for war, but indeed their purpole was to be furnished of an adversary to withstand M the ads and proceedings of the Tribunes. Together with Camilius were made Tribunes Military in Confuls authority, L. Farins Medallinus the fixe time, C. Emplius , L. Valerius Publicola, Sp. Posthumius, P. Cornelius the second time.

In the beginning of the year, the Tribunes of the Commons stirred not untill M. Furing Camillu was gone against the Falifei, as his charge required for that war. And by delaies afterwards the matter was well cooled. As for Camillan, whom of all other they most feared to be their adversary, he waxed great and glorious, by his fervice against the Falisci. For when as at the first, the enemies kept themselves within the wals, thinking it the safest way he by wasting their country, and fetting fire upon their villages, forced them to come forth of their town, howbeit they feared to betoo bold, and to go far forward : and encamped themselves a mile and lesse from the town; N repoling their fafety and fecurity innothing elfe, but in the dangerous and hard passage, the waies all about being rough, ragged, and stony, in some places straight and narrow, in other up bill and fteep, Camillus baving tak en a prisoner out of the fields, and being guided by his direction, late in the night dislodged his camp, and betimes in the morning at break of the day, shewed himfelf upon the higher rounds a good deal; The Romans on three fides, fell to fortifie by trenching and casting rampiers, whiles the rest of the army stood ready ranged for the battell. And whereas the enemies affaied to hinder the work, he discomfited them and put them to flight, whereupon the Falifei were so frighted, that as they fled amain in disaray, they passed beyond their own camp, which was neerer; and made as fall as they could to the town. Many were flain and many wounded, before that in this afright they could hit upon the gates. Their camp being taken, the booty thereof came into the Questors coffers, with the great gruding and anger of the fouldiers. Howbeit yeelding to the feverity of discipline and good government : the fame virtue which they had hated before, they now honoured and held in admiration. After this was the city belieged, and igonces and platforms raifed about it. Otherwhiles also, as occasion was offered, the townsmen would fally forth and affaile the Romans camp, and make light skirmilhes. Thus the time passed without any great good hope of either side : for that they within the town belieged, had of their former provision more store of corn & other necessaries than they that lay at flege without. And it feemeth they would have had as long a peece of workethere, as they had at Very had not fortune yeelded to the Romans General both a trib of his approved vertue

It was the manner among the Falifcians, to entertain for the government of their Children, one that should teach and instruct them in school, and withall bear them company wherestever they went and many children together (as the guille continued full even to this day in Greece) were committed to the charge and tuttion of one man. As for the Nobles and principall mens tons of this City (asit is usually every where elfe) a precial man had the teaching of them, such an one, as was thought most learned and the greatest clerk of all other. This man, having in time of peace begun to bring the children forth before the town fide, to dappit and exercise themselves, gave not over his wonted manner now in time of war. And using till to train them abroad one while neerer, an other whiles further off from the gate ; if felf out fo, that one day what with paflime, and what with pleasant talk and difcouries by drewthem further then he accollonged and time, and what with pleasant rais and discourses are arew usen instinct then peractitioned; and feeing his time, went for ward as far as the chemiles copy de gard, and to forth only ill se had brought them within the compate of the camp, and events to camiful in its paying. Where to his wicked intended act, he added afto a more graceledle peech; saying to That he yeelded * Fatery into the cont.

"Romans hands, in that he gave them those children to do with what they would, whole parents." "Romans hands, in that he gave them thole thildren to do with what they would, whole parents were the milers and commanders of the city. Which words when Camillas heard, thou comen not accommand to the commanders of the city. Which words when Camillas heard, thou comen not camillas to the capital like the felle. When as Camillar was returned after this conquelt of his enemies into the City, with much better commendation, than when as in triumph he rode in a chariot drawn with white hories through the city, as being now famous for his just dealing and faithfulnedles (exceedy the Senat was abashed for very reverence of the man, and could no longer bear, but without further delay to acquir him of the vow he made. This head ruler brought the Embalsadors into their logding, & entertained them courteoutly at the critis charges, walted them with the convoy of a fufficient fleet : accompanied them in person to Delphi, and from thence conducted them home again fafe to Rome. Whereupon by an act of the Senat, there was a contract made with p him of smity and mutual entertainment, and gifts beflowed upon him at the cities coft. The fame year there was doubtfull war with the Equians, fo it was uncertain both in the army and at Rome whether they had won or loft the victory. The Generals for the Romans, were of the Tribunes Military, C. Amplim, and Sp. Pofthumim. At the first they warred both together, but after, when the enemies were in fight discomfitted, it was agreed, that Aemil is thould keep Verrage with a garison, and Post humins wast the borders. Where, as he marched somewhat negligently, with his army out of order, as prefently after field won, the Æquians let upon him, and havine put him in fear chaled him to the hils next hand. The fright whereof came from thence to the other garrifon allo at Verrugo. Posthuming, after that he had retired his men into fafty I and affembled them together, and there in an Oration greatly blamed and cried out upon their fear and running away: and that they were discomfitted by a most datardly fugitive enemy : the whole hoft cried out with one voice, that they deserved to be told of it, and confessed that they had com: mitted a foul faultabut they themtelves would make amends therefore; and promifed that the enemies should carry it neither to heaven nor hell, nor joy long therewith. Requiring that he would conduct them prefently to the enmies camp (which in fight was pight upon a plain) protesting to refule no extremity of punishment, if they were not masters of it before night. He then commended them, and willed them to refresh their bodies, and to be ready at the reliefe of the fourth watch. Now lay the enemies likewise in the passage, to intercept the Romans, as they fled by night from the hill, even in the way which leadeth to Parrage. And before day they encountred together (but you must think the moon shone all night,) and saw how to fight, as well as by day K the noise being heard to Verrage, strake to great fear amongst them, thinking the camp of the Remans had been affailed, that for all Aemyline could do to hold them, and to beleech them to the contrary, they fled feattered unto Tufeulum. From whence the news cameto Reme, That Post humine was flain, and his army lost. But he riding about the host (after that in the morning betimes the day light shewed them that followed apace on every side, that there was no fear of ambushments and forlayings) charged them with their promises, and set them in such a heat. That the Equians could no longer abide their violence. Then flew they the enemics in the chale every one, and made havock of them as they fled, more like men that do things a in fury and rage then by plain valour. And prefently from the Tidings from Tufculum (which put the city in a vain& canfeless fright)there came from Posthamian letters, dight with lawrell ; importing news, that the L Romans had the victory, and the Equians the overthrow,

Because as yet the actions and suces aforesaid of the Tribuns of the Commons could come to no end but the Commons laboured to continue the Tribunethip in them that were the maintainers of the law preferred, and also the Nobles endeavoured to make those rulers again that had opposed themselves against the same law. But as the Commons in their own Election prevailed and had the better : fo the Nobles were revenged of them againe for this griefe they tooke. by an Act of the Senat, that Confuls (hated Magistrates of the Commons) should be created Thus after fifteen yeares were Confuls reelected, L. Lucrerius Flavus, Servins Sulpitim Camerinus

In the beginning of this year, when as the Tribunes of the Commons bestirred themselves stourly to go through with their law, for that none of their brotherhood was about to deny and nip the M same : and whiles the Confuls for that very caute relifted them as carneftly, and the whole city was here about smuled : the Equians won Vicelia, 2 Colony of the Romans, leated within their own country. Most part of the Coloners (because the town being by night betraied and won. veelding unto them free passage to escapeaway on the back side) fled fafe to Rome. So that fervice befell unto L. Lucretim the Conful; Who went with a power and vanquished the enemies in fight, and with victory returned to Rome to a greater conflict a good deal. Anims Virgining, and Quinius Pomponius, two Tribunes of the Commons the two years palt, were accused a for whose defence it was for the Credit of the Sonar, That the Nobles should agree and stick close together. For no man laid to their charge either dishonest behaviour in life, or corrupt carriage of themselves in their office, but only this, that to please and gratifie the Nobles, they had set themselves N against the Tribunes law. Howbeit the anger of the Commons went beyond the favour of the Senat, and (that which was a most shamefull precedent) they (guildeffe men) had fine set on their heads of * ten thousand pound of brasse coin; Whereat the Nobles took great displeasure. Camil-Camillus rebu- las openly blamed the Commons for this their wicked part : who now fetting themselves against keththe Com- "their own patrons, perceived not that by a perverse proceeding in judgement against their Tri-" bunes, they had lost their liberty of opposing themselves with their negative voice : and take that away once, and farewell all authority of the Tribunes for ever. For where as they hoped "that the Nobles would endure the unbridled and licentious liberty of that office, they were much " deceived : for if these hard courses of the Tribunes might not be restrained by help of the same "Tribunes, the Nobility would find fome other weapon to fight withall. He rebuked the O " Confuls alfo, for that they fuffered those Tribunes to faile of their protection and fafe conduct. " who had done and faid nothing but by the authority and warrant of the Senat. Camillus his fpeech in the Senat.

A try, for the temples of the gods, and the very foile wherein they wereborn. And as for his own felf privatly, if it were lawful for him amidst their civil troubles of his native country, to "think upon and respect his own proper glory, it were right honourable for him, to have the city " which he had won, peopled and reforted unto : and daily to behold and enjoy the memorable "monument of his own glory : to fee before his eies the very City, whereof the counterfeit was "born in the pomp of triumph : and that all men elic (bould tread in the fleps of his noble acts, "But he thought it a shamefull and abominable thing, that a City left and forfaken of the immor-"tall gods, should be inhabited : and that the people of Rome should dwel in captive foil, and to " make this exchange, to leave a naturall country which bath conquered, for it that hath been con-B " oneredWith these perswasions & exhortations were the chief rulers excited, the Nobles old and young, came in multitudes, (when as the law should be propounded) into the Hall. And as they were dispersed and sorted into Tribes, every one taking hold of those of his own tribe, began to befeech them even with tears, not to forfake that Country now, in the quarrell whereof they and their fathers had fought most valiantly and happily: shewing herewith ever and anon the Capitoll, the Temple of Vesta, and other Temples thereabout of the gods: that they should not therefore drive the people of Rome, as exiled and banished out of their native foil from their own home and houlegods, into their enemies City, nor bring the matter thus about, that it had been better that Veii had not been won, rather then Rome should be abandoned. Because their dealing was nothing but by way of praier and perswasion, and in their praiers much mention and naming of the gods, C the most part of them were touched in conscience : so as more Tribes nipped that one law forgoing forward, than gave their voices to approve it. Which victory was fo joyfull to the Nobles. that the morrow after, by the morion of the Coff.a decree was made, That among the Commons should be a division of seven acres for a man out of the Veientian lands: and not for householders only, but that confideration and reckoning should be had also in every house of all free born perfons: to the end, that they should be willing to breed up children to the like proof, and for the hope of like commodity. When the Commons by this bountifull gift and liberality, were well pacified and stilled, there was no stir at all to hinder the election of the Confuls. So there were created Confuls, Lu. Valerius Potitus, and M. Manlius, who afterwards was furnamed Capitolinus, These Consuls set out the great solemn games and places, which M. Furins, the Dictator bad D vowed in the Veientian war. In the same year the Temple of June Regina vowed by the same Dictator and in the same war, was dedicated. And it is reported, that the dedication thereof was celebrated with exceeding great refort and forward endeavour of the dames of Rome. War there was but not greatly to be poken of) Algidum with the Aquians, for that the enemies were in a maner discomfited before that they joyned battel. Valerius because he followed still and killed the enemies in chase, was allowed by decree to triumph at full: and Manliss, that he should enter into the city only Ovant, in petty triumph. The same year arose a new war with the Volicians: against whom by reason of a famine and pestilence that grew about Rome upon exceeding drought and hear, an army could not be led forth. For which cause the Volscinians puffed up with pride, iovning unto them the Salpenates, invaded first the country about Rome. Whereupon war was p proclamed against both nations. C. Julius the Censor departed this life. In whose room M. Cornelia was substituted. Which after bredsome scruple of Religion, for that Rome in that five years space was taken. So that never after that is there any Censor chosen into the place of the deceased; And the Confuls also being fick and thereby disabled to govern; it was thought good to take new counsell & advice of anspices or tokens of birds, by an Interreign. When as therfore by an act of the Senat, the Confuls had refigned their office, M. Faring Camillan was created Interregent. Who named after him P. Cornelius Scipio : and he afterwards Lu. Valerius Potitus to be Interrex. By whom were made fix Tribunes Military with Confuls authority : that in case any of them should be fick and craffe, yet the Common-wealth should have governours enough. The first day of July entred they into their office : namely, L. Lucretius, Servius Sulpitius, M. Aemylius, Lu. Furi-F as Medullinas the feventh time, Agrippa Furius, C. Aemylius the second time, Of thefe L. Lucresins and C. Aemylius had in commission to go against the Volscians : but Agrippa Furius, and Serwith Sulpitian against the Salpinates. And fift were the Volicians fought withall. A great war in respect of the number of enemies , but for the conflict and battell, nothing fierce and sharp. For their stripy at the first encounter was put to flight, and eight thousand souldiers were by the Roman horfemen environed, whereupon they threw their weapons away and yeelded. The tidings of this war caused the Salpenates nor to adventure upon fight but they kept themselves armed within the wals, and flood upon their gaurd. The Romans then all abroad drave booties both ont of the Salpinats Country; and the Vollcians, and no man withflood their violence: so long nutill the Volicians wearled with war, and truce granted unto them for twenty years, upon this con-G dition, to make restitution again to the Romans of their goods, and to pay the fouldiers for that year their wages. The fame year one M.Caditius a commoner, gave notice to the Tribunes that in the newCaufey, where now there standeth a Chappel above the Temple of Vesta, there was in the still time of the night a voice heard, londer than any mans, willing that the governours might have intelligence, that the Gauls were coming. This, by reason of the balenesse of the author (as commonly it is seen) was not credited : befides, they were a nation far remote, and therefore lefs known and of finall accompt. Thus were not only the advertisements of the gods despised, when as their fatal time of de-

And when he had founded their minds, and received this answer from them, That they would defray and lay down so much, as he should be condemned in : but as to acquit him, that they could not possibly. Hereupon he departed in ex-M. Furius Ca- ile: praying to the immortall gods, that as he was guiltleffe and wrongfully dealt withall, so they would with all speed, cause that unthankful City to stand in need, and to have a misse of him. In his ablence condemned he was in * fifteen thouland pounds of braffe coine. When this citizen was I thus expulsed, who if he had tarried stil, (so far as we may make reckoning of any earthly security) Rome could never have been won: behold, embassadors came come from the Clusines, request-ftruction was toward: but also the help of man (which refted only in Faring Camillas) they rid H

ing aid against the Gaules. This nation (as it is reported) allured with the sweetnesse of corn and wine especially (dainty chaffer and a new delight in those daies) passed over the Alps, and possessed those countries which had been aforetime by the Tuicans inhabited. The voice goeth, that there was one Arans a Clufine, who had brought wine into Gaul, to entile that people withall, upon an anger and difpleasure that his wife had been defloured by one Lucumo (whose guardian Aruns himselfe had been) a young gentleman of great might and power, and whom Arans could not chaftile and bridle, without affiftance of forrein forces: This man was the Gauls guide in paffing over the Alps. w and the principal instrument to tet them awork for to assault Clusium. I would not for my part deny, but that the French were brought to Cinfium by Aruns or some other Clusine : but molt cettain it is, that they who affaulted Clufium, were not the first that passed the Alps. For the Gauls two hundred years before they affaulted Clusium and won the City of Rome, came over into Itali. Neither fought the Gauls first with this nation of the Tuscans, but long afore, and that oftentimes. with those that dwell between Apenninus and the Alps. For, the Tuicans had all soveraign command, both by land and fea, before the Roman Empire was erected. The names of upper and nether fes, wherewith Italy is compafied about, as it were an Island, may be a sufficient proof how great and puissant they were a seeing, that the one is by the generali name of the Nation, called of Italians, the Tulcan lea: & the other the Adriatick, of a town of colony or the Tulcans called Adria. T.

The Greeks do call the felf fame feas that (a) Tyrrbene and the Adriaticke feas. These Tuscans bending to both leas, inhabited those countries, consisting of twelve Cities: having sent before on people could not well be governed. This man being of great age, and defirous now to diffurthen his Realm of that peltering multitude, declared that he would fend Bellovefus and Sieovefus his filters fons (two forward young men) to feek adventures, into what lands foever the gods and goddeffes should by their token direct them ; giving them commission to gather what number of menthey would, to the end that no nation might withfrand their coming. So it fell to Sigevefas lot, for to enter the forrest and woodland country of Hercinia. Bellovefus his fortune was a good deal better, to take his way (by the gods guidance) unto Italy : and he leivied of the Bitn- N riges (e) Averni (f) Senones (g) Heani (h) Ambarri (i) Carnutes and (k) Aulerci, those that might be spared out of those Countries : and setting forward with a mighty power of sootmen & horimen, came unto the (i) Tricastides, Now stood the Alps full against them in their way, which I marvel not were thought & insuperable impassable, as having not as yet any way made overthem, (fo far as any constant record maketh date) unlesse we list to believe the tales of Herenies. Now I Entrecasteaux, when as the Gauls there, were hemmed in as it were on every side with those high montains, and that they looked every way about them, how they might get over those high hils reaching up to the heavens, and to patte (as one would fay) into an other world; they were staied there and went no further, upon icruple of confcience, for that it was reported, that certain ftrangers feeking land to inhabite, were by the people of (m) Sallies fet upon and affailed. These strangers were the (") in Ot Masseilles Massellans, who sailed from Phocis. This the Gauls supposing to be a fortunate presage of their succeffe helped them forward, and took part with them : to as what place first they gat after they were landed, they fortified within the wide or broad forrefts. They themselves passed through the Country of (a) Taurini, and over the straights of the Alps, called (p) Julia : and having vanquished the Tulcans in fight not far from the river (q) Ticinus, hearing that the Country wherin they abode and fetled, was called Infubrium (after the name of a territory and thire of the Heduans) they following and imbracing the lucky name of that place, fo conformable to the other of their own,

This a Austrice B nation I find to have come to (c) Cluftum, and afterwards from thence to Rome; marry, it is not b Ledice, certaine whether this nation alone came, or that they were aided by all the Gauls, that dwelt on cobings.

The Classines terrified with this new war, advising well both their number and the unaccustomed looks, and visages of the men, which they had not feen afore, and the strange armour withall: & hearing befides that the legion of the Tuscans both on this fide the Po and beyond, had been oftentimes by them discomfitted: Albeit in the Romans they had no interest at all in regard of any league or amity, only this, that they had not maintained their kinsfok the Veientes against the Romans, fent their Embalfadors to Rome, to crave aid of the Senat. Aid they obtained none . Embaffadors there were sent three, the sonnes of M. Fabins Ambuffus, who in the name of the Senat and people of Rome should treat with the Gauls and perswade with them, not to set upon the con-"federats and friends of the people of Rome namely, such as at whose hands they had received no wrong : laying moreover, that if they would put the Romans to it, The Romans were to defend "Gauls by war, howbeit they thought it better, if it might be, to have no wats at all : but that the them a new-come nation should grow into knowledge and accquaintance, rather by peacethan " by war. The embassage was mild and midest enough, but the Embassadors themselves were over fierce & balty, and more like Gauls than Romans; Who having done their message in the assem. The answer of bly of the Gauls, were thus again answered. Although the name of the Romans was but of late, the Gaultrothe "heard of, yet they, yet they were perswaded that they were hardy men, at whose hands the Embassadors Clufines in their fear, fought and requelted fuccour. And whereas they choose rather to defend of Rome. n their allies by way of embalsage, than by open war, they likewife neither distanted nor reful d peace "which they offered : If the Clasines would grant the Gauls (which wanted ground to inhabit)

" a part of their marches, whereof they held in polseffion more than they did well people and ac-"cupy : Otherwise, no peace would be had. And hereof would they have an answer whiles the "Romans were in place: and if they were denied ground, they would also fight even before the "Romansface, that they might make report at home, how much the Gauls went beyond other "men in valour &chivairy. And when as the Romans demanded again what right they had to require ground of the owners or to threaten war? For what interreft or title had the Gauls in Title can ve They again (toutly made answer; that they carried their right in their swords point and that valiant men were Lords of all the world. So they were on both lides to let on the that they ran to their weapons & skirmilh'd with the Tolcans, Then againly all law of partions (a thing that halfned the destruction of the Roman City)the Embassadones took arms. Neither could this be so secret but it was known; For even before the enfignes of the Tuteans, there were ten three most noble & valiant knights of the Romans for to fight to far exceeded the valour of those strangers above all the Clustines. Moreover and besides, Quintus Fabrus riding out of the battell on borteback charged his lance upon the captain of the Gauls, as he fiercely assailed the entignes and battel of the Turkent. ran him through and the him: and as he rifled and differmed him, the Gauls rook inowledge of him, and throughout the whole hoft notice was given, that it was an Embalandon of the Romans, So. leaving their quarrell aganft the Clufines, they founded the retreat, and threatned the Romans There were of them, that thought good prefently to advance for ward to Rome; But the elder, for prevailed, that there thould be tent Embatsadors, first to complain of the injuries, and to require that for the law of arms broken, the Fabit should be yeelded thin them. Ho wheir has be triends and privat respects, would not permit to make an act of that, in personages of so great mark and nobility, which they deemed meet and requifit. Therefore to the end it might not be imputed to them & they blamed, if peradventure any toil or overthrow thould hap unto them, by was ring with the Gauls : they referred the hearing and difculling of the Gauls demands unto the people. Where might and favour fo much prevailed, that even they who were in question to be putting thed, were created for they ear following Tritunes Military in Confais authority. At which the C Gauls being offended (as good capit they mad with open threats and menaces of war returned a gain to their company. There were with the three Fabig P. Sulpitim, Longas, Quinta Serviting, the tourth time, and P. Servilius Malaginenfli. When as now to great sanger, was to wards and neer at hand fee how fortune blinded mens eles, when as the will have her tway and not be hindred) that City which against the Fideriat & Vetent enemy & other nations bordering therbystried the utmolt help, and oftentimes made a Dictator now being threatned with a trange enemy never heard of before, coming to war upon them from the Ocean ica, & the farthest parts of the world lought neither for governor nor help more then ordinary. Even thole Tribuns by whole rails dealing that war was first caused, had the managing of all and made no more choise, nor mustring of foundiers than untilly had been in common wars; making but a light matter of it and of no confequence, & fetting little by, and elevating the immon of the war. The Gauls in the mean time (having heard, how on let purpose those breakers of human law were soon advanced to honour, & how their embaffage was deluded and dallied with, all on fire, as they are a nation that way impatient and in anger outragious) pluckt up their flandards forthwith and marched with all expedition on their voisce. At whose notic and hurlibutly (as they passed by in such hast) when as the towns thereby were put in fear, and ran to their weapons, and the country pealants fled away : they with open mouth gave out and fignified, that they went to Rome. All the way as they jorunied, what with horse and men, both in length and breadth, they took up a mighty room in their march. But I what with the fame that went before, and the meffengers of the Clufines and of other people that followed one at the heels of another, this speedy coming of the enemies brought right great fear and terrour to Rome. For notwithstanding, that they went with a power of men in all hast suddenly mustered, hardly met they them at eleven miles end, where as the river Allia running down from the bils of Crustuminum, with a very deep channell (not much beneath the highway) dischargeth it felf into the Tyber. And now by this time the whole country before them, and all the coalts about were overforced with the enemies. And (as they are a nation naturally given to vain tumults and therein born and bred) with an hideous and diffonant kind of finging (like a black Santus) they filled also about with a fearfull and horrible noise. There the Tribunes Military without getting aforehand a convenient place to pitch their tents in, without fortifying the same with any trench K or rampiers, whereunto they might fafely betake themselves, even without any regard of God, whom at leaftwife they should have been mindfull of, it they had forgotten man, without Auspices and bird-tokens, without reconciliation to God by facrifice, full unhappily and in an ill hour, ranged their battels divided into wings for fear of being compall'd with multitude of enemies. Yet might not the vanguard answer the breadth of the enemics, not withstanding they made their ranks and files to thin, that the middle ward of the battell was weak, & feant joyning clote together. On the right hand there was a little higher ground, where they thought to beltow men for impply, which as it gave the first occasion of fear and running away, so was it the only safety of them that fled. For Bremmet the Duke or Prince of the Gauls, tearing exceedingly in that (mall number of the Romans, some stratagem, and supposing that the higher ground was for this purpose kept, I That when the Gauls should have encountred with the forefront of the legions, then the rescues would charge them both upon their backs and their flanks, diplated and advanced his flandards againly those in release; nothing, doubting but it he had once driven them from their hold upon higher ground, on the plain he bould loon have the victory, confidering that in number he overwent them. See how the Barbarians had not only linek, but policy allo on their fides ! Contrariwile, the Romans in their camp, were nothing like themselves, either for captains or souldiers. Their minds were to postessed with fear and thinking of running away, and to forgetfull besides, that the greater part of them choic rather toffie to Keis, (their enemies City) although the Tyber were full in their way, then to take the threight courle to Rome, to their wives and children. For while, the savantage of the ground defended those that were for rescue . but in the rest of the M from behind, before any ftroke ftrucken, and before they were once touched, they fled from their withown enemie, in a manner before they law him And to far off they were from trying fight, and own entente. In a manner before they faw him, And to far off they were from trying fight, that fifey an well of them not for mich as with a councer thou again. So, as there were not any flain in the source that they were third beholds their backs, even by occasion of their own felves, who will their harding hindred one another intheir flight. About the bank of Tybn, whereunto the whole left wing was ited do wit, and find flaing away their weapons, there was a great flainghers. For many of them the could not you, and wetsweak by reason of their weighty corfeters and other hardels, were downed and in allowed up of the urging whirlpools. Howbein, the most part district a to fin. From y whats they same to know, not only on discount to guard the City, N but not to much as a melenger, to bump nows of this their overshow. But from the right will not to much as the gates of the City that they all find into the Callle, The very Gauls themselves allowed to the owner of the control of the not what had happed, and wift not what to make of it. Atterwards they feared some ambush, and at length fell to gathering the ipoils of them that were flain, and to lay all their armor and harneffer upon mans, as their maner is. At lall, feeing no chemy nor thew of bottlifty, they put themselves in their journy forward, into people finitering, and coached to the City of Rame. Where, upon worth brought by the foreriders that the gates were not that; nor any ward kept afore the gates, nor armed men upon the wais, they flood in the like appage as before, upon to ftrange and wondrous a thing. But fearing the night and the istuation of a City anknown, they let them down, and refted between Rome and Anie, having lent their ciptals and icouts about the wals and gates, to understand what their enemies meant to doe in so desperat a state, The Romans, for that a greater part had taken their way to Vet, then to Rene, and weening that there was none left alive, but those that were fled back to Reme , bewailing and bidding adue, both to those that were deand those alive, let the whole City almost a weeping and lamenting. But afterwards the publick fear although them, and took all fenie away of their privat forrows, when they heard

A once that theenemies were come. And within a while, as these barbarous people coasted and ranged about the walls by troups, they might hear their yelling, their houting, and uncouth, confused hideous cries. So were they held all the time in suspence of mind, untill the second day after: one while thinking, that at their first coming they would have imprised the City, for unless they had so meant, they would have tarried (they thought) at Allia still again, a little before sun-setting (because the day was well-nigh done) they supposed they would enter upon them before night. But anon they feared that they deferred this enterprise untill night was come, to the end they might ftrike a greater fear & terror amongst them (And last of all the day light approaching, altonied them cleans fo as they were in a continual agony, even until the milchief came indeed which they follong R doubted & that now the bloudy banners of their enemies were displaied before their gate. Howbeit neither that night nor the day following, was the City in the like fear, as when they fled so fearfully at * Allia, For being past hope that the City could be defended with so small power as re- cominate vol mained, they determined that with their wives & children, all their serviceable youth, such as were Rio de Alosso. meet to bear arms, yea, and the more able men, and strength of the Senat should retire themselves Liando. into the Castle & Capitol: and after they had thither brought their armor and corn from thence as from a defentible place to protect their gods, their men, and the Roman name: to fave from fire and sword (fofar as they could) the Flamin of Jupiter, the vestal Nuns, and facred images, and holy reliques of the City and not to abandon the worship and due solemnity unto them, to long as any were left alive, to do them honour and worship. For thus they conceived, That if the Castle & C1-Cpitol, being the feat of their gods, if the Senat, which is the head & chief of their publike counsel, if the hardy and fighting yong men remained after that imminent ruin and fall of the City, the less would be the loss of the aged tolk, a number, (God wor) left behind of purpose in the City, no otherwiselike but to perish. And to the end that the multitude of the common fort might bear this more patiently, the elders that had triumphed aforetime, and been Confuls, openly gave out and faid, That they would live and dietogether with them, Neither would they with those bodies of theirs which were unmeet to bear armour, and to defend the City, furtharge and peffer the company of able and armed men, in this their penury & want of victuals. /These and such like were the confolations and comforts of the ancients among themselves now resolute to end their lives. After which, they turned their exhortations to the companies of the young and lufty men, whom n they followed into the Castle and Capitol, recommending unto their manhood and to their wouthful courage, all the estate remaining of that City, which for the space of three hundred and threescore years, had in all their wars been victorious, and gotten great conquests. Now when they, in whom rested all hope and help were departed, and had taken their leave of them, that refolved fully not to furvive the winning and destruction of their City: as the very thing in it felf, and the fight thereof was a lamentable and woful spectacle unto them, so the pitious weeping of women, and their uncertain running up and down, following now after one, and now after another and asking their husbands and children, to what end, to what fatal deftiny they betook them, was as dolorous a pageant, as could happen to any earthly creature. Nevertheleis, a greatfort of them accompanied their friends into the Castle, and no man either bad or sorbad them. For al-E though it was good and commodious for the befieged, namely, to diminish the number, and discharge themselves of the feeble multitude, yet it seemed unto them an inhuman and unkind part. The rest of the common people especially, whom so small an hill was not able to receive, and could not possibly be kept in so great searcity of corn & victuals, departed by heaps out of the City: and marching as it were in one company together in a row took their way to Janiculum, From thence they divided themselves fundry wates, Some slipt into the fields and country some to the next Cities there bordering, without any Captain, without any common confent every one following his own hope, his own head and wit now that all publike counsel was in despair, and past remedy. In this mean while, the Flamin of Quivinus, and the religious Vestal virgins leaving the regard of their own private affairs, confulted with themselves what sacred Images to carry with them, and F (seeing their strength would not serve to rid away and save all) what to leave behind them, and what place was meetest to bestow and lay them up most safely. They agreed at length and thought it best, to put them in small barrels or rundlets, & within the ground to bury them in a little chappell, standing next to the Flamins house: which place for very devotion unto this day, may not for any thing be spit upon. All the rest they parted amongst themselves. And every one carrying her own burden, took the way, which over the wooden bridge leadeth to Jarical am. Upon the alcent or rife of that hill, when L. Albinus (a Commoner of Rome) faw them going as he among other company (which unmeet for war, departed out of the City) carried his wife & children in a wain: he making even then in that hard calamity, a difference yet between divine and humane things, and thinking it an impious part, and void of all religion, that the publike Priests with the facred G Images of the people of Rome should go on foot, whiles he and his were seen riding at ease in a wagon, caused his wise and children to alight and come forth, and set the Nuns with their holy Images in their room, and brought them to Care, to which place they minded to go. All things now being !et at Rome (as in such a time could be) in order sufficiently, for the defence of the Ca-file; the aged persons abovesaid being returned to their houses, waited for the comming of the enemy, with hearts prepared and resolved to die. Such of them as had born offices of the chair, to the intent, that they might end their daies in the ornaments & robes of their former efface and poling that the higher they weregot up, so much the easilier they might be beaten down, And being come up to the midth of the cliff, there they staied: and thence from the higher ground, which honour, and according to their vertue and deferts: in their most stately garments and habiliments, H which they wear when they carried their facred chariots upon festival daies, or wherein they rode in triumph, now far upon their ivory chairs in the very midst and entry of their houses. There be that write, how they willingly devoted and bequeathed themselves to die for their Country and Citizens of Rome: and that M. Fabius the High Priest read and pronounced unto them a certain hymn and preicript form of prayer to that purpose. The Gauls, both for that now they had rested from fight a whole night, and to their choler was somewhat cooled, and also because they had not in any place fought a bloudy and dangerous battell with them, nor even at that time won the City by any affault or force, entred the morrow after into the City, without anger and heat of furious rage by the gate Collina, standing wide open, and so passed forward to the common place of affemblies, casting their eyes about them towards the Temples of the gods, and to the castle, which only presented some shew of war. And there leaving a sufficient guard, lest haply from the Castle and Capitol they mould be violently affaulted, after they were once alunder parted, they fell to raniack and rifle and meeting none at all in the void fireets, fome rufh by heaps into the houses next hand, others go to those that were furthest off, supposing them at least wife to be untouched, full of riches, and fit for to fill their hands. From thence again (as frighted by reason of such desolation, and fearing left haply any fraud of the enemy might entrap them as they wandred one from another) they returned round in a ring together, into the market place, and the places near therto. Where, when they faw the Commoners houses fast shutto & locked, and contrariwise the stately palaces of the Noblemen and chief Senators standing wide open, they were at a stand, and doubted more in a manner to enter upon the open places than the shut. And they beheld as it were with capping and crouching after a reverend manner, certain ancient personages sitting in the porches and entries of their houses, who besides their ornaments and apparel, above the ordinary cflate of men, for a certain majesty which they carried in their countenance and gravity of visage. relembled the gods. And when as they turned to them, & flood looking upon them, as if they had been Idols and facred Images, M. Papyrius, one of them, when a Gaul began to stroke his beard (which then they used all to wearlong) with his ivorystaffe (as they say) gave him arap on the pate, and moved his patience. Whereupon he was the first that was murdered and so the rest were all killed as they fat in their chairs of state. After this massacre of these honourable personages of the Nobility, they fell upon all the reft, and spared no creature : they ransacked their houses, and I. when they were empty, let fire on them. But whether it were that they were not all of them defirous to destroy the City utterly, or that it was the mind of the Leaders and chief of the Gauls, that for a terrour there should be seen some scarefires (if haply for the love of their houses, they that were besieged, might be induced to yield themselves:) or that all their houses were not burned at once, to the end that the remainder of the City might be as a pawn and pledge to mollifie their enemies, and make their hearts to relent; howfoever, I say it was, the fire for the first day (as usually in Cities forced and won) spread not all abroad every where, to make a generall havock. The Romans from the Castle, seeing the City sull of enemies, and in every street running up and down, and in all places fresh calamities and miteries one in the neck of another, were not able to conceive the same in mind and spirit, no, nor so much as to have the right use M of their ears and eyes. For to what place soever the shouts and noise of the enemies, the howling and wailing of women and children, the noise of fire, and the rathing and cracking downfals of houses turned them aside in exceeding fear, thither they bent their minds, their faces, and eyes, as men by fortune let up aloft, as upon a stage or scaffold, to behold the fall and ruin of their Country: referved to fave nothing of all their wealth and substance, but only their own bodies: by thus much, more miterable and pitifull above all others that ever were belieged. in that being shut out from their native Country and City, they were besieged and beheld it, and all that they had in the enemies hands. Neither as ill as the day was ipent tollowed there a better night, Yea &when after this troublesome night the like morrow was come there was no time but ministred still some heavy objest: and one spectacle or other of new and fresh calamities. And N albeit they were loaden and over whelmed with so many mileries, yet they nothing at all let fall or abated their courages, but refolved still, not with standing they saw all fired, all ruinate and laid even with the ground, manfully to defend that poor naked little hill which they held, and was their only hope lest them to recover their freedom. And now seeing the same desolations daily happen they were so inured to misery, that past all sense and feeling of their own state and private fortune, they regarded nothing but their armour on their backs, and swords in their hands, as the only remnants and reliques of their hope 43 The Gauls likewise for certain daies, had made war with the poor houses only of the City, and all to no purpose: and when they perceived in all this burning and ruins of the City, to conquered, nothing now left but armed enemies, who were not, for all fo many calamities, one jot terrified, nor their minds once enclined to yeeld without fur-O therforceand violence were used; they determine to try the utmost, and to make an assault upon the fortress. So on the morrow morning very early at sound of trumpet, all the whole multitude of them arranged themselves in the market place. From whence with an out-cry and shout, under a fence of targets over their heads, they approach the Castle, Against whom the Romans behaved themselves, neither unadvisedly, nor fearully, flrengthning their wards and quarters, with a good Corps de guardagainst all Advenues: and whereas they saw the banners displayed, of it self in manner bare out against the enemy, with all their force they charged upon the Gauls, overturned them, and fent them down headlong: so as never after that, e ther any part of them, or all together would attempt that kind of service. Being therefore past hope to get up by force and arms, they make preparation for long fiege: whereof untill that time they had no mind; both for that the corn which was within they had confumed in burning of the City, and in the mean space, that which was in the country about, was carried and brought to Veii. Whereupon they divided B their Army, purposing with one part thereof, to forrage and drive booties all about the nations thereby adjoyning, and with the other to invest the Castle: to the end, that the forragers abroad might bring in corn to serve them that lay at the siege. Now as those Gauls departed from the City, it was their hap and fortune to come to Ardea (where Camillus abode in exile) there to make triall of the Romans valour. This Camillus being more pensive in the behalf of the publike calamity, than carefull of his own : spending his spirits and wasting his body with crying out upon gods and men: thus fretting and chafing with himfelf, and wondring what was become of those valiant and hardy men, who under his conduct won Veii and Falerii, and who had fought other wars more valiantly alwaies than fortunately: of a sudden he heard that the Army of the Gauls approached, and that the Ardeates in great fear, fell to consultation thereabout what to do: and even as if he had been inspired from God above, he put himself forward and entred into the midst of the people assembled, who heretofore, had abstained and forborn such publike meetings and confulcations. And thus belaid: "You my Mafters of Ardea, mine old friends fometime, The Oration. "and now my new neighbours and fellow-Citizens, for to it is fallen out by your kindness & de- of camillus in ce ferts, and by mine own fortune and condition: let no man think, that I, forgetfull of mine own the file mbly effate am come forth hither into this audience. And when shall I ever be thankful unto you for your favours and demerits if now I stand "fill and do nothing? Or where shall I ever stand you in stead, if not in war? By my skill herein, "I flourished in my Country, and being in war invincible, was in peace by unthankfull neigh-" bours and unkind Citizens banished. And now have ye good occasion offered, and opportu-"nity (O ye Ardeates) both to make recompence, for those so great pleasures and curtesses in "times past received of the people of Rome, as your selves do well remember, (and therefore be "it spoken without upbraiding and reproaching of any mindfull persons) and also to win great "honour of war, unto this City, by defeating a common enemy unto both. This nation, which "thus cometh towards us with a diffolute and difordered army, are those to whom God and na-

And now upon their good suc-"cels, are they more fecure and retchless, than they were wont to be. There was not one there, howfoever affected he was, friend or foe to Camillus, but was perswaded that the like warrior was not in those daies to befound again. The assembly being broken up, they refresh their bodies, ready to fight so soon as ever the Signall should be propounded. Which being put forth, in the beginning and first watch of the night, they were ready with Camillus at the gates. And gone they were not far from the town, but they found (as it was foretold them) the Gauls camp without Corps de fund, neglected on every side: and it with a mighty cry they asfail. There was in no place fight, but killing every where: and their naked bodies (as they lay fast asleep) were hacked and out in pieces. Howbeit, some of those that were furthest off, being scared one of their conches not knowing what violence or from whence it was, took to their heels and fled: other-some slumbled at una-G wares upon the very enemy. A great part of them being come into the territory of Arden, were by the townsmen who sallied out upon them as they were dispersed, environed and slain. The like flaughter to this there was of the Tuscans in the Country of Veii: who had so little pity and compassion, to see a City which well near for four hundred years space bordering upon them, was now surprised by a strangeenemy not heard of afore, that even at that very timethey made rodes into the Territory of Rome, and laden with booty from thence, purposed to assail even Voir also and the garrison, being the only place and means of rescue, and the last hope of the Roman name.

The Roman fouldiers that lay in garrison there, had espied these Tuscans ranging about the coun-H try and gathered together in a body to drive booties afore them: and withali they descried their Camp pitched not far from Veii. Where, at first they pitted their own estate, but after, they fell into an indignation and anger that the Tuscans also from whom they had diverted the Gauls war upon themselves, should in their calamities thus form them and have them in derision: so as they could scarcely temper themselves and forbear, but presently set upon them. But being staied perforce by Captain Ceditins, a Centurion whom they themselves had made their Ruler, they put off this exploit untill night; Only their Commander and Leader was not to be compared with Camillus: else all the service was atchieved in the same order, and with as good speed and happy fuccess. Over and besides, by the guidance and direction of those prisoners which remained unilain I over-night, they went forward as far as Salina, to another power of the Tuscans, and in the night following, upon a judden they made a greater havock and flaughter of them, and so in joyous manner with double conquest they return to Veii. At Rome in this mean time, the fiege for the most part was but cold and slack, and all quiet on both sides: whiles the Gauls regarded and looked to this only, That none of their enemies should make an escape through their guards. At what time a certain valiant yong Roman behaved himfelf fo, as his own countrimen and enemies too had him in great admiration. There was a fet facrifice or folemnity to be celebrated by the house and linage of Fabii, in the Mount Quirinalis, For the accomplishment whereof, Caius Fabius Dorliso in his holy robes, after the Gabins fashion, bearing in his hand the holy complements thereto belonging, came down from the Capitol, paffed through the midth of the enemies corps de K quard, and nothing moved whatfoever was done or faid to terrifie him, went on forth right to the mount Quirinal. And when he had there performed and dispatched all solemnities returning the fame way with like conftant countenance and comly pace, hoping affuredly, that the gods would be mercifull and gracious unto him, whose worship he had not left undone for any sear of death: he retired again to his company into the Capitol: whether it were that the Gauls were aftonied at his wondrous boldness, or rather were touched in conscience with a reverent regard of Religion, wherein that nation is very zealous and devout. At Veii in the mean while they gathered not only heart every day more than other, but strength and forces also; for that not only Romans this ther repaired out of the country, such as either in discomfiture of the battell, or for the calamity of the City now taken, had been scattered: but also out of Latium divers of their own accord L had flocked thisher, to have their share in the pillage. Now they thought it high time to return to their country again, and to deliver it out of the enemies hands. The body was strong enough, but without an head it was. The very place put them in mind of Camillus, and a great part of the fouldiers were such as had atchieved prosperous exploits under his leading and conduct. And Coditius gave out plainly, that no god or man should make him give over his government, but would himselt as mindfull of his own place, call tor a General. So by general consent it was agreed, that Camillus should be sens or from Ardea, but with the advice before of the Senat which was at Rome. So modelt were they in all their carriage, and so precisely observed they (even in their desperate case) the due respect and regard of every action. Now to pass through the wards of their enemies, was an hard and dangerous adventure. To this exploit therefore, Pontius Comini- M ture of Pontius 25,2 valorous young man, promised his service. Who bearing himself upon a bark or corke under him, hulled along the Tyber down the water to the City; and so the next way from the strand, over a freep cliff (which was negligently or not at all guarded by the enemy) he paffeth through the Capitoll, and being brought to the Magistrates, declareth there his message from the Army. When he had received the Senates decree to this effect: Imprimis, That Camillus should be called back again out of exile by a Ward-leet, or the suffrages of the Curia: Item, that by the voices of the people he should be created Dictator out of hand: and that the souldiers might have for their Generall whom they defired: the messenger returned the same way back again to Veii, And Emcamillus chobassadours were sent to Camillus at Ardea, who conducted him to Veis, But I would rather be eeve fen Dictator. that he departed not from Ardea, before he had certain intelligence of the Act of the Senate, N And for that neither without the will of the people, he might change the place whereto he was confined, nor unless he were named Dictator, have the conduct of the Army; there passed an Act of all the Wards, and Dictator was he declared in his absence. Whiles these things were a doing at Veii, the Castle of Rome and the Capitoll was in very great danger. For the Gauls, either having found out a mans footing, that way as the messenger went from Veii, or espied at the clift of Carmentis, an easie place to climb up: in a clear night sent a man before unarmed to assay the passage, & then gave him up his armour, and where it was steep, one helped lifted up, and drew up another, as the difficulty of the place required. So as they got up to the top with such filence, that not only the Sentinels were not aware of them, but also the dogs (a watchfull creature at every noise in the night) were not once awakened therewith. But they could not so escape the geese, O which were confectated unto Jano, and for all the scarcity of victuals, were spared and not killed up. And this it was that faved them all. For with their gagling and fluttering of their wings. M. Manline who three years before had been Conful, a right hardy and noble warrior, was awaked. Who taking weapon in hand, speedily went forth and raised the rest withall to take arms. And whiles all else made hast in a great fright, he stroke the Gaul who now stood upon the top, with the bofs and pike of his buckler, and turned him down. The fall of whom overturned them that

A were next. Then flew he others, (whiles they were in fear) who had laid their weapons out of hand, and took hold of the stones whereto they clinged close. By which time the rest being come together, some flinging datts, others casting down itones, tumbled their enemies back, and the whole power of them lost their sure footing and fell down headlong. This tumult being appealed the rest of the night (so far forth as men might with troubled minds, seeing that even the danger, past disquieted them)they gave themselves to sleep, When day was come the fouldiers by found of Trumpet were summoned to assemble before their Tribunes, and considering there was reward due both to well-doing and mif-doing: Manlius first for his valour was commended and rewarded not only by the Tribunes military, but also by consent of all the souldiers. Upon whom, B they among them all, bestowed and brought home to his houle (which stood upon the Castle hill) wheat-meal by the half-pints, and wine by the quarts. A matter of small reckoning to be spoken of : but in that scarcity this might be an argument of their love and affection, when every man beguiled his own belly, pluckt from himself and the necessities of his life, and conferred the same to the honour and recompence of that one man. Then were summoned to appear the sentinels of that place where the enemy climed up undescried. And when as P. Sulpitius a Tribune Military, had pronounced that he would exercise martial law upon them all the touldiers cried out with open mouth, and laid all the fault on one watchman: and io for fear of a muting he spared all the rest: and with their generall consent and approbation, he caused that undoubted guilty perion to be thrown down from the rock, Whereupon they were more careful and circumfpect C in their watch, both amongst the Gauls (because it was commonly noised that there passed mesfengers to and fro between Veii and Rome: and also amongst the Romans, for the remembrance of the late danger by night. But above all other mileries that follow war and fiege, the famine was fore in both the Armies. The Gauls were plagued with petillence besides: for that they had pitched their tents in a place lying between two hils; exceeding hot by reason of the fires, and full of imoak, carrying both dust and ashes, when any wind was stirring: which be things that of all others, that nation cannot abide, as being used to wet and cold. Thus being smothered with heat, and therewith stifled and choaked again, they died with contagious diseases like rotten sheep. And now for idleness that they would not bury them severally one by one they laid the dead bodies on heaps one with another, and to burnt them: and made that place famous and nora table by the name of Buffa Gallica.i.e. Gaulbury. Hereupon, they grew to make some truce with Buffa Gallica.

the Romans, and emparied together by sufferance of the Generals. In which parlies, when as the Gauls very often alledged the famine, and upon that extremity perswaded them to yeeld: it is faid, that the Romans for to put them by that opinion of them, in many places from the Capitol fling out loaves of bread into the very stations and our state guard of the enemies. But at length neither could their hunger be dissembled, nor sustained any longer. Therefore, whiles the Dictator mustereth a power at Ardea by himself, he commandeth the Generall of horsemen, L. V. sterius, to have away the Army from Veii: and maketh io good preparation, and furnisheth himself io, as he might be able to match his enemies, and to charge upon them. In the mean feason, the army of the Capitol wearied out with watching and warding, having furmounted all humane miseries besides

E hunger, which only of all others, nature would not suffer to be overcome: looking day by day for succour from the Dictator now at last when not only their food, but their hope also failed them, and were grown to that weakness, that when they went to keep their guard, they could hardly bear the weight of their armour, they agreed and gave consent either to yield or to ransome themselves upon any condition, they cared not what, Whiles the Gauls also gave forth plainly, and faid, they might be entreated for a smal consideration to give over siege. Then the Senat went together, and gave Commission to the Tribunes Military, to bargain and go through with them, So by a parley or treaty had between P. Sulpitius Tribune Military, and Brennus the Duke of the Gauls, a conclusion was made, and that people, who within a short time should be Lords of the world, were valued and esteemed at a thousand pound weight of Gold. This in itself was † 46000 lib.

Fa most odious and shameful thing, but there was adjoyned thereunto a foul indignity. For English, the Gauls brought forth false weights and uneven ballances. And when the Tribune refused them, behold, the infolent and proud Gaul would needs have his sword weighed too for vantage, adding this speech moreover, (which was intolerable for the Romans to hear) Wee worth men conquered, and down with them ftill. Butneither God norman would abide the Romans to live ransomed. For by good hap, before that shameful sum of money by composition was paid, before (I lav) that upon some wrangling that fell between, all the Gold was weighed out, cometh the Dictator in the manner, and commandeth the gold to be had away, and the Gauls to void. And when as they made resistance and pleaded the capitulation and bargain, he again replieth, and faith, That the composition was not good, not ought to stand, which after he was made @ Dictator, had been by an inferiour Magistrate concluded, without his commandment & warrant a and with all warneth the Gauls to prepare themselves to fight commanding his own fouldiers to cast all their bag and baggage down on a heap, to put on their harness, to make ready their weapons, and by dint of feel, and not by weight of iword to redeem their Country, having in fight before their eyes the Churches of their gods, their wives and children, and the foil whereon the City flood (deformed now with mileries of war) and all things else which they ought by good reason to defend, recover, and be revenged for. Hereupon he marshalled his battell as the ground would give him leave, being the plot only of a City half ruinate and lying along, and with-Hall of it lelf naturally uneven. Forecasting and providing for all things with special choice and preparation to ferve his fouldiers turn, as far as martiall skill could possibly reach. The Gauls affrighted at this so firange an occurrent, betook them to their weapons, and in a furious sit of anger, father than with any considerate discretion, they ran upon the Romans, Now had Forture turned her wheel: now Gods help and mans policy affished the Romans. Therefore at the first encounter the Gauls were discomfited with as little difficulty, as they themselves had archieved the victory at Allia. Afterwards allo, in another more set battell in the way of Gabes, about eight miles from Rome (to which place they were fled) they were vanquished by the conduct and leading of the same Camillas. For there were they stain in every place, their Camp taken, and not I so much as one lest to bring news of their overthrow. The Dictator having thus delivered his Country out of the enemies hand, returneth again with triumph into the City. And in all the sports and pleasant ditties which the souldiers rudely after their manner devised, he was stilled Romulus the staher of the Country, the second sounder of the City, which were no vain titles of commendation.

When he had faved his Country thus in war, he preferved it afterwards again undoubtedly in time of peace, namely in gainfaying their transmigration to Veii: whiles both the Tribunes enforced that matter more earnestly, now after the burning of the City, and the Commons also of themselves were more enclined thereunto, than before. Which was one cause, that after his triumph he refigned not up his Dictatorship: being requested also by the Senat not to leave the City in lo K doubtful terms of perplexity. And first and formost (as he was evermore a most precise devout man and religious) he proposed those things which concerned the immortall gods: and causeth anact of the Senat to bemade. Imprimis, that all the Temples (for that the enemies had held and possessed them) should be repaired, bounded out new, and purged. Item, that the manner of cleaning them should be searched out of the books of Sybilla by the Duumvirs. Moreover that with the inhabitants of Care, there should be made a league of publike and mutual hospitality, for receiving the facred Images and Priests of the people of Rome: by the means and favour of which people, the honour and service of the immortal gods was not forelet and discontinued. Item, That there should be set out the Plaies called Capitolini, for that Jupiter Optimus Maximus had stil defended and preserved his own seat, and the Refuge of the people of Rome, in that fearful L time of trouble. And that M. Furius should ordain a guild, or fraternity out of those that dwelt in the hill of the Capitol, for the celebration of those plaies. Finally, to the end there should be also some satisfaction and expiation made of that night voice which being the fore-messenger and warning-giver of their destruction before the coming of the Gauls, was heard and yet neglected, a motion was made, that a Temple should be erected in the new Causey to Aius Locutius. The Gold which was recovered by force from the Gauls, as also that which out of other Temples in that fearful hurly-burly, was brought into the chancel or chappel of Jupiter, because they could not call to mind precifely into which Churches they were to carry it again accordingly, was all judged holy and lacred to Jupiter; and order taken, that it should be beltowed and laid up under his shrine. And how devout the City was, appeared before in this, That when there was not gold M enough in the common cheft, to make up the full fum of the ranfom that was agreed upon between them and the Gauls, they took that which the matrons and wives of Rome contributed. and all to spare and save the gold appointed to holy uses. The Matrons were therefore thanked, and this honour besides done unto them, That after their death they as well as their husbands, should be openly praised in a solemn funeral Oration. When those things were once accomplished which appertained to the Gods, and all that belonged to the Senate for to do: then and not afore, upon the firs that the Tribunes kept with the Commons continually, with their speeches in all their affemblies folliciting them to leave the ruins of the City, and to remove with all they had to Veii, a town readily furnished to their hand: then (I say) and not before, Camillus accompanied with the whole Senat, came up into the common place of audience, and there before the N people spake in this wife. So grievous to me, O Quirites, is all contention and variance with the "Tribunes of the Commons that while I lived at Ardea I found no other comfort and folace.in "that most heavy and woful banishment of mine but this, That I was far enough off from those "debates and jars. In regard whereof, I would never have come again, I affine you, but that you " called me back, both by act of Senat and also by approbation of the people. And it is not in me "any change of mind but your calamity and diffressed estate, that both forced me to return again "unto you. For this was the very point that you flood upon, namely, that our country might con-"tinue still and keep her ancient place: and not Iwis; that I should remain and dwell therein a-"gain. And even now verily, would I bestilland keep silence willingly, but that this quarrel also is in the behalf of myforelaid country: the which to fail (to long as life doth last) for others O ec might be a shamesulreproach, but for Camillus it were most impious &abominable, For to what "end have we returned to it again? To what purpose when it was besieged have we delivered it "out of the enemies hands, if when we have recovered it, we our felves abandon and leave the "fame? And when as the gods and men of Rome kept fill, and inhabited the Capitol and the ca-"file, notwithstanding the Gauls were Lords, and possessed of the whole City, is it possible that "both Castle and Capitol, after the City is regained, should be for laken and abandoned of the

The Oration of M. Furius Camillus to the people of Rome.

A" Roman vistors? And shal our prosperous hand over our enemies bring greater desolation to our "City, than adversity hath? Verily, if it were so, that we made no reckoning of that religion and di-"vine folemn service, instituted even with the foundation of our City: & that we counted all va-"nities that have been delivered unto us by tradition from our ancestors: yet so evident a power "of God hath affilted the Romans, that I must needs think, that men can now no longer neglect "the worthip of God. For confide with me I pray you, either the prosperity of the advertity of "these years late past, one after another; ye shall find, that as long as we served God and followed "his will so long we prospered & went forward: and all the while that we despited the same, we "ever went backward and fell to decay. And first and formost the Veient war (recount I befeech B "you how many years lasted it? how troublesome and painful was it? And ended it was not, be "fore that by the direction and advertisement of the gods, the water was let out of the Albane "pool? What shall I speak of this late & strange calamity of our own City? Began it (ar. . . . y truth) "before that voice which came from heaven was made so light of concerning the coning of the "Gauls? before the law of nations was by our Embafiadours broken? and before that through the ' fame neglect of the gods that fact was by us winked at and put up, which indeed should have "been punished and revenged? This was the cause that we were vanquished made captive, put to "our ransome, and suffered such condign punishment both at Gods hand and at mans, as that we " are made an example and amazement to the whole world. Then our advertity and affliction put "us in mind of our religion, and the fear of the gods. We fled into the Capitol to the gods, even C" to the very feat of Jupiter Optimus Maximus: and when our own privat estate went to havock, "the facred monuments yet and holy Images; some we hid in the earth, some we conveyed away "into the neighbour Towns, and removed them out of our enemies fight. And albeit we were "forlorn and given over both of God and men, yet gave not we over, nor discontinued the ser-"vice of the gods. And therefore gave they us our country again, they gave us victory, and the "ancient honour of war which we had lott: and upon our enemies heads, who (blinded with coe vetousness)in the weighing of gold brake both covenant and fidelity, they have turned all fear-"fulnels, all flight & flaughter. Confidering then, O Quirites, by thefelo great and apparent figns, " & testimonies in the course of this world, what it is to serve God, & what it is to dishonor him, "eperceive ye not what wickednefs we go about to plunged are felvs into being fearcely got forth and etcaped out of the shipwrack and perill of our ford in and calamity? A City we have founded and built, by the will of God and due observation of Augury and Auspices, no corner "therein, but full of religion, full of divine Majesty: and for solemn facrifices, there are set daies "when they shall be celebrated, there are places also appointed wherein they ought to be perfor-"med And are ye about then, O Quirites, to leave all thele gods both publike & privat? how for-"teth this deed of yours with that, which lately during the time of the fiege, was feen with no lefs "admiration of our enemies, than our own lelves in that Noble young Gentleman C. Fabius? "when through the pikes of the Gauls, he departed out of the Cattle, and performed a folemn "duty of the house of Fabias even upon the mount Quirinal? What, can ye allow and like that "the facred ceremonies of privat families, should not so much as in time of war be intermitted: E " and luffer now the publike facrifices and the Roman gods, in time of peace to be neglected, and "the City abandoned? That our High Priests and Flamins should be less curious and precise in "the publike service of God, than a private Citizen was in the Anniversary feast of his family "and kindred? But peradventure some one may say, We will do the same at Vetizor we will send "from thence our Priests hither, for to execute that ministry. Neither of which can be done, sa-"ving the due observance of holy ceremonies. For, to say nothing in general of all other holy-"daies, and of all the gods befides; In that one high feaft and folern dinner of Jupiter can a Pulvinar be celebrated, or a facred Table be spread and surnished in any place, but in the Capitol? "What should I speak of the eternal fires ot Westa? and of that Image, which as a pawn and secu-"rity of our imperial flate, is kept within the safegard of that Temple? What should I speak of F" those your Ancilia and Scutcheons? O Mars Gradiums, and thou father Quirinus: are ye well "contented that all these sessivall and sacred solemnities, which are all of equal time with the Ci-"ty, yea, and of more autiquity (some of them) than the foundation of the City, should be for la-"ken in a profane place: But tee what ods there is between us and our ancestors? They left un-"to us certain folemn feasis and sa rifices to be celebrated in the Alban mountain and in Lavini-" um. Was it then a matter of conscience and religion, that some sestival solemnities were brought "unto us from our enemies Cities to Rome? And shall we translate the same from hence to our e-"nemies City Veii, without a great and hainous offence, that would require expiation? Do but call "to mind I pray you, how often our reasts and sacrifices have been renewed and reformed clean, "for that some one old accustomed ceremony, either by chance or for want of taking heed, bath G" been over-flipt and left out. And even of late, what was it elle that (after the ftrange miracle of "the Alban Pool) relieved our Common-weal to diffrested with the Veient war, but the reformaction of our divine fervice, and renewing of our Auspices? And more than this, we as it were in "remembrance of antient religion and devotion, have both brought unto Rome forrain gods, er and also have instituted and devised new. What a notable and festival day was that (in regard of the exceeding zeal and forward affection of the Matrons) upon which Queen June late tran-"flated from Veii, was dedicated in Avenine? And to Aius Locatius, for a voice from heaven

" heard in the new causey, we caused a Temple to be erected. The Capitoline plaies have we ad- H "ded to other solemn featts & thereto we have ordained and sounded a newguild or fraternity, " even by the advice of the Senat. And what need was there, that we should have done any of these "things, if we meant, together with the Gauls, to leave the City of Rome? If we abode not in "the Capitol (so many months while we were besieged) willingly and without constraint? And "if we werefor fear of our enemies, held back from going elfowhither? Thus much of our festival "daies and temples. But what shall become now, I pray you of our Priests? Never think ye once " of it, what a infull deed you are about? As for the Vestall Votaries and Nuns, it is certain, this " is their only place, forth of which nothing ever could drive them but the winning of the City, "The Flamin of Jupiter may not lie forth of the City one night: and will ye make these Priests I "of Romans to become Veientians? And shall thy virgins indeed, O Vesta, leave thee now? and " shall the Flamin dwelling in a strange place, for every night he is absent, taint with so great im-" piety both himself and the Common wealth? As for other matters, which we do with great so-" lemnity by the direction of the Augurs (and all well near within the Pomery or compass of the (City) how can we forget or neglect them? Namely, the Ward-leet or affembly of the Curia for "matters of war: also the other of Centuries, wherein ye chuse your Consuls and Military Tri-"bunes, where can they be held (if we respect the will of the gods and regard the Auspices) but in "the places accustomed? Shall we remove all these to Veii? or shall the people repair hithersrom "thence with so great trouble and inconvenience, to a desolate City, for saken of God and man, " when loever they would hold those assemblies? But the present necessity (they will say) forceth us K " to leave a town that is wasted with fire, and wholly ruinate, and togo to Veii, where all stands " fafe and found, and not to put the poor Commons to the toile and charge of new building. That "this is a pretence and cause rather devised, than meant in earnest, if I should say nothing, I think "appeareth manifestly unto you already, O Quirites, who remember that before the coming of "the French men, whiles your publike buildings and privat houses were whole, and whiles the "City flood upright on foot, this felf-fame motion was made and debated, as touching the remo-"ving to Veii. Confider now ye Tribunes what difference there is between mine opinion and "yours ye are of mind, that if it had not then been meet to be done, yet now verily it were good and requifet: I contrariwise marvel not I pray you before you hear what I will say) am of opinion, that abeit we might then gone, whiles our whole City flourished, yet now we L were not to leave it thus minate & decayed. For at that time we had some cause to remove into "a conquered City, namely, Victory, a glorious thing to our felves and our posterity: but this re-"moving now, were reproachfull and shamefull to our selves, but glorious and honourable to the "Gauls, For we shall not be thought to have left our country as conquerours, but to have lost it as "conquered, And shall it be said, that our running away at Allia, the winning of our City, the be-" fieging of the Capitoll hath imposed this necessity upon us, as to leave our house and home and "to make shifts, to leek our own exile and departure out of that place which we are not able to "defend? And were, indeed, the Gauls able to pull down and rafe that City of Rome, which the "Romans shal not be thought able to reedifie and set up again? What remaineth now in case they " should come upon us afresh, with a new power of men, for certain it is that their multitude is M "incredible) & were willing to dwellhere in this City by them conquered & by you abandoned "but that ye gently permit and luffer them? Nay, What and if not the Gauls, but your old enemies "the Equians and the Volscians would remove and cometo Rome, would you be willing to have "them become Romans and your selves Veientians? Would ye not rather, that this desert and " wast ground as it lieth, were yours, than to be a City peopled by your enemies? For I cannot see, "I affure you, whether of the twain, were more to be detefted, And because (for sooth) yeare loath "to fal to building are ye resolved to abide these mischies exthese shamful reproaches? If through-" out the whole City there might not be built a more commodious or stately house, than is that "cottage there of our founder, were it not better to dwel in cottages like shepherds & peasants so "it be among your lacred monuments and houshold gods, than all at once generally to go into N "exile? Our ancestors and forefathers being a mixture of divers countries; and no other than herd-"men, finding in these parts nothing but woods and bogs, in a short time built a new City out of "the ground: and are we loath, having yet our Capitol, our caftlefafe, the Temples of our gods " flanding fill, to reedifie it now that it is burnt. That which every one of us would have done if "our houses had been fired, refuse we altogether to do in the common scarefire of the City? Give "me leave a little. What & if by some villany, or by mischance there should be a scarefire at Veii & " by reason of the wind(as it is often seen) the slame spred & catch, and so consume a great part of "the City, shall we go from thence by and by, and seek to Fidene or Gabii, or some other City " near at hand to remove unto? Is the very native foil of our country, and this ground which we "call our mother, of no power at all to keep us here, but doth the whole love and affection of O " our country rest in the superficial outside, and in the timber and rasters of our houses? Verily, « confess I will unto you (although I take less pleasure to remember the wrongs you did me, than "the calamity which I endured) when I was absent and in exile, so often as I thought of my coun-" try, all thefe things ran in my mind: the hils, the plain, the Tyber, the coasts all about, which was "my daily prospect; and this air, under which I was born and brought up. All which, O Quirites, elet them move you rather now with an affection to them for to tarry fill in this your habitation,

A "than disquiet you hereafter, and torment you for the want and miss of them, when you have "once left and forgone them. Not without good cante both God and men chose this place for "the building of this City: most healthy and wholsome hils: a very convenient and commodi-"ous river; to bring in corn and other truits out of the inland parts, to receive provision and o-"ther victuals from the sea-coasts: the sea it self near enough for commodities, and not exposed "and open by too much nearness to the dangers of forrain navies: the very heart and centre of "all Itely, a place as a man would fay, naturally made, and only for that City to grow and encrease "in. And that doth the very largeness and greatness of a City to newly founded, plainly prove, "It is now three hundred threefcore and four years, and not above, fince the foundation there-B" of, O Quirites, Amongst so many Nations of greatest antiquity, thus long ye have made war: "and all this while (to lay nothing of particular Cities) neither the Volicians together with the " Æquians peopling to many towns, and those so strong, nor all Hetruria to mighty by iea and 66 land, and containing the whole breadth between the two seas, are in war to you comparable. "Which being so, what reason have you (in the devils name) when ye have had sufficient proof "already of it, to try again new experiments? confidering now, that albeit your valour and vertue "may go with you cliewhither, yet furely, the good luck and fortune of this place can never de-" part and remove from hence? Here is the Capitoll, where sometimes upon the finding of a "mans head, answer was made by diviners and wizards, That in that very place should be the "head of all puissance, and the imperiall seat of the whole world. Here, at what time as the Ca-" pitoll by the direction of the Augurs should be voided and cleared of all other Chappels Lady " Juventus and god Terminus, to the great joy of ourforefathers, would not fuffer themselves to "be stirred out of their place. Here are the fires of Vesta, here be the Scutcheons come down from "heaven, here are all the gods, favourable & gracious stil unto you, so long as here ye make abode "and remain. Camillus in all his Orationthroughout moved them much: but that part thereof cr touching religion (by report) was most effectuall. But that which struck it dead, and put all out "of doubt, was a certain word that fell out to be spoken fitly to the purpose. For at wat time as "the Senar a while after was gathered together in the Court Hoftilia, to debate about these things "and certain companies of fouldiers that returned from their guards, chanced in the mean time "to march through the market place, one Captain hapned to speak in the Comitium, and said, D "Pitch down thy enfign standard beaver, berewill be our best abode. Which voice was not so soon of the Council House, cried with one accord, That "they took that omen for good luck, and happy presage: and also the Commons all gathered "thereabout approved the same. After this, when the foresaid Act of transmigration was once " clean dashed and abolished, the City began to be built consuledly, and without order. Tile was "allowed at the common charges: to dig either stone, or hew timber, every man had liberty "where he could, putting in furcties, that within the compass of that year they would finish their "buildings. The haste they made, caused them to have no regard of drawing out the streets di-"rectly, whiles every man built in the void places without respect of his own or other mens "ground. Which is the cause that the out-finks and vaults which first were conveyed through E "the common freets, now run every where under mens houses, and the form of the City seemeth as if it were built at random (as every man could catch a place for himself) rather than distinct-"ly ranged, and fet out in good order unto them.

The Sixth Book

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Sixth Book.

It containeth the fortunate wars against the Équiaus, the Volsciaus, and Tuscans. Four Tribes were daded to the surmer, Stellatina, Sabbatina, Promentina, Arniensis, M. Maniius, who had defended the Capitus from the Gauls, whiles he dischargeth the debs of those thes were in danger of their creditors, and released such as were then imprisoned, was convicted of assistance to King, and throw how from the cliff Sarpeia. In whose reproach a decree was made by the Senat, that mone of the house of Manibushould be surnamed Marcus: C. Licinius, and L. Sextius, Tribunes of the Commons, propsica a law, that Consults also might be chosen out of the Commons, who were created before from wong the Nobles only. And albeits the Senators with stood them with earnest endeavour, yet by reason that for sive years space the same Tribune continued the only Magistrates of the City, they went through with that law and got it enasted. And I. Sextius was created the fift Consult that ever was of Commoners. A second Law there passed likewise, That no man might possess so we hindred acres of land.

The Recapirulation of the former five Books.

·Hat acts from the building of the City of Rome unto the taking of the same, the Romans have archieved, first, under the government of Kings, afterwards of Consuls and distators, Decemvirs, and Tribunes Consular, as well in the warsabroad as seditions at home; I have in five books declared, Matters obscure, both in regard of exceeding antiquity/as things that a far off hardly be discerned:) and also for that in those daies there were very sew writings and monuments, the only faithfull safegard, and true remembrancers of deedspast: and besides, whatsoever was registred in the Commentaries of the Priests, and in other publike or privat records, the same for the most part, when the City was burned perished withall. But now from henceforward their civill affairs of policy, and martiall exploits in war, enfuing after a fecond beginning of the City (as fpringing again with more fresh shoots and fruitfull sprouts from the root of the old stock) shall be delivered in more plain and certain manner. And to begin withall, look by whom the state first was underpropped and set upright, upon him (as chief and principall) it still bare and rested, and that was M. Furius: whom the Romans

would not suffer to give up his Dictatorship before one year was fully expired. As for those Tribunes (Confular) in time of whole government the City was loft, they liked not that they K should call and hold an assembly for Election of Magistrates the year following. So the matter came to an Interreign. Now while the City was busie in continuall work and labour, about reedifying and repairing their buildings, Q. Fabius to foon as he was out of his office, was by C. Martius, a Tribune of the Commons, arreited to make his answer at a day appointed. Who laid to his charge, That he contrary to the Law of Nations, had fought against the Gauls, unto whom he was sent in embassage, and as an Orator only. But he avoided his judiciall triall, by his death: and died io just against the time, that many men thought it was voluntary and wrought by his own hands. Then P. Cornelius Scipio first entred upon the Interreign : and after him M.Furius Camillus the second time, He created Tribunes Military in Consuls authority, A. Valerius Publicola the second time, L. Virginius, P. Cornelius, A. Manlius, L. Emylius, and L. Posthumius. These men presently after the Interreign, were not so soon entred into office, but before all other things. they consulted with the Senat in matters concerning Religion and conscience. And first of all they commanded, that all the infirmments of leagues and confederacies, the ordinances and laws also (& those were the twelve tables,& certain Statutes made by the Kings) should be fought up as many as could be found extant. Whereof fome were published abroad, even amongst the Common people: but such as pertained properly to holy Rites, and divine service, were by the Priests and Prelates suppressed; especially, of purpose to hold the minds of the people in a reverent awe of religion and devotion. Then began they to reason and debate about the dismal daies. And the fifteenth day before the * Calends of Angult, fo notorious for a twofold loss and over-Dilmal daies. throw a upon which day at Cremera the Fabii were all flain, and after at Allia an unfortunate M field was fought, even to the utter ruin and desolation of the City, they named of the latter misfortune, Alliensis: and set this unlucky mark upon it, That it should be reputed unmeet and inconvenient for any butiness as well publike as private, Some think, because upon the next day following the * Ides of July, Sulpitius the Tribune Military could not by facrifice find any tokens of happy speed, nor obtain the grace and favour of the gods; whereupon three daies after, the Roman holf fell shamefully into the hands of the enemies: therefore, the morrow also after the Ides was interdicted and men were commanded to forbear and abstain from doing facrifice: and thereupon likewife, the day next following the Calends and the Nones, were by tradition held as ominous and difmall as the other.

But long they might not quietly fit about the devising of means to reform the Common-weal, N and set it upright again after so grievous and dangerous a fall. For of the one side, the Volscians, their old enemies, took arms, intending the finall destruction of the Roman name. On the other fide, the Merchants brought news, That the Princes and chief of all the Nations of Hetruria were banded and consederate together in a Diet held at the Temple of Voltumna, to make war upon them. Befides a fresh and new fear came upon them by reason of the rebellion of the Latines and Hernicks, who after the battell at the pool Regillus, for the space almost of an hundred years, had continued fast in loyall league and amity with the people of Rome. Therefore being thus greatly affrighted on every fide, that all the world might fee apparently that the State of Rome was not only hated of her enemies but despised also of her allies: it was thought good and resolved upon, that by his direction and rule, the Common wealth should now be maintained and defended, O by whose condust and guidance it was relieved and recovered: and that M. Furius Camillus should be created Dictator. He being declared Dictator, named Q. Servilius H. la for Generall of the Horsemen. And having proclaimed a law-steed (or vacation from Courts of Law) he took muster of all the younger fort and serviceable men: but so, as the elder people were not left out, as many as were of ftrength sufficient for service. Unto whom ne likewise ministred the military oath of Alleageance, and enrolled them by hundreds in the muster book. When he

The fixth Book of T. Livius.

A had thus levied a power of men, and furnished them with armour, he divided them into three parts. The one he opposed against Hetruria in the Country of Veij : another he commanded to lie encamped before the City. Over these A. Manlius a Tribune military was made Captain: those which were tent against the Tuscans had L. Emplius for their Commander, A third part he himself led against the Volicians : and not far from Lanuvium (the place is called Ad-Metium) he began to assault their Camp. The enemies had put themselves on this their journey, with a kind of scornful contempt, as thinking the whole manhood in a manner of Rome, was by the French clean spent and wasted. But when they heard once, that Camillus was the Lord General it stroke such a fear and terrour among them, that they were glad to defend themselves by the strength of n their trench and rampier, yea, and to fence it round about with huge-piled heaps of wood and trees, that their enemies might have no passage to enter in upon their munitions. Which when Camillus perceived, hegave order to let on fire that Barricado which flood in his way. And as good hap was, the wind was big and high, and blew full upon the enemy. So that not only he made way by fire, but also with the flames thereof that went toward the Camp, with the vapour likewile and smoke, and the crackling noise of the green wood, he so amated & aftonied the enemies, that the Romans had less ado to pass the trench and pallisado, into the Camp of the Volscians, than ingetting over the mound and enclosure consumed with fire. Having thus defeated and slain his enemies and won withall the Camp in the fame brunt, the Dictator gave the whole spoile unto the fouldiers: which to them was to much the more welcome, as they less hoped for it at their

C General his hand: who was never known to be lavish of gift, and over-liberal in dealing rewards. After this he followed them that fled, in chace, wasted and forraged their whole country, and at length (in the seventieth year of the war)he wholy subdued the Volicians, and forced them to yield subjection. After this conquest, he departed from thence against the Equians, who likewise made preparations for war. Their forces he surprised and defeated at Bola, and assailed not only their Camp, but also forced the City, and at the first assault won both.

But whiles fortune smiled thus, what way soever Camillus went, as being the only stay of the Roman state: so on another side the sear of peril greatly encreased. For the Tuscans well near all up in arms, lay before Satrium, and belieged it being in league with the people of Rome. Whose Embassadours came unto the Senat to entreat for succour in their distrels, and had a decree gran-D ted unto them, that the Dictator with all speed should rescue the Sutrines. But being so straightly beleaguered, that they might not abide the delay of this their hope, for that the townsmen, who were but few in number, were over-wearied with working, watching, and bloudy fighting, (all which lay still upon the same men without intermission) they were driven by composition to surrender up the City to the enemies: and being disarmed and sent away with a single sute of apparrel (after a piteous fort all a-row) departed the town, & left their dwelling places. But fee, it fortuned that Camillus at the same time came in the very manner with the Roman Army and met them. At whole feet the multitude all forrowinllay proftrate: their Nobles and chief men in this extremity fell to befeech him to be good unto them: the women and children which went along with them, as partakers and companions of their exile, seconded them with woful tears and lamenta-E tions. But he willed the Sutrines to forbear their mourning plaints, and give over their dolefull moan: faying that he brought the Tuscans heavy and weeping cheer. Then caused he his souldiers to lay down their packs and load, the Sutrines likewife there to abide with a mean guard, and his men to follow him with armour and weapons only. Thus marched he forward with his Army lightly appointed for ready expedition, and advanced before Sutrium. Where according to his expectation, he found the enemies all careless and secure (as commonly it falleth out upon a prosperous success.) No warders, no corps de gua d quartered before the walls, the gates wide open, the Conquerours here and there faceking, rifling and flinging the goods out of their enemies houses. So was Sutrium in one day twice won. The Tuscans (for all their former victory) were Sutrium twice hewn in peeces on every fide, by a new-come enemy. They had no time to cast themselves day, Fround nor gather together into one place, no, nor to take we?pon in hand: whiles every man for life, made in all hafte to the gates, if haply any way they might escape into the fields. But when they came thither, the gates they found fait thut, for to the Dictator had given order afore-hand, fully bent to fight it out, for hope of life on all hands flung away their weapons: and thus difar-G med as they were (for as the case stood, it was the safer course) presented themselves to the enemy, A great number of them were bestowed in several places, and were attended upon with good guards. And before night the rown was delivered again unto the Sutrines, safe and sound without any hurt at all done unto it, as being not won by force, but furrendred upon composition, Camiltus then returned with triumph into the City of Rome, victor at one voyage in three fundry wars. The greatest number by far, of prisoners, whom he led before his chariot in triumph, were Tuscans: whom he sold in port-sale at the spear, and raised such a sum of mony, that when he

The same year, there were enfranchised and made Citizens of Rome, such Veientians, Capenates and Falifcians, as in the time of those wars were fled to the Romans : and for these new Citizens were certain lands fet out. Those also, who for idleness loath to build at Rome, were gone to Veii, there to inhabit the vacant houses, were by an Act of the Senat recalled home from thence. And they at the first, grumbled & refused to obey: but after that a day was set them, & they threatned upon pain of death to return again to Rome; as ftout as they were, and obstinate all of them I together now for fear every one became obedient. As Rome now increased in number of inhabitants. and became well peopled: so on all hands in every place they fell to building new edifices: whiles the Common-wealth somewhat eased them of charges, and the Ædiles by vertue of their office called hard upon them, hastning them forward as to a publike workiyea, and every man privately made all speed possible, according as each ones need required, to make an end and finish his own house. So as within the year the City was new built and stood on foot again, Rome new boilt.

At the years end was the great Election held for Tribunes military in Confuls authority. Wherein were created T. Quintius Cincinnatus, Q. Servilius Fideras the fifth time, Julius Tullus, L. Aquilius Corvus, L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, Ser. Sulpitius Ruffus. One army they let out and led against the Equians, not to war with them (for they granted themselves conquered) but upon K meer foight and deadly hatred to waste all their borders utterly, and to leave them no power and strength to enterprise any new rebellion. The other, into the territory of Tarquinii. Where, two towns of the Tuscans, Cortuo a and Contenebra, were by assault won and rased. At Cortuo a was no refiltance made. For the Romans furprised them on a sudden, and at the first shout and impression they were masters of it: The town was sacked and burned. As for Contenebra, it endured the alfault for some sew daies: but the continual labour, flacking neither day nor night overcharged them: wheras the Roman Army divided into fix parts, fought fix hours in their feveral turns, round one after the other. And the townsmen being but few, and those overtoiled, were sain without any supply, still to maintain fresh skirmishes. Whereupon, at last they retreated back & yielded, ejving the Romans leave to enter the City. The Tribunes were of mind and thought good, that the L spoil should be confiscat and go to the common treasury: but the commandment and proclamation was more flackthan their purpose on that behalf. For whilest they lingred and protracted time, the fouldiers already had feiled in their prizes: and taken from them again without much offence and hatred the booty could not be. In the same year, because the City should not flourish in private buildings only, the Capitol was also built of squared ashler stone: A piece of work even in this io glorious estate, and magnificence of the City, to be had in price and esteemed excellent. And now before this time, the Tribunes of the Commons, whiles the City was busied about their buildings, began often to move for the Laws Agraria (about the division of the lands) in all their affemblies and speeches before the people. For to draw them on and to set forward their hope, they presented unto them very often the Pomptine Territory, which then above all others, so pre- M fently upon the jubduing and jubversion of the Volscians by Camillus, was, no doubt, the rightfull possession of the people of Rome. Complaints were made, that those grounds sustained much more detriment and damage by the Nobility, than they had received before from the Volscians. For they, io long only as they were able to bear arms and maintain war, made inrodes thither: but the Noblemen forcibly entred and made havock in the possessions of the common lands: and unless (before they had let ture footing there, and got all into their hands) a division were made, the Commons should never enjoy one foot of ground there. These Remonstrances of the Tribunes little moved the Commons, both because few of them resorted to the common place of assemblies, whiles they plied their building: and also for that money was away, and their purses so emptied in the charges of workmen, that they had little mind of holding those lands, which to store N and flock they were not able. The City was now given much to their devotions and religions, and the rulers also somewhat superstitious upon their late calamity: Insomuch as they minded to renew the Auspicia [or thesolemnity of prelages taken by bird-flight] for some errour supposed therein: and therefore they agreed that the government should return to an Interreign. So there were Interregents one after Valerius Publicola the third time. These presently after the Interreign began their government. That year, the Temple of Mars vowed in the Gauls war was dedicated by T. Quintins, a Duumvir deputed for the executing of holy duties. O Four Tribes of new Citizens were now adjoyned Stellatina, Pomatina Sabbatina, Arniensis. and these made up the number of the 25 Tribes. And now L. Sicinius a Tribune of the Commons, was in hand with the people in greater number affembled together, about the Pomptine lands: and more enclined they were and forward to hearken after grounds, than they had been afore. And whereas it was moved in the Senat house, to make war upon the Latines and the Hernicks, that m tter was not followed but put off to a jurther time: by reason of preparation for a greater war,

A Hetraria was already up in arms. And all was laid again upon Camillus his shoulders, who was made Tribun Military with Consuls authority, and had five other brethren in office joyned unto him Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis, Q. Servilius Fidenas the sixth time, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Horatius Pubvillus, P. Valerius. In the beginning of the year, the minds of men were turned clean away from the careful regard they had of the Tuscanwar, by reason that a number of people that fled out of the Pomptine country, came all of a fudden in great half to the City, and brought word, that the Antiates were up in arms, that the nations of the Latins had fent their able youth to that war closely underhand, thereby disavowing it to be any action of the State, and standing upon this point, that by the covenant there was no proviso, but that voluntary souldiers might lerve

R in what wars foever they would. Now had the Romans been well taught, and learned, to fet light no more by any wars. The Senat therefore thanked the Gods, that Camillus was in place of government, who if he had been a privat person, was no doubt to have been nominated and created Dictator: yea, and his companions in office confessed frankly that he was the only man to have the foveraign and absolute Regiment of all, incase there were any searful and dangerous war toward : and were fully refolved, to yeeld up all their interest in government unto him, thinking it no disparagement at all unto them, nor any loss of their own honour and reputation, in conferring the same upon the Majesty of so worthy a person. The Senat highly commended the Tribuns, and Camillus was much abashed in his mind, howbeit he gave them hearty thanks, and spake in this wife. "A weighty burthen (quoth he) I see is imposed upon me by the people of C Rome, in that they have elected and nominated me Dictator now the fourth time: a greater of M Furius (charge is enjoyned me by the Senat; the whole state and body of which order, bath delivered for Camillus, to his fine large of the state of the stat change is employed newly the senary the whole trate and body of which older, nath delivered to Camillus, to his chigalar good opinion and judgement of me: but the heavielt load of all is laid upon me by the companions in exceeding kindness and obsequious benignity of these my honourable brethren and collegues, government, of If any painful travel of mine therefore, and watchful care may be redoubled, I wil earneftly en-

As to that war of the Antiats, there are more brags and threats than any danger "and peril from thence. But as I would counsel and advise you to be afraid of no war, so I would " not have you to be careless and secure of any. The City of Rome is beset on every side : partly "envied, and partly hated of her neighbour borderers. Need there is both of more Captains, and

"also of more armies, to manage the affairs of the Common-weal. Ithink it good therefore " (quoth he) O Valerius, that you affift me in government and counsel, and have the leading to-" gether with me of certain legions against the Antiat enemies, That you Q. Servilius, with another army wel appointed, and in readiness, lye encamped hard by the City side, having an "eye and good regard, lest either Hetruria in the mean while, (as of late dayes) or the Latins and "Hernicks (who trouble us now afresh) break out and make some rising. Affired I am, that you " wil behave your felf, and quit you in this service so worthily, as may answer the samous me-" mory of such a father and grandfire as you have had, may befeem your own honourable per-"fon, and those fix Tribunships which you have already performed. As for L. Quintius, let E "him leavy a third power of men, confifting of those that are by reason of sickness or otherwise " excused for warfare, and are above the ordinary age for military service, to be in sead of a gari-"fon for defence of the City and the Walls. Let L. Horatius provide harness, weapons, corn, and

"other necessaries for war, at all occasions what soever. Finally, O Sergius Cornelius, we your fel-

Now when they had all made promite, and that most willingly to do their endeayour in performing their feveral charges, Valerius whom he had joyned with himself in commission, ad Jed moreover and said, That as he would take M. Furius to be Dictator, so would he be unto him again in stead of his Coronel of Horsemen. And turning to the Lords of the Se-F nat, exhorted them, that what opinion they had of one only Soveraign Genetal, the same hope they would conceive of the whole war. The Senators hereat took great joy and content-ment, giving out willingly with one accord, that they hoped exceeding wel of war, of peace, and generally of the State. Neither shall the Common-weal (say they) ever stand in need of Dictator, so long as such Magistrats be in place, so jointly agreeing in one mind together, so indifferent and ready as well to obey as to rule, and rather yeelding their proper praise to the honour of the Common-weal, than difmembring and plucking from it to their private glory and re-

After a Vacation or Law-steed proclaimed, and the Musters taken and past: Furius and Valerius fet forward to Satricum: whither the Antiats had not only lent the flour of all the Volici, G the choice youth out of a fresh fry and new generation; but also had raised a mighty power of Latins and Hernicks, out of those Nations that by long peace were most fresh and lusty. These new enemies and old thus combined together, troubled the minde of the Roman fouldier, and made him to startle. Which when the Centurions reported to Camillus, as he was Marshalling and setting his battels in array; and that in these terms; to wit, that the hearts of his souldiers were disquieted and dismayed, that they took themselves but slowly to their weapons, made flaying and idling when they should come forth of their tents, yea, and that there were some of them overheard to say, that, They must fight one to an hundred, and that so great a multitude of their enemies (if they were unarmed) might hardly be encountred, much less, being so well armed H and appointed: he mounted presently upon Horieback, and rode before the entigns, and then turning himself afront his army, traversing between the ranks and arraies; "What heaviness is " this my fouldiers (quoth he) what means this strange and unwonted lagging behind? Why? Camillus to his "Know ye not your enemy? Know ye not me? Or, know ye not your own selves? The enemy, " what is he elie but the perpetual matter and fub ject of your valour and glory? What, do ye not t " agnize and accept me for your General, because not as Dictator, but as Tribun, I gave you the "watchword, and put out the banner of battel? For mine own part, I stand not much upon aber folute and soveraign command over you: no more likewise should ye regard oughtelse in me. but mine own felf. For never yet did my Distatorship make me hauty and fet me up aloft, no " more than my banishment abated my courage and cast me down. We are the same menstill all " of us: and fince we are come to this war, furnished with the same means that we carried with 46 us unto the former, let us look for the fame event of our fervice, and no worfe. So foon as ye 66 shall encounter and joyn battel with them, perform each one that which he hath been taught and wonted to the journey furely will be ours, and they (no doubt) shall run away. Then after "he had founded the battel, he alighteth from his Horse, and caught the ensign-bearer that stood K next him, with his hand, haled him forward against the sace of the enemy, crying very often aloud, On afore with thy banner, Port-enfign, and advance forward, fouldier. When they faw that Camillus in person, a man wellstept in years, and thereby weak to persorm the parts of bodily strength. put himlelf forth against the enemy all at once they pressed forward, set up an outery and shouted, every man calling upon his next fellow, to follow their General for shame. Over and besides, fome fay that by the commandment of Camillus, there was an enfign frung into the very battel among the enemies. Whereupon they of the forefront, bestirred themselves lustily to recover it again. And thereby were the Antiates first discomfitted, and the fear not only came upon them. in the vanguard, but entred also and reached as far as the rereward, that flood ready for supply. And as the violent force of the foundiers, provoked by the prefence of their Captain, much troubled the enemy: fonothing more danned the hearts of the Volscians, than the very fight of Camiller himself, when they chanced to espie him. So surely carried he the victory with him, which way loever he went! And that appeared most evidently in this, That when he saw the left wing at the point to give back and run away, he took himfelf in all haft to his Horse, rode thither with his light footmans buckler, and with his only prefence renewed the fight; shewing unto them how the rest of the battel had the better. Now were the enemies put to the worst, and the victory enclined to a fide. But their multitude both hindred themselves in their flight: and also a long peece of work the wearied souldiers of the Romans had to put so great a number, all to the sword. But behold, there fell a great tempelt of rainall of a fudden, which powred down with so mighty winds and storms, that it rather put them by the execution of assured victory, than parted any M battel or stayed the fight. Whereupon the retreat was founded: and the night ensuing, whiles the Romans were at rest, made an end of the war. For the Latins and Hernicks for sook the Volscians and departed home, with as ill speed, as their enterprise was bad. The Volscians seeing themselves abandoned and lest in the lurch by them, (upon whose trust and considence they had rebelled quit the camp and field, and put themselves within the walls of Satricum; whom Camillus at first began to besiege, casting a trench and rampier about them, raising bastillons and plat-forms againft the Town. And leeing his munitions and fabricks by no fallying forth of the enemies impeached, he inpposed there was no fuch courage in them, that he should need to stand fo long about the hope of victory: and thereupon, encouraged his men not to wear themselves out in a tedious and toilful piece of service, as if they lay at the siege of Veii: assuring them that the N victory was in their hands already: and so with exceeding cheerfulness of his souldiers, he set ladders upon every fide, scaled the walls, and entred the Town. Then the Volscians flung away their weapons and veelded themselves. But the General his mind was bent upon a greater exploit, and that was the winning of Anti-

um, being the feat Town of the Volscians, and from whence the beginning of the last war arose. Howbeit because so strong a City might not be won without great preparation of artillery, ordinance& engins of battery leaving his collegue behind him with the army he went himself to Rome, to perswade with the Senat for to destroy and rase Antium utterly. And whiles he was emparling with them (fuch was the will of God I believe, that Antium should stand still & continue longer) there came Embassadors from Nepet and Sutrium, craving aid against the Tuscans, saying: That it o was more than high time, that they were succoured and relieved. Upon which occasion it fell out, that Camillus was withdrawn thither from Antium, For feeing that those two Towns stood even against Hetruria, as it were the very keyes and bar-gates from thence: both the enemies laboured to gain them afore hand, against the time that they went about to make new wars; & the Romans also held it a matter of great consequence, to rescue and defend those frontier Towns. The Senat therefore thought good to be in hand with Camillus, for to leave Antium, and to undertake the war with the Instans. The City-legions under General Quintins, were appointed unto him.

A And albeit, he rather would have had the leading of that army, which lay now in the Volscians Country, and which he had good tryal of, and were acquainted better with his government, yet refused he nothing: only he required to have Valerius his affociat fill, and joyned with him in commission. So Quintius and Horatius were sent to succeed Valerius in the Vollcian war. Furius and Valerius took their voyage from the City to Sutriume, and found the one fide of the Town possessed already by the Tuscans. On the other side, the Townsmen, for that the enemy had flopped all passages between, hardly able to repel the force of the assailants. But the coming of the Roman aids, and the name belides of Camillus, (io highly renowned as well amongst the enemies as Allies I both for the present gave them heart to abide the brunt, and slick to it still that

R were before at the point to give over: and also gained time and respit, to come in with tresh supplies and succours. Camillus therefore divided his forces, and gave direction to his collegue, for to bring about his power, to that fide which the enemies held, and there to make an affault: not so much for any hope he had by scaling the wails to win the City: as by withdrawing the enemies thither, not only to ease the Townimen of their toil, and give them a breathing time (who were now wearied with affaults) but also to get himself some opportunity and vantage, to enter the City without skirmith and refiftance. Which being put in execution on both hands accordingly, and performed at once: the Tuscanes beset with a two-fold sear round about, seeing the vered. walls affailed most fiercely one way: and the enemygot within the Town another way: flung out at one gate (which as it hapned was not befet) and in great haft all together fought to escape

C away. But as they fled, they were flain by heaps both within the Town and abroad all over the fields. The greater number were killed within the walls by Furius his fouldiers, Valerius his men were more ready and nimble in the chase, and gave not over the execution until the night came, that they could not see and discern them.

When Sutrium was thus recovered and restored again to their allies they led forward the army to Neper: which Town the Tuscans held wholly, as surrendred already into their hands, Every man thought it would be a busic peece of work to win that City again: not in this regard only, that it was fully in the enemies possession, but also because some of the Nepesius, by treason had veelded it up. Howbeit, they relolved to fend unto the heads and principal citizens, that they should sever themselves from the Tuscans, and perform on their behalf trulty and faithful loyalty, n like as they had craved and befought at the Romans hands their friendly help and protection. From whom they received this answer again . That it lay not now in them to do anything at all, for that the Tuscans kept the walls , and warded the gates. Whereupon they first terrified and feared the Townsmen with foraging and spoiling their territory: after that, seeing they made more reckoning of keeping, their faithful loyalty to their enemies unto whom they had lately surrendred, than observing the league with their friends, which they had long before concluded; they provided themselves out of the fields of a number of faggots, of brush wood, and such like trouss, and at the first shout and assault given, the Town was taken. Then proclamation was made, that Nept taken. all the Nepennes should part with their armour and weapons; and so many as were found unarmy E ed, should be spared. But the Tuscans, as well armed as unarmed were put to the sword every one. As for the chief authors that perswaded the Nepesines to deliver the Town to the enemies, they were beheaded. The harmless multitude had their goods restored, and so the Town was left with agarrison. Thus the two Tribuns (Comular) having regained out of the enemies hands two confederat Cities, returned in great glory to Rame with their victorious army.

and so approached the City with the army filled up the ditches close to the walls, set ladders to,

The same year the Latins and Hernicks were required to make amends for harms done, and reflitution of goods wrongfully detained : and the cause demanded why of late years, according to a covenant in that behalf provided they had fet forth no fouldiers to the Romans wars. Camillus fet upon the Gauls, when they were amufed in receiving their gold, when * they were upon terms of peace, and their hearts quiet and secure : whereas my self chased them et away whiles they were in arms, and at the point to win the Castle Hill. In that exploit of Ca-" millus the fouldiers, had each one his share proportionably of the glory, who together with "him did their parts: but in the service performed by me, no earthly creature was fellow and " partner with me. With these conceits he fed his own humour, and puffed up his proud spirit, being withal by corrupt disposition of nature, hot and hasty, arrogant and insolent. Discontented T befides, that of the Nobility, his gifts and qualities were not effected of that worth, as in his own judgement they deferved: first, of a Senator he became popular, and began to break his mind, and impart his defigns unto the Magistrats of the Commons: finding fault with the Nobility, and complaining of them: folliciting and inveigling the Commons, to cast a liking and favour toward himself: carried away with the vain gale of the peoples opinion: not guided by sage countel and discretion: and in one word, chusing rather to be of great name, than of good and honest report. And not contenting himself to deal in the Laws Agraria, about the division of Lands, which had alwayes ministred to the Tribuns of the Commons matter enough of mutinies and seditions; he began to intermeddle between the debtors and their creditors, and to overthrow all keeping of credit. And indeed, deep debts are sharp goads, and prick shrewdly: threatning K not only poverty and shame, but also terrifying the bodies of free men with hard imprisonment, little ease, and Irons. Now there were exceeding many far in debt (a thing most dangerous and hurtful to mens state) even of the richer fort, by reason of their great expenses defrayed in building. The war therefore of the Volicians, which was it felf of great importance; but much more, in regard of the Latins and Hernicks Rebellion withal, was in shew pretended, as a cause to feek for to have a more foveraign and absolute power to govern the State : but in truth, these new designments and plots of Manline, rather than the war, forced the Senat to creat a Dictator. And A. Cornelius Coffus being created, nominated for his General of Horle, T. Quintius Capitolinus. The Dictator, albeit he saw a greater contention toward, at home than abroad, yet (were it that the war required some speedy expedition, or because by victory and triumph, he 1 thought to make his Dictatorship more mighty and powerful) he took musters, and set forward into the Pomptine Land, into which parts he had intelligence, that the Volicians had proclaimed their forces, to repair. I doubt not, but they that read in so many books already, of these continual wars fought with the Volicians, besides their redious satiety of reading, will muse also at this (which to my self was likewise a wonder, when I perused the writers that lived neer about the times of these acts) how these Volicians and Æquians, so often vanquished and defeated, were furnished with supply of fouldiers to maintain their wars. But feeing by the ancient Chroniclers it hath been overpassed with filence, what should I alledge, but only mine own opinion and bare conjecture, which every man hath liberty to put in for himself? Likely it is, that either between the times of wars (as now M we see in the Roman musters) they used to breed up one supply under another, of the younger fortito the maintenance and renuing so oftentimes of their war: or that their armies were not alwaves levied out of the same States, albeit the wars go under the name of one and the self-same nation: or that those countries yeelded in those dayes an infinit number of freemen, which now are well near wast and defart but for some Roman slaves; which keep those parts yet from being void and dispeopled as having but a very small seminary, or none at all, left, of serviceable souldiers.

Certainly, the Volkians army, as all authors agree, was very great at this time: albeit of late dayes by the leading and conduct of Camillus they were fore weakned, and their firength much abated. Befides, there were with them in field, the Latins and Hernicks, some of the Circeians, and other Coloners from Vehra. The Roman Dictator having that day pitched his camp, and N the next morrow come abroad with happy tokens of good speed from the Birds: having also flain's factifice; and procured thereby the favour and grace of the Gods, in joyous manner shewed himself unto his fouldiers: who according as they were commanded, were ready early in the morning, by break of day in arms, attending the found of Trumpet for battel. The day is ours (quoth he) my valorous fouldiers, if either the Gods or their Prophets can foretel future events. "Therefore as resolutimen of assured hope, and such as shall encounter with far meaner than our "felves, pitch we our javelins down at our feet, and draw our fwords only. Neither would I

"have you to enn our of the main battel, and to give the charge, but to keep your ground, to " fland fledfast and abide the first shock of the enemy. And when they have spent their volley of "fhot in vain, and shall with full force come upon you as you stands then brandish your swords, O "and let them glitter in their eyes, and think every man of the Gods, that they will help the Ro-"mans. The Gods I fay, which in drappy hour, by the lucky approbation of their Birds, have the us into the field to fight. And as for you, O Quintinus, keep your Horfemen clofe together, marking advitedly the first beginning of the skirmish: and when you see the battels 6 backle together fiell-mell, and come to hand-firokes, whiles they are bused and occupied one way, fright them affother way with your Horsemen, ride among their ranks as they fight, and break their arraies. Thus fought both Horfe and Foot according to his direction, And

A as the legions wanted not a worthy Captain, no more missed the Captain of happy speed. The multitude of the enemies trufting upon nothing but their own number, which they measured and compared together only by their eye, interviewing both the one army and the other, rashly gave battel, and as rashly gave over again. In shout only and shot shewing themselves hot and eager at the first encounter: but were not able to abide the (word-fight, the closing together foot to foot, and the firy countenance of their enemies; which for the very heat of their courage, shined and glistered fully in their eyes. So the foreir ont being put back, a fear came upon them likewile, that flood behind for supply, and withal, the Horsemen for their parts set to and fought most terribly. Whereupon the ranks of the enemies in fundry places were broken and all fet out of

R order, so as their battailons seemed to flote and wave up and down to and fro, in suipence whether to fight or flye. Afterwards, when they faw the formoit smitten down and slain, and every one thought no other but his own turn was next to be killed, they turned their backs and fled. The Romans came forward fill and chafed them. And so long as they went their way armed and thick hudled together, it was the footmens work to purfue them: but when it was perceived once, that they flung away their weapons on all hands, and that the enemies army fled dispersed all abroad in the fields: then were the troups of Horsemen set out after them, with this caveat and charge, to make no stay and forlet the time, by killing them one by one, and to to give the main multitude of them in the mean while sufficient respit to escape: but that they should content themselves, only to let flye some shot amongst them, and by scaring them to hinder their running: and when

C they were ridden beyond, to crois upon them and thay them, until the footmen might overtake them, flay them down right and make an hand of them clean. Thus fled they, and thus were they followed in chale until night. The very fame day was the Volicians camp taken and ranfacked, and the whole pillage, beides the bodies of free men, was given unto the louldiers. The greatest part defeated, of the priloners were Hernicks and Latins: and those not of the common fort, and such as might be thought to have lerved for pay: but there were found among them certain young Gentlemen of good mark, a plain proof and evidence, that the Volkcian enemies had aid from thence by the publick and general warrant of the State. There were known also to be among them some of the Cir eians; yea, and certain of the Veliterne colony likewise. All of them were sent to Rome. Where being examined before the chief of the Senators, they confessed every one in plain terms, the refill kept his forces together within the standing camp, making no doubt, but that the rulers and 13 volving of their own Nation, like as they had before bewrayed it unto the Dictator. The Dictator

Senators of Rome would determine to war upon those countries. But even at that time agreater heap of troubles which arose at home, caused him to be sent for to Rome, by occasion of a sedition which grew daily more and more: and by reason of the Author thereof (a man of quality and note) was more feared than any usually had been afore time. For now by this, had M. Mantius not by speeches only, but by plain deeds also, (which in outward shew seemed popular and plausible) shewed evidently upon what troublesome and tumultuous spirit all proceeded. For seeing upon a time a Centurion, of good worth for his service in war, condemned in an action of debt, and upon an execution of judgement carried to prilon: E he in the mids of the Forum, came running unto him with a rout and crew of his followers and retinue, laid hand on him, and took him perforce from the officers: and after he had given out fome words aloud touching the pride of the Senators, the cruelty of the uturers, the calamities of the Commons, the valour and present distress of the party; Marry then (quoth he) have I done a great deed, to no purpose, in saving the Capitol and the Castle with this right hand of mine, if I could abide to fee my fellow fouldier (as if he were taken priloner of the Gauls by way of conquest) had away into bondage and captivity, and laid up fast in gyves and setters. And therewith openly in fight of all the people paid the wholedebt downright on the nail, unto the creditor: and so after the usual and solemn ceremony by a brasen peece of coin and the billance, the feet him at liberty out of the creditor his hands, and let him go at large; "Who prayed hear-F "tily to God and man, for to requite accordingly M. Mandius his only deliverer, and the very speeches of a "patron and protector of the Commons of Rome. And when he was once got into that unruly Centurion.

"and feditious throng, he prefently himfelf fet all a madding, shewing the scars of his wounds "received in the Veientians and Gauls wars, and in other services one after another: saying, "That whiles he thusfollowed fouldiery, and rebuilded his house that was destroyed, he became " indebted, and that so deeply (by reason that the interest alwayes overgrew the principal, which "he by that means had paid and paid again) that he was not able to creep out of the ulurers book, "but was plunged therein over head and ears. And now behold (quoth he) by the only good-"neffe of M. Manlins, I have the liberty again to fee the light of the Sun, to behold the Com-mon place, to look my neighbours and fellow citizens in the face; at his hands I acknowledge " to have received all the benefits that mine own parents could give me : unto him I vow what-" foever in me is left, and in his quarrel to spend that little life and blood which remaineth in my "body: and in one word look what priviledge I may injoy in right of my country, and in the "communion of the Gods, publick or private, the same do I impart and communicate with that "one man. By these speeches the Commons were set on and pricked forward mightily, as wholly devoted unto one person; and who but Manlins now in every mans mouth? And presently in the nick he entred into another action that tended more effectually to mar all quite, and to fet every thing out of order. His Land in the territory of Veii, which was the chief and capital

Manor of his inheritance, even the fairest flower of his garland, he set upon sale, causing it openly to to be cryed; and faid withal, I will not O Quirites, follong as I have one foot of ground, or any thing elfe left, fee one of you condemned and upon execution carryed to prison. This fet them so a flote, that they were ready, as it feemed, to follow him as the only protector of their liberties, in any action, were it right or wrong, they cared not which way, all was one with them. Befides, at home in his own house, he spared not to cast out flandrous speeches against the Senators, as if he had been at the open Crofs, making Orations. Amongst which, without all regard whether he spake true or false, he let fall these words, "That the Senators kept in secret certain hid-"den treatures of the Gauls gold, and were not now contented to hold in possession the com-"mon grounds, but they would also embezle the treasure publick, which if it came abroad, the r "Commons might foon be acquit and discharged of their debts. This gap being once laid open, and this light given the people, they thought (ye may be fure) an unworthy indignity, that when there was gold to be levied for redemption of the City out of the Gauls Hands, it then should be gathered by a general contribution of all: and the same gold, now recovered from the enemies, should be as a prey in the clutches of a few. Therefore they followed instantly upon him and were very earnest to know, where so great a masse of mony and stoln good was hidden. But when he posted them off, and said he would in due time disclose all: they were not content, but setting all other matters apart, their whole care was employed about this business, and nothing else. So as it p' sinly appeared that neither he should reap a mean thank if he reported a truth, nor incur a small offence and displeasure, in case he told a sale tale.

Things having thus in these doubtful terms, the Dictator who was sent for, returned from the army into the City. The next day he affembled the Senat: and after he had throughly founded and felt the minds of them, that were there met, he commanded the Senators not to depart from him; and affifted as he was with that company he caused the Ivory chair of estate to be set in the Comitium or common Hall, and fent a fer jeant for M. Manlins. Who being thus peremptorily fummoned by the Dictators express commandment, gave warning by a token to his complices and favourits, that there was a broil and fray toward: and with a mighty retinue of his followers, he presented himself before the Tribunal. On the one side, stood the Senators, on the other the Commons: either part beholding their Captain, as it were in a pight field ready to joyn battel. The speech of Then after silence made, "Would to God (quoth the Dictator unto Mantius) I and the Sena- I "tors of Rome, might in all other things fort as well with the Commons, as I am affured, we shall "agree all together about thee, and the matter which I shall ask and demand of thee. I see thou " haft put the City in some good hope, that by the Gauls treasure which the principal and chief " of the Senators detain with them secretly hidden, all men may keep their credit, and fully pay and

"discharge their debts. Which I for my part, so God me help, am so far from hindring, that con"trary-wife I would exhort thee, O M. Manlius, to eafe the Commons of Rome of the usurers

"book: to discover these fellows and make them known, that gape so greedily after the common " treasure, and to disappoint them, and turn them out of this their privy booty. Which if thou "do not effect, either for that thy felt wouldst have a fleece with them, or elfe became it is but " a forced tale that thou hast made of thine own fingers ends, I will not fail, but commit thee M "to ward, and fuffer no longer the multitude upon a vain and deceitful hope, thus by thee to be The softwer of "abused and disquieted. To this, Manlius made answer and faid. "I was nothing deceived but Manlius to the " wift well enough, that a Dictator was created not against the Volscians, who are enemies (for-"footh) to oft as our great Masters think it for their purpose : nor against the Latins and Hernicks, " whom they drive and provoke to rebellion by falle and forged surmises: but against my self and "the Commons of Rome. For now I see well, that the Dictator professet to maintain and bear " out the Usurers against the Commons: and that against my self, for the favour that the multi-"tude beareth unto me, there is matter devised to charge me withal, and to procure my utter "ruin and overthrow. Doth it offend and grieve you indeed, O A Cornelius and you my Lords " of the Senat, that the people thus fland about me on every fide? Why do not we every man for N "his part, by your good deferts divide afunder this company, and draw them away with you from "me? Namely, by your mediation and intercession, by giving your word for them, by ridding "out of gives and prison your fellow citizens, by faving them that are condemned, from being er awarded to the thraldom of their creditors, and out of the overplus and superfluity of your own "living and goods by relieving their prefent need, and supplying their necessities? But what mean "I to per wade you to forgo any thing of your own, and befrow it upon them? Take another "course with them, and make them another offer. Do but deduct out of the principal debt, that "which hath been paid, for confideration of the loan; you shall soon see that my retinue will "make no greater shew, than any other mans else. But why am I the only man so careful of the "Citizens and people? Certainly, I can make no better answer hereunto, than if one should ask me, O "wherefore I alone faved the Capitol and the Cliff? As I then yeelded my helping hand to all in "general fo will I now to my power relieve each one in particular. For as touching the treasure " of the Gauls: the thing in it felf being easy, this demand of yours maketh hard and difficult. "For what need you ask me that which you know already your felves? Why lay you not that " open which is in your fecret bosom, rather thanto have it fifted and bolted out? but that there " is some privy jugling, some cunning practise and packing therein? The more ye would seem to "have your leiger demain to be fought into and detected : fo much the more, I fear me, ye will

A "hide it even from the eyes of those that are watchful and quicklighted. And therefore am not "I to be forced to reveal and shew where your stoln goods are : but you would be made, if you " were well ferved, to bring them abroad into the view of the World. At these words, the Di-Stator commanded him to leave off these foolish vapourings and triding shifts: urging him either to go through with his challenge and prove it true: or if he could not julify it, to confess that he had falfely flandred and wrongfully charged the Senar, and fought to bring upon them the ill will and hatted of men, for a vain furmife and infpition of Theevery. But as he flourly inferred and replied again, that he would not speak at the pleasure of his enemies, nor owed them any fuch service: he commanded him to be had away to prilon and kept in bonds. And as he was

B apprehended by the Officer, "O Impier (quoth he) Optimus Maximus O Inim Queen of heaven, M. Manling "O Minarya, with other gods and goddefles, that inhabit the Capitol and the Callle; Suffer ye apprehended. " your Knight and Defender, to be thus rugged, mifuled, and evil entreated by his adversaries? "And shall this right hand wherewith I deleated the Gauls, and drave them from your Chap-" pels and shrines, be now pinnioned and manacled? There was no one man there, that saw and heard him, who could indure this indignity. But this City, as most patient of all other Cities to abide any just, righteous and lawful commandment of the Magistrate, contained her self and was content in some cases to be overruled: so far forth, that against the authority and absolute power of the Dictator, neither the Tribuns of the Commons, nor the Commons themselves, durft either cast up their eyes to look awry, or once open their mouths. But after Manling was committed, it was for certain known, that a great fort of the Commoners, changed their weed and put on their worst apparel and mourning array; many a man let his head and beard grow long; yea, and a number of them with fad and heavy cheer, kept commonly about the Goal-

Now when the Dictator triumphed over the Volscians, his triumph bred him more batted and displeasure than honor and glory: for it is commonly spoken, that he got it at home and nor abroad, and triumphed over a citizen not over an enemy: and this only wanted, (fay they) to make up his pride to the full, that Manlins was not led before his charior. Whereupon there was like to grow much scandal and very fedition. For the appealing and mitigation whereof, the Senat upon a fudden, without any motion made, of themselves became bountiful, and assigned 2000.

D citizens of Rome to be fent to Sarricum to inhabit as a Colony. And to every man was fet out Satricum made two acres and an half of Land apiece. Which the Commoners confirmed to be a matter of no- a Colony, and thing, a small boon bestowed upon a few, the very hire and reward for berraying Manliu, So peopled with that this proved a mischief for a remedy: and by this salve, the sore rather sestered and rancled, Romans. than healed up, and the ledition thereby fretted more and more. For now the crew of Manlius his followers made shew of greater mourning and heaviness, in their vile clothes and fad conntenance, after the guise of persons accused during the time of their troubles. And when the fear and terrour was once overblown, by reason that the Dictator after his triumph refigned up his authority, then folks hearts were fet at liberty, and their tongues walked at will. Some were heard in open audience to upbraid the multitude and cast in their teeth, "That it was their fa-E" shions alwayes to lift up and advance their Protectors and Defenders into high places, and Theseditious " afterwards, in the very pitch of danger and point of downfal, to forfake and leave them defti- speeches of "tute, Thus was Sp. And ought indeed (fay they) a Noble " man, that sometimes had been Conful, thus to be misused, if he answered not to the good liking

Suppose, he had over-reached and made a lie afore, and so had " nor a prefent and ready answer at the time: was there ever any servant and slave, for leasing cast "in prilon and laid up in Irons? And how could they forget that night, which was like to have " been the last night that ever the Romans should have seen : that fatal night of their final destru-" ftion for ever? Or how could they chuse, but have still in their eye the army of the Gauls, clim-" bing up the Cliff Tarpeia? and how M. Manlius in person, so bravely beseen in his atmour, "all iwe ring, all bleeding releved and faved Inpiter himself in a manner out of the enemies hands? "What? Did they think that with half-pound measures of wheat meal, they had sufficiently re-their plaints, and would not depart from that place, no, not all the night long, but threatned to break theprilon by force; until fuch time as they gor that remitted, which other wife they would have weeked, and Marking by an act of the Senat was released out of prilon and enlarged. Whereby the mutiny was never the more ended, but rather a Captain given them to maintain the Sedition.

About the same time the Latins and Hernicks, the inhabitants also of the Colony Circeia, and H they of Veliere, who came to excuse themselves for the Volscian war, wherein they were charged to have had their hands, and required to have the captives delivered, for to proceed against them, according to their own Laws, had a heavy answer. But the Coloners received the sharper check and rebuke, because they being Roman citizens, were entred into that wicked plot and abominable action, to combine against their native Country. And they were not only denied their prisoners, but also (wherein the Romans dealt more favourably with the rest that were their Allies I were warned and commanded in the name of the Senat, to avoid and that with freed out of the City from the fight and presence of the people of Rome; for fear lest the priviledge of Embassage, provided for the security and safe conduct of forrainers and not of citizens, should t not serve to protect them. Now when the Sedition of Manlins was fet on foot again, somewhat before the end of the year, the great affembly was holden for the Election of Magistrats: wherein there were created Tribuns in Consuls authority Sorg. Cornelius Maluginensis the second time. P. Valerius Positus the second time, M. Furius Camillus the fifth time, Ser. Sulprine Ruffus the fecond time, C. Papirius Crassus, T. Quintius Cincinnatus the second time, all of Senators cal-

In the beginning of this year, peace they had with forrain nations; a matter very commodious both for the Senat and the Commons. For the Com, in this regard, that being not called away by any musters, they had some good hope (especially having so mighty a champion) to be rid at once for ever of ulury. For the Senators again, because their minds being not distracted by any sear K from abroad, might attend about curing and healing the intestine maladies at home. When both parts therefore were now more sharp set, and eagerly bent, they thought out of hand to trie what would be done, and to make either a shaft or a bolt of it. Manling calling the Com. to his house, devised with the principal heads of them both day and night, to bring in a change and alteration of the State: and fuller of flomack, anger and gall he was now a good deal than aforetime. Netled he was, the rather by his late difgrace and shame, who never before had been touched in credit, nor tafted of any reproach and contumely. Heart he took unto him, for that the Dict, durst not execute that rigor against him, which Cincinnatus Quintius had extended upon Sp. Melius: and it feemed unto him, that not only the Dict, fought to wind himself out, and in refigning up his room, to avoid the offence given by his imprisonment; but also that the very I Senat was not able to endure the manner of proceeding. With these imaginations being puffed up and galled too, he failed not withal to prick forward and exasperate the minds of the Commons, who of themselves already, were kindled and set on fire. And with these and such like speeches he entertained them. "How long (quoth he) I pray you, will ye beignorant, and not know what

"ye may do, and what power ye have? A thing that nature it felf would not have to much as M. Manlius to "the very dumb beafts, but to understand. Do but count how many you are in number your the Commons "felves, and how few adversaries yehave against you. If ye were but one to one, yet (I would "think) you should more eagerly strive for to maintain your liberty, than they, to set up their "Lordship. For, look how many favourits ye have been, following and courting one patron, so "many shall ye now be opposed to one enemy. Make but shew only of war, ye shall have peace. M
"Let them see you once ready to make head and offer violence, soon will they yeeld and part "with their right; Either ye must adventure, all joyntly together to do somewhat, or else make "account each one, to abide and fuffer all. How long will ye frand looking from every fide upon "me? I for my part, furely, will not fail any one of you. Look ye then to it, that fortune fail not me. I, even I, that was your redeemer and deliverer, was all at once (when it pleafed mine "enemies) taken down and made no body. And ye, all of you faw him led to prison, who saved every one of you from prison. If happily thosemine enemies should attempt to do me more "spight, Where am I then? and what were I best to trust unto? Should I look for that end that "Cassus and Melius came unto? Ye do well to fignify how you dread the presage, and "wish the contrary. And the Gods forbid that it should so come to pass. But look not N. "that ever they should come down from Heaven to protect me. That mind they must " give you, to preserve me from so hard a hap, like as they gave me a resolute heart, both "in mine armour to fave you from barbarous enemies, and in my gown to defend you from "in mine amount to be you not not not proud citizens. Is there so little courage in you (so mighty a people otherwise) as to think it sufficient, and to stand contented, if you may be backed only, and meet with some help "against your enemies; and to know no other scusling with your adversaries (the Senators) but " wherein you suffe your selves to be commanded in the end? This baseness cometh not to you "by kind. By use and custome only, you are become their vassals and subjects. For what is the "cause ye are so couragious against your enemies abroad, that ye think it meet and reason to rule "and govern them? No other in truth but this, because with them you have been ever wont to O "firive for foveraignty, whereas against these ye have been used rather, to make some slight proof " and tryal what you may do by your liberty, than to do your best, and to put your selves forth "for to maintain it and extend it to the most. And yet what manner of captains soever ye have "met withal to lead you, and howfoever affected ye have been your felves, obtained ye have hi-"therro all things that ye shot at, were they never so great: Such was your might, or such was " your felicity. Wherefore now it is high time to give the adventure of greater matters also.

"Make but tryal only of your owngood fortune, and of my fell, whom I hope ye have had happy

"c experience of already: with left ado shall ye be provided of one to over-rule and command the 's Senators, than ye have been hitherto of those, that were to refift only their imperious govern-"ment. Down we must with these Dictatorships and Consulships both, and lay them levell with "the ground: that the commonalty of Rome may once be alon, and bear up the head. Bestir "your lelves therefore, and play the men. Hinder process and course of law for actions of debt. "I profess my less a Patron of the Commons, which mame my care over you, my faithfulness to "you, hath indued me with. And if you please to entitle your leader and Captain, with a more glorious.* file of honour and Majelty, ye shall find it more potent and available to effect that *i.ofKing. which you long for and defire. And so from that time forward, began some practice to set up the M. But on the other fide, the Senators fat in Coun- Kingdom.

cel, and debated about the Secession and secret meeting of the Commons in the privat house of Manling, and that house, which stood fas it fell out) upon the Castle Hill: likewise of that imminent engine and fabricks devised for the overthrow of the present liberty. Many were of opinion, and spake it aloud, That there was need of a Servilinis Hala, who not by commanding a publick enemy of the State to prison, would provoke him and make him more eager; but by dispatching of one wicked member out of the way, and cutting him off, might end this intestine and civil war. But they came down at length, and grew to a resolution, in words milder, yet indeed and effect all one, That he Magistraics should have a careful eye, that by these mischievom plots and practises of A sorm of M. Manlius, the Common-weal incurred no dammage and hurt. Then the Tribuns in Confuls au- commission thority, and the other Tribuns of the Commons (for even they also feeing, that in the losse of the granted in publick liberty of all, their power likewife should come to an end, had veelded to be advited and great dangers ruled by the Senat) laid all their heads together, and confulted what course was best to betaken, When as no man could bethink of any way, but plain violence and bloudshed (a peece of work in all appearance, of great adventure and doubtful hazard) then M. Menenius, and Q. Publius, two Tribuns of the Commons stepped forth and said. " What mean we to make that, a quarrel be- On overture "tween the Senators and Commons, which the wholebody united of the City, indeed should un- to the over-"dertake against to dangerous and pestilent a member? Why trouble we our selves to set upon throw of Mass-

"him and the Commons with him, whom by the means of the very Commons themselves, it were " the fafer course, and lesse offensive to assail? that being surcharged and overweighed with his "own power whereupon he presumeth, he may fall down and take his overthrow. We are "fully minded to arrest him, to convent him judicially, and call him to his answer. Nothing is "lesse popular, and more odious to the people, than to hear of Kings government again. The "multitude shall not so soon see and perceive, that our quartel is not with them, but that they

6 his accusers from one of the Commons, shall behold one of the Nobility to hold up his hand at " the bar, and the inditement framed, upon the crime of ulurping the Kingdom: but (be ye fute "of it) they will tender and favour the fair looks and person of no man, before the cause of their " own free estate. When all the house liked well, and allowed of this advise and overture, they E made no more ado, but served Manlius with process to answer at a day appointed. Which was not so soon done, but the Commons at the very first, began to storm and be enraged, especially when they saw the accused man, during his trouble so rufully arraied, accompanied with none of the Senators, nor fo much as one of his kindsed and affility, no, nor his very brethren An. and T. Manlius. Athing before that day never feen nor known, but that in fo great a danger as this was, the neerest kinsfolk in blond, did thange their weed. For even when Ap. Now jurely (lay they) it is a very compact amongst them all, that this popular man, to gracious and welbeloved, should be confounded and overthrown, because he was the first that ever fell away from the Senators to the Commons. When the day was come of his arraignment, F I can find in no author, what was objected against the prisoner by his accusers, directly tending to prove the trime of afpiring to a Kingdom, but only the conventicles of the multitude, certain feditions words, his overmuch largers, and his forgod formite and falle information of the gold. I doubt not bur there was matter of great importance, urged and enforced against him, feeing that the Commons delay in proceeding to his condemnation, was not long of his cause, but occasioned

And when he had rehearsed his noble feats of arms, and amplified them according to the M height of their worth in a most glorious and eloquent Oration, as one whose words were surable and answerable to his deeds: at the last he stript his breast bare, and shewed the scars there remaining of wounds received in the wars: and ever and anon looking to the Capitol, very often he called aloud upon Jupiter and the other Gods, to help him now in this extremity and peril of his state: and prayed that the same mind which they had given him to defend the Capitol cliff, and even to the lafegard of the people of Rome, they would vouchiafe the same people, in this difirefs of his woful calamity: beleeching them both all and some, to look up to the cliff, and to the Capitol, to turn themselves toward the Gods there, and so to proceed to judgement of him. All the whiles the people were cited and called by their Centuries, and the prisoner stretched forth y his hands, and converted his prayers from men to the Gods; the Tribuns evidently law that unless they freed the eyes of the people from beholding the memorial of so great a desert, it would never be that fo long as their minds were thus forestalled and possessed with that benefit of his, they would find the enditement, were it never to true. So the matter being put off and deferred to another day, the people were summoned to assemble in the grove Petelinus, without the gate Flumentana, from whence they might not have a fight of the Capitol. There the accusation prevailed more than compassion, and the matter went against him: and so with hard and obdurat hearts, they propounced a heavy and dolorous fentence, and which the very judges themselves had in horror. Some there be that fay there were Duumvirs ordained for the purpose, to make inquifition and fit upon this treason against the State. Thus being condemned the Tribuns caused K him to be thrown headlong down the rock Tarpeia. Which place was the felf fame that yeelded to that one man a monument and memorial both of fingular glory, and also of extream punishment and ignominious death. After his death there remained two infamous marks behind him of shame: the one publick, occasioned by his dwelling house. For whereas it was situate, where now the chappel and work-house, or mint-house of Monet a standerh, an Act was proposed unto the people. That none of the Senators linage should dwell on the cliff or Capitol Mount. The other proceeding more properly from his own line and kinred: For that by a general decree of the house of Manlii it was provided, That none of that family and race should ever after bear the name of M. Manlius. This was the end of him, who, but that he was born in a free City, had been a right worthy and renowned man.

lence also which ensued soon upon, for that there could be no causes known of so great mortality, was imagined of many a man, to have grown upon the execution of Manlins: arguing thus. That the Capitol was pollited with the blood of the Saviour thereof: and the Gods took no delight and pleasure to have (as it were) presented unto their eyes, the punishment of that man, by whose means their Temples had been delivered out of the hands of the enemies. Upon this plague and scarcity of corn withal, and the common brute that spread abroad both of the one and the other, there enfued the year following many wars, when as L. Valerius the fourth time, A. Mantius the third time, Ser. Sulpi ins the third time, L. Lucretius , L. Emplius the third time, and M. M. Trebonius were Tribuns Military in Confuls authority. For besides the Volscians, who by destinie were appointed for ever in a manner to buly and keep occupied the Roman fouldiers; besides the Colonies Circeia and Velitre, which a long time were about to rebel; besides Latium, that stood in doubtful terms and was suspected, the Lanuvines also, who had been a most fast and loyal City, all of a fudden role and became new enemies. The LL, of the Senat supposing all this grew upon contempt, for that the revolting of the Veliterns, who were their natural citizens, had so long time escaped punishment, decreed with all speed to move the people to denounce and proclaim open war against them. And to the end that the Commons might be more forward in this

Military fervice; they created certain Quinqueviri for the division of the Pomptine Lands: and Triumviri for the planting of a colony at Neper. Then they propounded unto the people, that N they would appoint and determine of the war to be made. And notwithstanding the Tribuns of the Com, laboured earnestly, but all in vain, to distinade, yet the tribes throughout generally granted it, and gave their voyces for war. All that year passed in preparations only, but no army fer forth by reason of the plague: which protracting of time and long delay, gave the inhabitants of the Colonies respit to sue unto the Senat for peace. Many of them were inclined and stood thus affected, to fend a folemn embaffage with humble supplication to Rome: but that (as commonly it falleth out) the publick peril was entangled and interessed with the jeopardy of some privatpersons: and the authors of the backshiding and revolt from the Romans, searing less they alone should bear all the blame and be delivered up as a facrifice to fatisfy the wrath of the Romans, turned away clean and alienated the Colonies from all consultation of seeking for peace. And not of only in their Councel-House was this Embassage then crossed, but many of the Commons also they excited to invade the territories of Rome, to drive booties, and make fooil. This new wrong by them offered, clean put them by all hope of peace. In that year was the first rumour raised, concerning the Rebellion also of the Prenestines. And when the Tusculans, Gabines, and Lavicanes, into whose marches they had made inrodes, complained unto the Senat, and laid much matter against them they received at their hands so calm and cold an answer, that it seemed they gave less credit to their complaints, because these were not willing they should prove true.

The year following, Sp. and L. Papirins, new Tribuns Military with Confuls authority, led the legions to Velire, whole four Collegues, Ser, Cornelius Malaginensis the fourth time, Q. Servilius, C. Sulpitius, L. Emplius the fourth time, were left Tribuns behind for defence of the City; and for fear left they should hear some intelligence of new and sresh stirs out of Herraria, where they inspected all would be naught. At Feliare they had the better hand of their enemies: there they found more Preneftins well neer , that came to fuccour , than the very Coloners themselves. For the City was to neer at hand, that it both gave the enemies occasion to flye the fooner and yeelded them the only place of lafe refuge, after they were fled. The Tribuns forbare to assault the Town, as well in regard of the dangerous enterprise, as also for that they n thought it not good to hold fight to the utter deftruftion of that Colony. Letters were diffat, hed to Rome with tidings of victory, implying more than informations against the Preneftins than the Veliterns. So by an Act of the Senat and affent of the people there was proclaimed war against the Preneftins; who in the year following joyned with the Volscians, and by force wan Satricum a Colony of the people of Rome, notwithstanding it was manfully and valiantly defended by the Townimen even to the laft; where most beattly and cruelly they exercised their vi- The cruely of ctory upon thole that they took priforiers, and pur them to the fword. The Romans took this the Prane. in a very ill part: and elected M. Furius Camillus Tribum Military the leventh time: who had for his companions in office, A. and Lucius Posthumius Regillensis, L. Furius and L. Lucretius, and M. Fabius Ambustus.

The Volician war was appointed to Camillus extraordinarily: and to affilt him therein, it fell to L. Furuss his lot, one of the State-Tribins, not fo much for the good of the Common-weal, as to minifer unto his fellow all matter of honour and renown: as well in publick, (for that he fet all upright again, which by the rashness of Lucius was fain down) as allo in private, for that out of his errour and mildoing Marcus Furius, tather fought for thanks and love at his hands, than aimed at any vain glory to himself. Camillus was now far grown and slept in years and very aged, and when in the affembly for Election, he was about to take the usual form of oath, for to excuse his seeble and erasy body, the people with one consent would not permit him. How beit for all his age, he caried a lively spirit and shifty courage with him still: his senses were all fresh and found: and the late civil affairs had filtred him up and gave him an edge, who now had no D great mind to manage martial exploits. So he gathered a power of four legions , confifting of 4000. apiece, and made proclamation that all his forces should be ready the next day, at the gate Efquilina, and then he put himselfin his journy to Satricum. The enemy who had won the better by ods, expected and flayd his coming there. And fo foon as heuiderflood that the Romans approached, forthwith came into the field 2 minding without delay to put it to an hazard and try it out : prefuming, that the skill of the Romans General, were he never so ingular (in whom their enemies only trusted) would little or naught avail, in regard they were so few in number. The Roman army was as hot as they, and one of their Generals as forward every way. And presently without any stay, had they tried the fortune of a battel, but for the policy and rule E of one man; who by holding off, and protracting time of fight, fought fo to help himlest through good order and skill. But so much the more the enemy urged still, and was more sharp set : so as now he not only ranged his men before his own camp in battel array, but also set forward into the mids of the field: and advancing himself with entigns displayed, neer unto the trench and rampier of his enemies, made a proud bravado and fliew of his thrength, wereupon he bare himself to considently. This could the Roman souldiers hardly endure : and L. Furius one of the Tribuns Military, had more ado by far to digeft and put up that at the enemies hand. And a venturous Knight he was, both by reason of his youthful years and natural disposition: and also puffed up with hope of the multitude, which commonly taketh heart, and prefumeth upon smalleft grounds, and buildeth upon greatest uncertainties. And the souldiers being of themselves al-F ready hot enough, he inflamed and set them more on fire, by elevating and making light of his fellows reputation, in regard of his old age, the only thing that he could alledge: giving out ever and anon, "That wars were for young-men, that mens hearts flourished and saded as their L Farius to hid "bodies did; which was feen in Camillus, who of a most valorous and forward warrior, was fouldiers. "now become a draw-back and a temporifer, and one that would take his leifure: and he that ec was wont, to soon as he came to a place, with the first assault to win Forts and strong Towns, " now within his mures and rampier fat still and trifled out the time. And what hopes had he? "Dreameth he, that either his own power should encrease, or his enemies strength decrease? What occasion, what opportunity of time, what place of vantage for ambush laid he for? "Tush, there policies and inventions of the good old man, are cold and dull, God wor. In faith,

With these and such like words he had drawn away the whole camp after him: and when from all parts thereof, they called hard, and cryed for battel; "We are not able (quoth he) M. Fritus to L. And this one thing would I crave at the hands of the im-" mortal Gods, that some notable mishap befal not, to make my former counsel good and praise-"worthy. But neither would men be ruled by his advise so profitable and wholesome, nor the Gods vouchfafe to hear his prayers so holy and devout. Then Lucius Furius, the author and principal perswader of battel, setteth the vangard in array. Camillus he fortifieth the Regiments and Squadrons for supply in the rereward: but above all, he placeth a strong guard before the camp. Himself took up his standing on a higher place, to behold and mark the issue of another mans counsel. So foon as at the first brunt and encounter, they rustled and made a noise with their armour, the enemies on purpose (of policy, and not for fear) gave footing and lost ground, Now, there was behind them on their back a prety rising of an Hill, between their camp and the battel: K and by reason that they were well stored of men, they had left behind them in the camp certain frong companies armed and well appointed: with this instruction that whiles both armies were hard in fight, and when their enemies should come neer their trench and rampier, they might fally out on a fudden upon them. The Romans following out of measure upon the enemies as they retreated, were drawn upon the disadvantage of the ground, and gave occasion and fit opportunity unto the enemy to iffue out of the camp upon them. So the terror returned upon the supposed victors, by reason both of the new supplies of the enemies, and also of the fall and descent of the Hill: and forced the battel of the Romans to give back. The Volscians that charged them from out of the camp, and were fresh and lusty, pressed hard upon them: they also that made as though they fled, began now to fight again. The Romans fouldiers forgetting now both their late lufti- r. ness, and their ancient honour, retired not easily and softly in good order, but plain turned their backs on all fides, fled amain by heaps, and ran away toward their own camp. Whereat Camillus being by them that attended about his person, mounted upon a good Courser, and with all the speed he could make, opposing the Squadrons of the rere ward against the enemy: " Is this quoth "he) the fight, you fouldiers, that ye so called for? what God, what man can ye lay the weight "on now? It was your raffiness and fool-hardiness afore: and it is your dastardly cowardise "now, and nothing elfe, that is the tause of all this. Followed ye have already one General. At the first they were ashamed, and M flayd themselves from farther flight: but after that they saw once the enfigns wheel about, and the Squadrons turn again, they made head, and charged the enemy amain. And the General encouraged one another, fo as with a cheerful and lively shout, the whole field rang again. Neither was the other Tribun behind hand for his part: but being fent by his Collegue unto the Horsemen (whiles he in the meantime marshalled again the Footmen in order) not by way of chiding (for what might he avail thereby, fo long as he was himself in fault as well as the rest?) but laying afide all Lordly command, fell wholly to entreating, and befought them both all and N fome to quit themselves like men, and acquit him of the guilt and blame of that unlucky dayes L. Well was it seen by the happy event, that valorous endeavours speed ever well, For the Volscians the same way that erewhile they made semblance of giving ground upon a counterfeit fear now fled in good sadness as hard as they could. A great number both in the conflict, and after in the chase were slain. As for the rest that remained in the camp, which presently at one brunt was won, more of them were taken prisoners than killed. a State-Tribuns. And upon examination, confelled flatly, that they ferved by the publick warrant of the City. Camillus herewith disquieted, for fear of war from to neer neighbors, faid he would forth with have those prisoners with him to Rome, that the Lords of the Seriat might not be ignorant how the Tusculans were revolted from their society. In the mean while, his brother Tribun might, if he fo pleased, have the regiment of the leaguer, and the holf. That days work had caught him now, not re prefer his own ways before the better counter of another. And ver neither he himselfe, nor any man else in the army, thought that Camillus would quietly digelf this fault of his, whereby the State of the Commonwealth was driven upon to dangerous a point of downfal. And as wel in the holt, as also at Rome, it was rife and current in every mans mouth: B that whereas the fight with the Volk ians was variable, and the lervice doubtful : for the ill fpeed, the discomfiture, and the running away, L. Puring was all in fault: but for the good success, Camillus only had all the honour. When the captives were brought into the Councel House, and the Lords of the Senat were of opinion and determined war against the Tukulans, and had laid the charge thereof upon Camil-Lue, he requested to have an affirmant joined with him in Commission: and being left to his own choice to take whom he would of all his Companions in office, contrary to all mens expectation.

he choic L. Furius. By which moderation of his affections, and good carriage of himself, he both delayed the intamy of his Collegue, and wan himfelf great glory and commendation. Yet for all this, proceeded not they to any war with the Tusculans. For they by their constant observation The prudent of peace, kept off the violence of the Romans, which by force of arms they had not been able, diffimulation When the Romans entred and invaded their territory, they went not fo much as out of those of the Tulcuplaces that lay neer the high way, whereas the enemy marched: they forlet not the tilling of their lans: grounds, but kept the gates of their City wide open, came forth folemnly in their long gowns to meet with the LL, Generals in the way, and brought victuals right courteously to serve the army, as well out of the City as Country, Camillus having pitched down his tents before the gates, and defirous to know, whether there were the same appearance of peace within the wals as bare show abroad in the Country, entred the City: and feeing the doors flanding open, the shop-windows up, all kind of wares fet out to fale upon the bulks: the Craft men and Artifans bufily every one occupied at his work: the Grammar schools ringing again with a chirm of scholars, learning and p saying their lessons: the streets full of women and children amongst the other common people going to and fro about their business: he could perceive no where about him any thing that carried a refemblance of fearful men, no, nor so much as of those that made any wonder at their coming in that warlike order. Thus call he his eyes into every corner feeking where this war should be. For there was not so much as any token to be seen, either of ought removed out of the way, or brought in place, upon this prefent occasion; but all in so fetled quierness and peace, as if they had fearcely heard any inkling or rumor of hostility. Being therefore overcome with this parience and sufferance of the enemies, he caused their Senat to assemble unto whom he spake in this wife: "Ye alone to this day of all that I know, O Tufculans, have found the only armor of camillus to the " proof, and the forcible fense indeed, to lave your selves and all ye have from the Romans ire. At the very inftant they obtained peace; and not long after, the right of free burgeofie, to be made Citizens of Rome. So the Legions were withdrawn back again from Tufculum. Thus Camillus having won great honor by his policy and valour both, in the Volscian war: by his happy success in the journey of Tusculum: by his singular patience and carriage H of himself, toward his companion in government, as well in the one place as the other, went out of his Magistracy: there being created Tribuns Military for the next year, L. Valeriss the fifth time. and Pub. Valerius the third time, C. Servilius the third time, Licinius Menenius the lecond time. P. Papirius, Serg. Cornelius Maluginensis.

There was this year need of Cenfors also, by reason especially of the doubtful rumors that ran concerning debts: whiles of the one fide the Tribuns of the Commons did aggravate the greatness thereof, and made it feem an odious matter: and they again of the other fide, did elevate and made litle of the same for whom it was good and beneficial, that the lent mony should be thought abroad, in danger of being loft: for that (fay they) the debtors cautelously rather would not than I for ability could not, keep their credit and make paiment. So there were created Cenfors, C. Sulpitist Camerinus, Sp. Posthumius Regislensis, And this matter now already commenced, was bro-ken off by the death of Posthumius, because it would have bred a scruple to chuse another Censor in the room of him deceased. When Sulpitius therefore had refigned up his place, it fell out so that other new Cenfors upon some error committed in their creation, exercised not their office: and to chuse a third time they made a scruple, so tender conscienced were they, as if the gods were not well pleased with that office for that year. But the Tribuns would not endure this deluding of The Tribunsof the Commons, but gave it forth that it was intollerable: faying, "That the Senat fought to avoid

"known; which might bewray and plainly shew, that one part of the City was even eaten up and

"devoured of the other: and in the mean time the poor Commons so deeply engaged, were pack"ed away, and sent forth against these enemies and those : and now without all regard and dis" cretion, they fought occasions to quarrel and make war in every place. From Antum to Satri-

"cum, from Satricum to Velitre, from thence to Tusculum have your Legions been posted, And

" now, forsooth, there is war intended against the Latins, Hernicks and Prenestins: for hatred er rather of the Citizenshere at home, then of the enemies abroad: and all to wear out the

"Commons with continual wars, and to afford them no breathing while within the City: that 66 in time of reflythey might remember and think upon their freedom, keep their rooms in com-

"mon assembly, where they might at the length hear their Tribuns voice pleading for the ease-1. "ment of usury, and for a final end of all injuries. But and if the Commons had the heart, and "carried that mind with them, as to call to remembrance their ancestors liberty, they would suf-"fer neither any Citizen of Rome to be awarded to bondage for debt, nor any musters for to be ta-"ken, until a view were made and just accompt had, of every man his debts, and some course ta-"kenfor abating the fame: that each man might know, what he had of other mens goods, what "remained of his own: whether his body were left free, or at the mercy of his creditor, to lie in "cold iron and baleful prison. This hire and salary of sedicion, this reward once propounded aforehand, flirred up (you may be fure) a mutiny foon after. For whereas there were many adjudged to be bound unto their Creditors, and the Senators had decreed new Legions to be believed. for the bruit and tumor that went of the Prenestin wars: both matters began to be hindred for M taking any effect, as well by the Tribuns help as the Commons accord. For neither would the Tribuns suffer those that were condemned to be led to prison: nor yet the younger fort of the Commons, enter their names in the Muster-master his book. And the Senators for the prefent, less minded the execution of judgement for the Creditors behoof, then the mustering. For why? News came already, that the enemies had put themselves in their journey from Preneste, and were encamped in the Sabins country: And all this while, the very tidings hereof rather quickned and provoked the Tribuns of the Commons to the broilthat was begun, than frighted them any jot from it. Neither would any thing serve to quench the sedition in the City, until the wat was come in manner to the very walls. For the Preneftins had intelligence given them, that in Rome there was no army gathered, no General certainly known: the Senators and Commons N at jar and together by the ears. Their Captains herenpon, taking this advantage and opportunity, with a running camp invaded, spoiled and wasted the fields all afore them as they went and came with banners displayed before the gate Cullina. Great fear was in the City, every man cried Alarm, ran up to the walls to man them, and to the gates to ward them. And at the last they left their mutinies, turned to the wars, and created T. Quintius Cincinnatus Dictator, He appointed for his General of horsemen, A. Sempronius Atroniuss. This was not so soon voiced abroad, (so great a terror went always with that magistrate) but the enemies withal dislocged and departed from the walls: and the younger fort of the Romans, without any trifling and drawing back, upon the proclamation, gathered together. Whiles forces were thus arising at Rome, the enemies pitched their camp not far from the River Allia: and as they for raged the O Country all about, they bragged and vaunted among themselves, that they had got that very plot of ground, which was ever fatal to the destruction of the City of Rome. "Here wil bessay they the " like fight, from hence wil they fly no doubt, as sometimes they did before in the Gauls war. For "if the Romans feared that dismal and unlucky day, noted with the infamous name of this place; who w much more wil they dread the river Allia it felf, in memorial of their fo great overthrow, er than the only bare day Alliensis? Certainly, when they are come hither, they will think they see 46 again the grim looks and hear the hideous voices of thole favage Gauls. Thus rolling & toffing

The fixth Book of T. Livius. A with themselves these toyish conceits, rising of as vain and foolish presumptions, they rested wholly and reposed their full hope in the lucky perswasion only of the place. The Romans contrariwife knew full well, that their enemies the Latins, were (wherefoeter they were) the very same men fill, and no other, whom for the space of one hundred years they held peaceably and quiet-Iv as their devoted vaffals in jubjection, And as for the place noted indeed, for the memorial of that late defeat and lois sustained, it might rather flir them up and set an edge upon them to abolish and cancel the remembrance of that shameful digrace, then put them in fear, that any ground should be so unfortunat, as to be a bar unto their victory. Nay, if the very Gaulsthemfelves came now in their way, they would so fight with them even in that ground, as they B did at Rome, in the recovery of their country: as they did the morrow after at Gabii: when they bare themselves so valiantly, that no one enemy that entred within the walls of Rome, went ever home again to tell news how they fped, well or ill. Thus on both fides being resolute, and couragiously bent, they met at Allia. The Roman Distator discovering the enemies arranged in battel array, within light. "See you not (quoth he) O A. Sempronius, how they have flayed at Allia, " presuming upon the luckiness of the place? No surer confidence, no greater help may they have, "I pray God. But you, with truthy armor, keen weapons, and doughty courage fet spurs to horse, " gallop amongst the thikest of their main battel with your horsemen, I, with the legions on foot "will advance mine Enfigns, and display them, in their faces, and charge them hotly when they "are disbanded once, and put infear. Assist us now, and aid us, O ye gods (the witnesses of our C "league) and punish them duly for their deserts, both in dishonouring your divine Majesty, and de eiving us in your name, whom they called folemnly to witness. Neither horsemen not footmen could the Preneftins abide, but at the very first shout and shock were the ranks broken And seeing their Battaillons in no place whole and kept together, they fled; and amazed as they were in that confused fear, and carryed away beyond their own camp, they stayed not running for life until by good footmanship they were come within the fight of Prenifte. There all such as had been scattered in the flight, mer together, and chose a plot of ground, to tortifie in that haste as well as they could: lest peradventure, if they had put themselves within the town, forthwith their villages should have been fired, and after all consumed and spoiled, the town also might fortune to be besieged. But when the Roman Conqueror after the risling of their camp at Allia, was n once come toward them and discovered, they abandoned that Fort allo, and gat within the town Preneste, thinking themselves scarce safe enough within the walls thereof. Eight towns besides there were under the feignory of the Prepefiins, against which the Dictator warred round: and having won them all, one after another without much ado, he brought his army against Velitre, and got that town also by assault. Then came be to the principal head and very seat town of the war, Preneste, which was not by force won, bur by surrender, yeelded up into his hands. And T. Quintins thus having obtained one victory in a, pight field, won two camps and holds of the enemies, conquered by force nine towns, and regained Prenefte surrendered unto him, returned home again to Rome. In his triumph he carried aloft the Image of Tupuer, furnamed Emperor, which he brought from Preneste, and set it up in the Capitol, where it was placed and dedicated be-E tween the shrines of Jupiter and Minerva; and in a table of brass fixed under it, was the monument of this noble exploit recorded and engraven in these or such like words: [T. Quintins Di-Etator, by the gracious help of Jupiter, and all the reft of the gods, won nine Towns. So on the 20, day after his creation, he refigned up his Dictatorship. Then was the affembly holden for electing of Tribuns Military with Coff authority, who were equally chosen from our of the Nobility and the Com. Of Nobles were created, P, and C. Manling, with L. Julius. The Commons yeelded C. Sextilius, M. Albinus, and L. Amiftius, Upon the two Manlii, for that in blood and degree they were above the Commoners, and for favour more gracious then Julius, the province of the Volicians was bestowed extraordinarily, without cashing lots or parting together by agreement of the Collegues amongst them elves. Which both they them-F selves rued, and the Senators also (that would have it so repented afterwards, For without any espials, sent out aforehand to icourthe coasts, they had set forth certain cohorts or companies (of footmen)a forraging, and when upon a falle alarm that those were beset & intrapped they marched themselvs apace after to their rescue & convoy, & kept not with them stil the reporter of these tidings (who being indeed a Latin and an enemy, but difguied in the habit of a Romanfouldier. had deceived them) they fel headlong into a train and ambushment laid of purpose for them. And whiles they made resistance with main force only in a ground of great diadvantage (giving & saking the like measure) they were killed & slain on either side. But in the mean time their enemies from another quarter entred the camp of the Romans lying open in the plain. Thus in both places, things went but badly and untowardly, & all through the rashness and unskillulness of the leaders. G And what remained unfoiled for the fortune of the people of Rome, that was preferred by the hardy and resolute valor of the Roman souldiers only, without the help of general and commander. Upon which news reported at Rome, at the first it was thought good to chuie a Dictator; but afterwards, when tidings came, that all was whole & the Volicians quiet, and that it was well leen they knew not how to use a victory when they had it, norto take the opportunity of the time, whiles it offered it telf both the Generals & the army were tent for home from thence & fo for the Volk ians they were at rest afterwards. Only in the very end of the year, ther arose some new thir & sudden tumult by reason that the Prenestins having sollicited the people of the Latins, entred into rebellion again. In the same year thomen of Seria made moan of them elves for want of people, H and thither new Coloners were assigned to inhabit there.

Albeit the Romans sped but badly in wars, yet the quietness at home was some comfort : which the Tribuns Military chosen from out of the Commons had procured by reason that they were fo gracious and reverenced among those of their own coat and faction. All the beginning of the year following, was at the first on a light fire with hor discord and mutiny, when Sp. Furins. Quinting Servilius the second time, Licinius Menenius the third time, P. Clalius, M. Horatius and L. Geganius were Tribuns Military with Confuls authority. The matter and cause of which seditions broils, were the debts above specified. For the due inquisition wheref, and to know to what fums they amounted, Sp. Servilius Prifeus, and Clalius Siculus were made Centors, but stopped 1 they were for doing any thing by occasion of wars. For first fearful messengers in all halte brought word, and after, the flight of the Country people confirmed it, that the legions of the Volicians were entred into the confines, and fell to spoiling every where the territory about Rome. Norwithflanding which fear and forraign terror, to little were the civil discords appealed, that contrariwise the Tribuns of the Commons extended their power with more violence to hinder the levy of fouldiers, until they had indented and capitulated with the Senators, that fo long as the wars lasted, no man should either contribute and be charged with any impost, or be sued in any action of debr. When the Com, took hold once of this eatement and liberty, the musters were delayed no longer. And after they had levied and enrolled two new legions, it was thought convenient that the legions should be divided, and two armies sent forth into the Volscians Country. So Fu- K rius and M. Horatius, went on the right hand along the sea coast to Antium. Q. Servilius and L. Geganius on the left hand, by the way of the mountains to Ecetra. But on neither fide met they with the enemy. Whereupon they fell to forraging the Country, not here and there in scattering wife, as the Volicians had done, after the manner of robbers, at starts upon advantage taken of their enemies discord, and by flealth for fear of their valour: but being a full power and army of men, and justly provoked to anger, the longer they continued there, the fouler work they made. For the Volicians standing in fear, lest in the mean while they should be encountred with a power from Rome, had made roads only into the utmost frontiers; But contrariwise, the Romans made flay in the enemies land, the father to train them forth and draw them to a field-fight. Having therefore burned up, in a manner, all the uplandish houses and granges, and some villages I. alfo, and left behind them no fruitful tree standing, nor the fown corn for hope of grain, and driven away whole booties ofmen, women, and cattel, which they could light on without the walls; they reduced their armies of both fides home again to Rome. In this mean while the debtors had fome little respit to breath themselves in, But so soon as all was quiet from enemies abroad, they began a fresh to be sued and troubled by their creditors at home. And so small hope they had to be released of their old usury, that they fell into a new, by reason of a contribution collected toward a wall, which the Cenfors had fet out to be made of square Ashler stone. To yeeld unto this imposition and burden, the Commons were driven, because there was no muster for the Tribuns of the Commons to hinder. Forced they were likewise through the might and power of the great men, to admit for Tribuns military, all of the Nobility, to wit, L Emylius, P. Valerius the M fourth time, C. Veturius, Servius Sulpitius, L. and C. Quintii Cincinnatii.

By the fame strong hand also they prevailed so much, that without impeachment of any man, all the younger fort took the military oath, to that they levied three armies against the Latins and Volícians: who joining their legions together, had encamped themselves at Satricum; One army was gathered for the defence of the City: another to be fet out against all sudden wars, if haply elsewhere some tumult should arise: & a third, of all other the strongest, was under the conduct of P. Valerius, and L. Æmylius, led to Satricum. Where, finding the enemies embattelled in good array upon a plain & even ground, they charged upon them prefently. But ere that they had got the victory evidently in fight, and were but only in some good hope of having a fair day of their enemies, the rain so poured down with huge storms and tempells, that it parted both hosts afunder, N The morrow after began a fresh conflict. And for a good while, the legions of the Latins especially, which by long alliance with the Romans had learned their manner of warfare, flood to it as valiantly, and feed as fortunatly as the Romans. At length, the Roman horsemen that road in amonest them, brake their ranks; and when they were once disarrayed the footmen displayed their enfigns, and advanced upon them and look how much the Romans battel fet forward. fo much the enemies gave backward. But when they began once to faint in their fight, than the violence of the Romans was intollerable. Thus the enemies were discomfitted and scattered: and flying not toward their camp, but to Satricum, which was two miles off, they were by the horsemen especially beaten down, trod under foot and slain. Their tents were taken and rifled. From S4tricim they dislodged, the next night after the battel was fought and marched in great haste (as if O they fled) to Antium. And albeit the Roman army followed them by the tracks hard at heeles, yet their footmanship served them better in their fear, than it did the Romans for all their anger, So the enemies put themselves within the town walls, before the Romans could overtake them, and either out off the tail of their rereward or force them to flav. After this, some days were spent in wasting the Country. For neither were the Romans sufficiently provided with warlike engins of battery and artillery to affail their walls, nor they well appointed to abide battel in plain field. Then arose some discord within the town, between the Latins and the Antiats. The

Antiats,

A Antiats, of one fide wearied with calamities that follow long wars, wherewith all their life time they had been exercised even to their old age, were of mind to yeeld. The Latins by reason of their lare revolt and rebellion (whiles after follong peace, their courages continued yet fresh) were more forward and earnest to maintain wars still. But when they saw on both sides that they might do as they purposed, and follow their own detignments, without being hindered one of another, their ftrife was foon ended. So the Latins leaving their fellowship & society of peace, so unhonest & difhonourable (as they thought it) departed from them, and flood out fill to revenge their own quarrels. But the Antiats being well rid of these Councellors of their, to cross unto all wholsome courses, tending to their good and safety, yeelded up their town and country to the Roman- But B the anger and furious rage of the Latins, for that they could neither annoy the Romans by wars. nor keep the Volscians still in arms, brake out thus far, that they fired the City Satricum, which had been the first place of refuge, after their defeat and unhappy fight. Neither left they any house in that City standing, but set fire upon all indifferently, as well profane as holy editices: onely the Church of Dame Mainta they spared. From which, it was neither any religion and conscience of their own, nor fear of the gods that kept them, but (as men report) a fearful voice heard out of the Temple with heavy threats, unless they held their hands, and kept them far enough from burning the facred habitations to impioufly. In this rage and mad fit of theirs, to Tulenlum they go: for very spight that they toriaking the general counsel of the Latins, had not onely veelded themselves to be in league with the Romans, but also became incorporate Citizens C with them. And coming upon them on a sudden, while their gates were open, at the first shour the whole Town, all but the Castle, was surprized. The Townsmen with their Wives and Children were thither fled : and fent meffengers to Rome with certificat to the Senat of this Conducts were that the second of the second befieging and befieged. And whiles of the one fide they intended the defence of the walls, on the other fide affaulted the Castle, at one time they were afraid themselves, and put others in sear likewise. But the coming of the Romans wrought a great change and alteration in the hearts of both parties. For it caused the Tuiculans offearful men to become exceeding cheerful: and the D Latins who made full reckoning to win the fortrels out of hand, as being mafters already of the town, had but small hope now to help and save themselves. The Tusculans they set up a great shout from the Castle : and answered it was again with a greater from the Roman army. The Latins were put to it hard on both fides: For neither were they able to abide the violence of the Tusulans running down the hill upon them, nor to put by and keep off the Romans, coming hard under the walls, and affaying to break the bars of the gares. First, they scaled the walls and and gar upon them: after, they brake the port-cullis down. Thus the Latins environed with enemies both before and behind, that pressed fore upon them, having neither strength enough left to sight, not room of ground to make an escape, were slain in the midst between the enemies, every more terrs for. So when Tusculum was recovered out of the enemies hands, the army was Ebrought back again to Rome.

But the more quietness there was that year without the City by reason of prosperous wars, the more encreased the violence and hard dealing of the Senators within: and the calamities of the Commons grew every day more than other, Forthey waited means and were not able to pay for the interest that needs must be paid. Whemothing therefore was to be had, to make paiment out of their goods, they were adjudged and awarded to fatisfie their creditors in their body and name: and so their punishment served in stead of keepingtheir credit and discharging the consideration. Whereupon, not only the meanest of the Commons, but also the very chief, began now to let fall their hearts and stoop so low, that there was not a witry and nimble headed man and of experience amongst them, that would put himselfforth to stand to be a Tribun Military, in F concurrence with the Nobles, (which they had so earnessly short at and laboured for) no, nor so much as to bear and sue for any offices of the Commons, So as the Senators now, seemed to have recovered again for ever to themselves, the possession of that dignity, which the Commons of late, for some sew years, had suspeed and occupied over their heads. But that this order side might not joy too much hereat, a simal occurrent happed between which (as it salleth out most commonly) gave the occasion and first socians to an enterprize of much importance.

M. Fabius Ambufus a great and mighty man, as well amongh those of his councilling, as also with the Commons (whom he was reputed never to despite, as other did of his condition and efface) had two daughtersmarried forth: the elder unto Servius Sulpiins: the younger unto C. Licinius Stolo, a man verily of good worth and reckoning, but yet a Commoner. And Fabius differed adming nor this alliance and affinity, wan himself much love and favour among the Commons. Now it fell out to, that these fifters were upon a time togethet in the house of Servius Sulpiins, then Trib Military: and as they passed the time away (as the manner is) in much good talk, disconfing one with another of many matters, it chanced that a Sergeant or Verger of Sulpiins, at what time as he was coming home from the Forum or comon hal, tapped as the order was, with his tod at the door. When the yonget Fabia not acquainted with those fashions was therat somewhat amazed, her fifter making a wonder at her ignorance, laught her to scorn, But that laughter (as womens minds gor wor, are soon kindled with a lite) set her awork & hammered in her head,

Befides, the train of many that came about her, wairing and giving attendance, ready to know her w pleasure and what she would, mended the matter much. I suppose she thought her fifter happily wooded, and repented her own marriage; upon an ill and finifter judgment, whereby every man repineth that his neighbor and necreft of kin especially, should go beyond him and do better then he. Upon this discontentment and fresh heart-burning of hers, her father haply seeing her dismaid. asked her whether all was well at home? But when the would have turned the cause of her grief another way, (for that it flood neither with her love and kindness towards her fifter, to envy her effate; nor yet with the reverent honor that the was to yeeld unto her husband, to find fault with her own) he with mild questioning came about her so, that he drew from her the truth: so as the confessed her grief to arise upon this, that she was disparaged; and namely, married not accor- I ding to her quality, but into an house uncapable both of worship and favour. Then Ambustus, comforting his daughter, willed her to be of good cheer, and faid, That ere it were long, the should see the same state, the same advancement and dignity at home, which she had seen already in her fifters house. Hereupon began he to plot with his son in law, joyning also unto them, L. Sextius, a flour young man, and one that was like enough to come to preferment, but that he was not of noble race. Good occasion and opportunity they seemed to have of compassing some alteration in the State, by reason of the excessive debts that men were grown into; for the redresfing and easing of which malady, the Com. had no other hope, but in advancing some of themfelves into the foveragen room of government. They thought it needful therefore, prefently to address themselves to the execution of these designments, considering that by endeavor and indu-K ftry the Commoners were climbed to that degree already, from when eif they would enforce and put themselves forward, they had but one step more unto the highest, and might be equal with the Nobles, as well in honour as in vertue and proweffe. And for the prefent, it was thought good to make them, two Trib. of the Com. in which office they might open a way unto themselves, for other dignities, So C. Licinius and L. Sex. proposed laws, all tending to abate the power and might of the Nobles, and wholly for the good and benefit of the Com, One, as touching taking order for debts: That when so much was defaulked and deducted out of the principal, as had been paid for the use and interest, the residue should be discharged by even portions in 3, years A fecond, concerning a proportion and quantity of lands, That no man might hold in pofferfion above 500 acres. The third, That from thenceforth there should be no election of Trib, Military, I but of Cost, provided always, that one of them be chosen out of the Com. Matters all of right great weight and confequence, and fuch as without exceeding firite and contention, could not possibly be carried and obtained. Thus when all those things aronce lay a bleeding, and were in hazzard to be loft which the whole world unmeasurably coveteth and longeth after, to wit, land, money, and promotions, the Senators were put in a bodily fear, and began to flattle, And laying their heads together both in publick confultation and privat conference, they could devide no other remedy, but that which in many commotions already they had tried, namely, the stepping between and negative voice of some of the Tribuns. And so, to cross those bills aforesaid put up by these two Tribuns, they had wrought and made to their purpose certain of their own brotherhood. Who fo foon as they saw the wards and tribes called forth by Licinius and Sextius, to give their suffra-M ges, being well backed and guarded with the affiftance of the Senators, would fuffer neither those laws to be read, nor any other befides (as yearly they used) to pass by the voices of the Commons. Thus the two Tribuns aforefaid, having oftentimes (but ever in vain) affembled the people together, and seeing their laws still nipped, as it were, in the head for ever going forward; "It is veer ry well (quoth Sextins) and fince ye like fo well that these inhibitions may prevail so much: "we will likewife defend the Commons with the same weapon and no other. Go to now my "Masters of the Nobility, proclaime an election for the creation of Trib, Military: I will make * I fabid. It "I trow, that this word [* Veto] shall do your selves no good at all: howsoever now ye takeso was the nega- " great pleafure to hear our brethren keep that note still, and evermore sing that sweet concent of "musick. And surely, those threats proved indeed to good earnest and took effect. For there was N no election at all but of Ædiles and Tribuns, and those both of the Commons. For Licinius and Sextim being chosen Tribuns again, suffered no Magistrates of the Chair, or of State, to be created. Which defect and desolation of soveraign Magistracy continued in the City for the space of five years: whiles the Commons for their part chose the same two Tribuns still, and they again ever laid a bar and put in a caveat against the election of Tribuns Military.

All other wars, as good hap was, were afleep for the time. The Coloners only of Velitre, upon fo long rest and quietness began to be lusty and wax wanton : and for that there was no army of the Romans firring abroad, they not only made inrodes fundry times into the territory of Rome, but also affailed the town Tusculum. And when the Tusculans, the ancient Allies and new enfranchised Citizens of Rome craved help, the Senators and Commons both, were moved especi- O ally for very shame to succour them. And the Tribuns of the Commons yeelded at length, and permitted an affembly for election, to be holden by an Inver-regent: and Trib, Military there were created, L. Furius, A. Manlins, Ser. Sulpitins, Ser. Cornelins, A. and C. Valeriis Who found not the Commons so tractable in the must ering, as they were pliable in giving their voices at the Election. Yet after much ado & great contention they levied an army, and fet forward on their journey: drave the enemies not from Tufculum only, but forced them within their own walls: belieged Veliere more straightly a great deal, and in more forcible manner, than Tulculum had been by them.

A Howbeit, they that began the fiege were not able to win the town. For before that time, were new Tribuns Military cholen, Q. Servitius, C. Venerius, A. and M. Cornelius, Q. Quintius, M. Fa-bius. Neither performed these Tribuns any notable exploit at Veture. But the State at home shoot in more dangerous terms than before, For belides that Sextims and Licinias; the publishers of those laws aforelaid, were now the eighth time made Trib. of the Commons again, Fabius alfo a Tribun Military, Stolo his wives father, was feen openly in the action, to fet forward and periwade for the same laws, which in very deed himself had devised. And whereas at the first, eight of the Colledge or Company of the Tribuns of the Commons, had croffed the proceeding of them; now there were but five left that shewed themselves, and those (as commonly they use to do that dif-B band from their own faction) like men bereaved of their wits and amazed, being indeed the congues and trunks that others spake by, pretended and made allegations in their prohibitions only as they wereichooled and taught their lessons at home : (to wit) That a great fort of the Commons were in the army at Velitre and ableint, and that the folemn Seffion or Assembly for enacting laws, ought to be adjourned until the return home of the fouldiers: to the end that all the Commons generally, might give their voices concerning their own commodity and benefit, Sex-Commons generative ment generated the Tribuns, and M. Fabius one of the Tribuns Military, Seeding and Lectures With part of their brethren Tribuns, and M. Fabius one of the Tribuns Military, Seeding and being their own traft mafters, knew well enough by fo many years experience, how to manage Lectulus aand handle the minds of the Commons and plied the chief of the Senators (produced forth before gainft the Sethe people) so hard with interrogatories of every particular that was proposed, that they weath-nators for the C ed and tired them out ; Demanding, "how they could require to be allowed themselves to not common peo-

Also, whether their will and pleasure was, that "the Commons oppressed with usury, should yeeld their bodies to bear irons and suffe, torment, "unless they paid the interest before the principal? And that daily by whol companies they should "be had away from the bar, condemned to thraldom; and Noble mens houses to become goals, "filled and peffered with prifoners? And wherefoever a Patritian dwelt, there should lea private " prison? These indignities and piteous matters to be heard, when they had with a loud voice D charged upon them, even before those that were afraid of the like measure themselves : with more indignation and distain of all that heard them, than they themselves shewed in the uttering and delivery: "But these Senators say they (and that they redoubled) will never make an end either " of getting those land fill into their hands, or polling and undoing the Commons with uffit, " until the Commons make once out of their body one Conful, for to be the maintainer and proer tector of their liberry. As for the Tribuns of the Commons, they were now just nothing let by: "as who by their priviledge of Inhibitions and negative voices, spoiled themselves and over-"threw their own power. And never will there be any indifferent and equal course taken, so long "as the Nobles keep the loveraign place of command, and the sword to firike whiles the poor cc Commons have only the buckler hand to ward all vennes. For unless the government be parted E "between both alike, the Commons shall never have their due and equal portion in the Com-"mon-weal. Neither is it reason that any man should fland contented with this only, that in the "Election of Confuls, the Commonsare eligible and capable of the dignity : for in case, it be not "concluded absolutly, that one Conful at the least should be of necessity a Commoner, there wil " never be any at all, Have ye forgotten already (fay they) that not with standing an Act made, That "there should be Tribuns Military created rather then Comults, for this intent that Commoners " might aspire and reach unto the chief place of honor; yet for all that in 44. years space, there  was not fo much as one of the Commoners chosen Tribun Military? And will any man believe "that they will of their own accord confer upon the Commons (when otherwise they may chuse) se that dignity in the disposing only of two places, who were ever wont in the making of Tribun H & Military, to take up eight rooms all wholly to themselves? And will they allow them a way the Consulship, who thus long have held the (Consular) Tribunship so guarded as no man "might have access thicket but themselves? Nay, it must be got by a positive law, which in their "Assemblies for Election, by favour and grace might not be obtained. One of the Consuls rooms er must be set aside, past all peradventure and question, and that for a Commoner, to enter into: " For as much as if it Rand Aill upon a choice, the mightier man will ever go away with the game 66 clear. And whereas heretofore they have been wont to alledge and fay, That the Commons af-"forded not sufficient and able men to beat the offices of the chair and of state: that, now cannot "be truely objected. "(fwaded, that the KK, are banished indeed out of the City, and their freedom; fully establish-"ed for ever to endure. For, from that dayforward shall the Commons be partakers of all those H "things, wherein the Nobles now furpals them: namely, foveraign rule and authority, martial "renown, parentage and Nobility: great ornaments doubtlefs, unto themselves to enjoy here in this life : but far greater to leave behind them unto their Children and Posterity. These and fuch like Orations when they faw to be plaufible, and willingly accepted, they preferred a new Statute, That in flead of the two Duumvirs for holy Ceremonies and matters of the Church, there might be chosen ten Decemvirs: Provided always, that one part of them should be created forth of the Commons, and another from among the Nobles. The Seffion for enacting of all those Laws, they deferred until the army was returned, which lay then at the fiege before I Velitre.

But the year was come about and fully expired, before the legions were reduced homefrom thence: and by that means the whole business about these new Laws, hung still in suspence, and was put offunto the entrance of the new Tribuns Military. As for the Tribuns of the Commons, the Commonalty choice the same again, even those twain who had been the proposers of those Laws. And the Tribuns Military were thefe, T. Quintius, Ser. Cornelius, Ser. Sulpitius, Sp. Servilius, L. Papirum, L. Veturius. Presently in the beginning of the year, they put unto the jump and final trial what should become of those Laws. And when as the Tribes were called, and none of the Tribuns Collegues stepped between to stop the proceeding of the Law-givers: the Nobles were afraid, and ran unto their two last helps, to wir, the highest and absolute of- K fice, and the greatest man among them. They thought it good therefore to create a Dictator. And M Furius Camillus was nominated, who elected unto him L. Amylius for General of the horse. The Law-makers likewise for their part, against so great preparation of their adversaries. armed at all parts the cause of the Commons, with stout stomack and couragious heart. And having aftembled an Hall of the Commons, they called forth the wardsto give their voices. At what time the Dictator accompanied with a great train of Nobles, full of wrath and menacing frowns, took his place and fet him down. And after the matter was canvaffed first, by the ordinary conflict of the Tribunsamong themselves, whiles some propounded, and others gainfaid the Law with their negatives voices; and that by how much in right the prohibition was the stronger, so much it was overweighed in favour and affection both of the Laws and Law- I givers : and when the first Tribes had given their voice (" Wirogais) affirmatively : then Camil: In For as much as (quoth he) O Quirites, yeare ruled now by the will and pleasure, and not by orm of an Afthe authority of the Tribuns, and as in times past ye obtained the priviledge of a negative voice firmative voice in their feruti. and *Intercession by your departure and Secession, so now ye make it void and nothing worth, even by the same force that ye got it by : I chosen Distator as well for your sake as for the whole The Oration Common-wealth will affilt your priviledge of Intercession and by mine absolute authority mainof M. But (all these big of the Tribuns words not with flanding) when the Tribuns of the Commons made but a tush there at, and went monsto deny never the less forward with their enterprize, then Camillus throughly angred indeed, fent his Listors and Sergeants to command the Commons to avoid the place and depart: Threatning withal, that if they proceeded thus, he would take a Military oath of all the younger people, and lead anarmy presently forth of the City. This put the Commons in a very great fright, but it set their Captains and Ring-leaders, rather in a greater heat of contention, than abated their courages one jot. And when he saw no relenting on either side he gave up his office: Whether it were that there was some error in his creation (as some have written) or because the Tribuns of the N Commons had put up a bill to the Commons, and they granted it: that if M. Furrus (as Dicta-*1250. (fierly tor) had proceeded to any action, he should have a round fine set on his head of 500000 * Asses, I know not certainly. But I believe that he was terrified upon some unlucky signs of the birds, rather then with any such strange Act never heard of before, and without precedent. And hereunto am I induced, both in regard of the disposition of the man so well given and of so good conscience, and also for that P. Munlius was immediatly named Dictator in his stead. For to what end should Marlins have been created Dictator for that broil and slir, wherein M. Farius had taken the foil before? Again feeing the fame M. Furius was Dictaror the next year following, doubtless, he would never for shame have resumed that office, wherein the year before he had received the foil and dilgrace, to be so overruled. Over and besides, at the same time when as this bill was O supposed to have been preferred, concerning his fine. either he might have withstood it too, (whereby he saw himself to be bridled) or eite he had not been able to have hindred so much as those, for which this also was proposed. Finally, it was never seen to this day wherein we live, so long as the Tribuns and Confuls with their factions and parts-taking have been at variance and debate with all their might and main, but evermore the authority of the Dichator controlled them all, and put them down.

Between the former Dictatorship of Camillus now resigned up, and the new by Manlius accep-

A red and begun, there was an affembly of the Commons fummoned by the Tribuns, in time as it were of a vacancy or Interreign: wherein the overture was made and evidently it was feen which of the laws proposed the Commons liked better, and which the Law-givers. For those that concerned usury and land, they granted to pass, but that other of a Commoner to be Conful. they denied and dashed quite. And surely both matters had been dispatched fully and established at once, but that the Tribuns faid directly, that they required the Commons, to give their voices and speak to all three directly together. After this, P. Manlius the Dictator favoured somewhat, and helped the cause of the Commons, by nominating out of the Commons for his General of horiemen, C. Licinius, who had been a Tribun Military before time. The Senators Biformed herear, as I find in records. And the Dictator was wont to excule the matter unto them, alledging for himself the neer affinity and kindred that was between him and Licinius: faving also, that the dignity of the General of horsemen was no greater then of a Tribun Consular. Now when the election day was published for the Tribuns of the Commons, Licinius and Sextiss fo demeaned themselves, that by pretending that they would not any longer now continue in the office, they fet the Commons on to be most earnest and hotly bent for that, which they under colour of refusal, defired and sought for. They seemed, forsooth, to alledge and say, "That for these nine years they had stood, as it were, in battel array, and affronted the States "and Nobles of the City, to the right great peril of themselves in privat, and to no good effect "at all in publick: and now together with them, both the laws proposed, and the whole strength C "of the Tribuns authority, were waxed old and decayed. At the first their Laws were crossed "by the interceding of their brethren Tribuns: afterwards by packing away the youth of the Ci-"tv to the Velitern war: and last of all, the Dictators lightning flashed in their faces, and their "thunderbolts shot against them. "Now (say they) neither their sellow Tribuns withstood "them, norforraign wars hindered them, nor yet the Dictator himself, as who for his part hath "given a good fore-tokening and prelage of a Conful Commoner, in electing his General of "horsemen out of the Commons. Never consider they, nor look so far into the matter, that by one of these goodly laws, our fields will be defart and waste, by ejecting and dispossessing the rightse ful land-lords: and by the other, all credit in borrowing and lending, in taking and putting "forth of money shal be abolished. And then farewel all humane society, commerce and inter-" course whatsoever. In these respects therefore, thus I conclude, and would counsel you, in any "wife to ftop, frustrate and disanul the overture and proceeding of these laws: and in so doing, "Ipray God bless and speed you wel. This Oration of Appins thus far only prevailed, that the time of publication of these Acts, was cut off and deferred. But the same Tribuns Sextins and Li-E cinius, being chosen again the tenth time, propounded this law and had it enacted, That of the The December

Decemvirs for divine service and Church matters, some should be created of the Commons: So, virs created, five of them were of the Nobles, and five of the Commoners: whereby they feemed to have gained already one good step onward unto the Consulship.

The Commons contenting themselves with this victory, yeelded unto the Senators, that for the present without any mentioning of Consuls, there should be elected Tribuns Military, So there were created A. and M. Cornelii the second time, M. Geganius, P. Manlius, L. Veturius and P. Valerius the fixth time. At what time, when as (but for the fiege of Velitre, which was like to be for service a long piece of work, rather then for issue, doubtful in the end) the Romans were at rest for any forraign troubles, the sudden and unlooked-for news of the Gauls war, drave the Ci-F ty to chuse M. Furins Dictator the fifth time: who took unto him for his General of the horsemen, T. Quintius Pennus. Claudius writeth, that this year the Gauls were fought with, about the river Anio: and that there was that noble combat upon the bridge, in which, T. Manlins in the fight of both armies flew in fingle fight a Gaul that had challenged him and given defiance, and despoiled him of his coller of gold. But there be more writers that induce me to believe, that this exploit was performed ten years after: and that in this year the Gauls had a battel given them by M. Furius Dictator, in the Albans land: where the Romans had neither doubtful nor dangerous victory, although the French made them afraid at first in remembrance of their former overthrow. -Many thousands of this barbarous nation were slain in field, many also fell upon the sword in their camp after it was won. Some were scattered and fled, and those most (who took the way to G Apulia) faved themselves from the enemy, both by slying so far, and also for that upon searthey were so distracted and parted one from another. The Senators and Commons agreed and made a decree, that the Dictator should triumph. Who scarcely had made an end of that war, but he was welcomed home with a more hotter and more dangerous Sedition within the City, For after many sharp bickerings and contentions, the Dictator and Senat both, were overmatched and overcome, yea, and forced to accept the Tribuns laws aforefaid. And also in despite of the Nobility and do what they could, there was an affembly held for election of Confuls in which L. Sex-ner that was tius was created Conful, the first Commoner that ever fat in Confuls chair, But the broils cholen Conful, staid not there. For, by reason that the Nobles denied to approve & give affent thereto, the matter is was like to grow unto a Secession and general departure of the Commons, yea, and to other fearful tearms and perilous threats of civil wars and inteffin troubles. Howbeit, by means of the Di-Stator, the flames were quenched and the discords appealed, upon these capitulations. Imprimis, that the Nobility should accord unto the Commons to have one Consulfrom among themselves. Item, that the common people should be content that the Nobles might out of the Parritis create a Pretor or Lord chief Justice for over and determiner in causes within the City. Thus when after long anger the two states of the City were grown to unity and concord, the Senat thinking it a worthy matter (&good cause they had verily as everany time before) willingly determined, for the honour of the immortal gods, to fet out those most stately [Roman] playes. And whereas before I they had continued but three daies to add one more, and to celebrate them full four. And when the Ædiles of the Commons refused that charge & excused themselves the younger Gentlemen of the Nobility cried all with one voice. That they would most gladly do that service and honor to the immortal gods, so as they might be made Ædiles for that purpose. Thanked they were generally of all hands; and the Senat made a decree, That the Dictator should propole unto the people, that two men of the Nobility might be Ædiles, and that in all the Assemblies and Elections for that year, what soever passed, should be ratified by the soveraign assent of the Senators.

The Seventh Book

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Seventh Book.

WO new officers of State, to wit, the Pretorfhip and Ædileship of the Chain were adjoined to the rest. The City was fore visited with the pestilence: which was more noted by reason of Furius Camillus who died therein. The remedy and end whereof, whiles they fought to procure by bringing in new and strange Religions, at length they devised stage-playes, which then first were set forth. M. Pomponius a Tribun of the Commons, arrested L. Manlius for his exceeding rigour in taking muster of souldiers: and for confining and hardly intreating his own son, T. Manlius, for no crime or hainous offence. And the young man himself, whose confining and misusage was laid unto his fathers charge, entred the bed-chamber of the said Tribun, drew his Skean and forced him to swear unto him, M that he would let fall his suit and proceed no further. Then all mischiefs intended, were laid apart and hadan end. Curtius armed at all pieces, mounted upon a Courser, rode headlong into the wide gaping chink or gulf within the City of Rome, and so it presently filled up again. The same young Manlius, who had freed his father from the troubles of the Tribun, entred into combat with a French-man, that challenged any one of the Roman Souldiers to single fight, slew him, took from him his colar of Gold, which he ware about his neck afterwards himselfe, and thereof was called Torquatus. Two Tribes more were added, Pontina and Publicia. Licinius Stolowas condemned by a law of his own making, because he held in possession more then five hundred Acres of ground, M. Valerius a Colonel of one thoulandfoot, killed a Gaul, who challenged him to fight: and that, by the means and help of a Raven that setted upon his Morion, and with tallons and bill annoyed his enemy, and thereupon was hena-N med Corvinus. For which vertue and valorous Act, he was the year next following created Conful, being not full three and twenty years old. Amity was concluded with the Carthaginians. The Campaines being warred upon by the Samnites craved aid of the Senat against them : and when they could not speed realded their City and Territory to the people of Rome. Whereupon it was thought good, seeing both they and theirs, were now become proprietary to the people of Rome, that they fould be defended by force of arms against the Sammites. When A. Cornelius the Conful, had led his host into a place of disvantage and was in great peril, he was by the industrious service of P. Decius a Colonel saved : who having gained the hill top, which commanded the ridge, whereon the Samnites lay encamped, gave the Conful opportunity to escape and pass into a plain ground: and himself, notwithstanding he was environed by the enemy, brake through them, and gat away. The Roman fouldiers left in garrison at Capua, having o conspired to keep the City to their own behoof, were detected and their plot disclosed: and for fear of punoloment, revolted from the people of Rome contrary to their allegeance: but by the policy and misdom of M. Covinus, they were reclamed from their outrage, and reflored again to their countrey. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate wars against the Hernicks, Gauls, Tyburts, Privernats, Tarquinians, Samnites, and Volscians.

The seventh Book of T. Livius.

Ere ensueth a year of especial note and mark, for the Consulship of a man newly risen: also for two new offices, the Pretoghip and Addieship of the Chair. Both which dignities, they of the Nobility purchased to themselves in lieu of granting to the Commons one place of the two Confuls. The Commons bellowed the Confulthip upon L. Seztius for his good service, in propounding the law, whereby that promotion was hitt ob-

B tained. The Nobles conferred the Pretorship upon Sp. Furius Camullus the ion of Marcu: and the Ædileship upon Cn. Quintius Capitolinus, and P. Cornelius Scipio, perionages of their own order and degree: So grations were they with the people in Marsheld, L. Sexting had companion with him in government, L. Emilius Mamercus one of the Senators. In the beginning of the year, much debate there was and hard hold, both as well about the Gauls, who at the first ranged year, and over all * Apulia, and were now (as the report went) gathered together : as allo con. crn- * Puglid. ing the Rebellion of the Hernicks. But all matters being put off on purp: le, until a further time, because nothing should be done by this new Consul a Commoner, all things were still and quiet, as if it had been vacation or Non-term: this only excepted, that the Tribuns muttered and could not endure with patience, that for one Conful of the Commons, the Nobility had got to them-

C selves three Magistrats, all of the Patritii, sitting like Consuls, with their pursed and purpled long Robes in Ivory chairs of cltate, And as for the Pretor besides, as L. chief Justice to hear and decide causes, he was fellow with the Confuls, and with the same Auspices and authority created. Hereupon the Senar was abashed to be instant and to enforce that Ædiles of the chair should be chosen out of the Nobility. And first it was agreed amongst them, that every second year they should be elected forth of the Commons: Alterwards, indifferently one with another in common, without that regard. Now when L. Genneius and Q. Servilius were Coff, and all at good rest for any home-fedicion or forrain war: behold, lest they should at any time be void of care and danger, there began a great plague; In which died, a men fay, one Cenfor, one Ædible Curule, three Tribuns of the Commons: besides, many a dead corps from among the multitude, was ca-

D ried forth, proportionable to the rest. But above all the bitter death of Camillus and much lamented (notwithstanding the long and goodly time he had in this life) caused this pessilence to be M. Farin Gemuch spoken of and remembred. For he was (in truth) the only person in all fortune both of pro-millar. fperity and advertity, as well in peace as war: a rare and fingular man before his banishment, and during the same more samous and renowned: either in regard that the City had a miss of him, and being taken by the enemy in his ablence fought unto him for his help; or in respect of his happiness, in that together with his own restitution home, he therewith restored his natural country. And after this, for 25 years space (for so long he lived afterwards) he bare himself answerable to the title of fogreat glory: accounted worthy to be jurnamed and reputed a second sounder after Romulus, of the City of Rome. All this year long and the next which followed, when T. Sulpitius

E Peticus, and C. Lieinius Stolo were Coniuls, the fickness continued. By reason whereof, nothing was done worth remembrance, but that forto obtain the mercy and grace of the Gods, there was a Lectiflern folemnized, which was the third fince the City was first founded. But when by no device of man, nor help of the Gods, the violence of the ficknels affwaged; their minds and confciences were so possessed with inpensition, that among other pacifications and appealings of the heavenly ire, the stage-playes (a strange and new device for a warlike and martial people, who afore time field only to behold the folemn games and feats of firength and activity, in the great Lifts or Race called (iron) were (as men tay) first begun and ordained. But (as all beginnings lightly are) a small thing (God wot) it was at sirst: without long and metre, without gesture and action surableunto song and verse, and the same also meer outlandish. For the players, who were F fent for out of Herraria, as they danced the measures to the minstrel and found of flute, gestured not undecently withal, after the Tuscan fashion. But in process of time the youth began to imitate and counterfeit them, jefting pleafantly besides one with another, and singing in rude simes and difordered metre: and their gesture was forting with their jests and ditties. Thus was this thing first taken up, and thus with much use and often exercise, practised. And hereupon our own Country Actors and artifical projections of this feat, were called H. firiones, of Hifter a Tucan word, which figurifies a player or dancer. But these uttered not (as they nied afore time) in their turns one after another, disordred, confused, and rude verses, like to the loose and bandy Pescenine rimes: but went through and rehearsed out, whole Satyrs, full of musical measures, with a fer concent of long a lost o the instrument of the minstrel, and with gesture agreeable there-

Gunto. Certain years after, Livius, who was the fift that after the nie of Satyrs, ventured to fer [Andronicus] forth an Enterlude, of some one argument and uniform matter, is reported to have been himself (as they were all no doubt in those dayes) the Author and Actor both, of his own veries and longs: But being to often called on by the people to play, that he became hoarfe again, and loft his voyce, he gat leave to fet a boy to fing before the minftrels. And so being silent himself, he acted the song with more agility and nimblenes of motion a good deal; for, not employing his voyce, he had no hindrance of liberty in gesture. Then began the players to have others to fing, and they themselves used their voyces only in acting their parts in Comedies dialogue-man elfe, sooner than the young man himself. Who contraty-wise was grieved in his mind, that he should be a cause of his fathers troubles withus to mean the ill will and obloquy of the people.

And that all the World, both Heaven and Earth might know; that he defined rather to succour and wife. After that, by this order taken and Law of Playes, they came from laughter and pleafant H conceited Mirth, and that this pastime and sport turned by litle and litle to a methodical Art and profession: Then the youth leaving to Comædians, the acting of parts in Enterindes began after the old manner to let flye, one at another, merry scoffs and jelts, interlaced within their rime and meeter, which thereupon were afterwards called Exodia, and were inferted commonly in the Atellan Comedies. Which kind of sport, the youth learned first of the Ofci : and having once taken it up, they held it still, and would not suffer it to be distayned and dishonested by common players. And hereof cometh it, that the Actors in the Atellane Interludes were neither dilplaced out of their owntribe, nor made Erarii, but lerved in the wars, and have the Cities pay, as if they were not base Comodians, and Profesiors of infamous players craft. Thus have I thought good, I among the small beginnings of other things, to set down the Original of Stage-players also: that it may appear, that the thing arising from a considerate entrance, is grown now to this soolery and excessive sumptuousness, as hardly can be defrayed by most rich and wealthy Kingdoms. And yet these players at first, employed about a religious buliness, neither rid mens minds of scruple and superflition, nor eased their bodies one jot of sickness. But rather, when by occasion of an overflow and inundation of the Tyber, the Circus or Theatre was drowned, and their playes in the very midst hindred and interrupted, this occurrent mightily troubled and affrighted them, as if the Gods had turned away their face and countenance, and rejected all their endeavours in thele appealings of their wrath and indignation. Therefore in the time that Cn. Genuius, and Emrlius Mamercus were Confuls the second time, when mens minds were busied and troubled more in K feeking means to pacify the wrath of the Gods, than their bodies vexed with diseases; the elder fort and grand figniors called to mind that in old time there was a plague affwaged and gave over. by the driving and fastning of a spike or great nail by the Dictator. The Senat upon a religious devotion perswaded herewith, caused a Dictator to be created, for to fasten the nail aforesaid. And there being chosen L. Manlius Imperiosus, he nominated for his General of Horsemen, L. Pinarius. There is an old law written with ancient letters, and in antique words, That the chief Pretor for the time being, should in the * Ides of September drive a spike or nail. Well, a nail was driven, and fluck fast on the right side of the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, on that hand where as Minervas Chappel standeth. That nail, because in those dayes there was but little writing shewed, as they say, the number of the years. And thereupon that Law was set up in Miner-T. waes Church, for that Minerva was the inventress of numbring. And Cintins a diligent writer of fuch monuments, and a fludious Antiquary, affirmeth, That at Volfinii there fluck fuch fpikes to be seen in the Temple of Nortia, a goddess among the Tuscans, to quote and represent the number of the years. Now, as concerning the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, M. Horaius the Conful (by an act in that behalf provided) dedicated it, the year next entiting the expulsion of the Kings. Afterwards, the solemn manner and custome of fastning a nail, was transferred from the Consuls to the Dictators, as to the greater and more absolute Magistracy. And in process of time, this custome being discontinued, it was thought a thing in it self worthy, for which a Dictator should be created.

L. Manlius being elected [as is above said] for this cause, as if he had been called to that dignity M for some war, and not to free the people from their scruple of conscience: and intending himself war against the Hernicks, plagued the youth with a grievous muster : until at length all the Tribuns of the Commons taking against him, opposed themselves: and were it by force, or for very shame, he relented, and refigned up his room. Nevertheless, in the entrance of the year next sollowing, when Q. Servilius Hala, and L. Genutius the second time were Consuls, M. Pomponius a Tribun of the Commons arrested Marlius. His cruelty in taking of the musters was odious, not only for the loss and dammage that the citizens sustained thereby, but also for tearing and mangling their bodies, partly by icourging them with rods, who answered not to their name, and partly clapping irons upon them in prison. But above all, his own cruel disposition by nature was hateful, and the furname (Imperiofus) offensive, especially to a free City. This name he got by N plain shew of his cruelty, exercised no less upon his neerest friends and kinsfolk, yea, and his very own bloud, than upon strangers. For amongst other matters, the Tribun laid fore to his charge, that having a young man to his fon, detected of no lewdness and dishonest life, him he had banished (as it were) out of the City, from his house and home, debarred from the common Hall and open fight of men, from the company of his mates and companies, fet him to drudgery and fervil work, and betaken him as it were, into a prifon and house of correction: where, a Dictator his son a young Gentleman highly descended, by this daily misery of his, was taught to know, that he had indeed a Lordly and imperious Sir, to his father. "And for what great offence, I "pray you? Because he was not so fair spoken, nor all the readiest with his tongue. Which in-"firmity and defect of nature, ought not a father to have born withal and cloaked (if there had o "been any goodness, any common humanity in him) rather than to punishit, and by rough "handling, and sharp usage, to make it more known and notorious? Why? even the very brute "beafts, if it chance that any of their breed or young ones prove but untowardly, feed and che-" rish them still nevertheless. But as for this L. Manlins, he augmenteth one inconvenience and "default in his fon, with another: whom being but foft and flow of nature, he keepeth down the "more: and that litle life and small metal that is in him, he goeth about to quench and dull at " once by this peafants life and ruftical ulage, and converfing amongst the cattel and beafts.

help his father, than to affift his advertagies and foes; he entreth into a course befeeming and bewraying (I must needs say) a rude and rustical mind. Which salthough it say our nothing of Civility, yet for his kindness and dutiful piery to his father, deferveth commendation. One morning betimes he gets him up, and unknown to every one of the house, with a good skein close by his fide, to the City he goes: and from the gate freight wayes directly to M. Pomposius the Tribun The kindness B his house. He telleth the Porter; that he must needs speak with his Master out of hand, willing of T. Manlias him to let him understand, that T. Manhius the son of Lineins; was there, And being immediately to his father. let in, (for the Tribun hoped, that the son was throughly angred with his father, and brought new complaints, and one matter or other against him, or some devise and overture how to proceed in the commenced Action) and falutations passed to and fro between the Tribun and him the faid, that he was to talk with him apart out of all mens hearing. So the room being voided, and all commanded to depart far enough our of the way, he draweth out his skein: and leaping aloft upon the bed, flood there, and held it full bent against him, and threatned presently to give him the ftab, unless he would swear the oath he should tender unto him, namely, never to call an Affembly or Hall of the Commons together about his fathers inditement, or impanel a Jury against him. C The Tribun affrighted (seeing the naked weapon glittering before his faceshimsen all alone and unarmed, the other a call and lufty young fellow, and, that which was as much to be feated as the reft, fool-hardy, and prejuming upon his strength) took the oath in that form as he put it unto him. And afterwards he gave it out plainly and confessed (for his excuse) that by this means he was forced in spight of his heart, to surcease his suit, and give over his enterprise. But the Commons were not so much offended at the son, for giving such an adventure in his fathers quarrel: but they could have been more contented and better pleased, that it had lien in their power to have passed their voyces, for the condemnation of so cruel and proud a prisoner, as they had under their hands. And the more praise-worthy was this design of the son, because so great rigor of the father, wrought no alienation at all in his heart from the affection at duty that he owed unto D him. So not only the father escaped his arraignment, but this action of the young man turned to his own honour and preferment. For whereas, this year it was first ordained, that the *Tribuns * A Tribun in or Colonels should be chosen by voyces of the legionary souldiers (for aforetime, as at this day, a Legion, calthe Generals themselves made them, whom they call Ruffult) in fix places (for so many were ele- led chiliarchus, the Generals themselves made them, whom they call suffer in his places (for 10 many were ene-cted) he obtained the second room a and that, in regard of no desert otherwise, either at home or leader of a abtoad, which might win him this favour, as who had spent his youth in the country altogether, 1000 [foot-

rum, clave and opened wide, welneer in the mids, and tunk down to an exceeding depth: neither could that chink or pit be filled up, by casting in of earth (notwithstanding every man laboured and E brought what he could) before that they began to enquire; according as they were admonished by the divine Oracles, what it might be, wherein the most puissance and greatness of the people of Rome Confifted. (For the wifards prophefied, That if they would have the state of Rome to remain sure for ever, they should dedicate and offer it, whatsoever it was, unto that place,) And when they were in doubt what this should be, it is reported, that M. Curtius, a right hardy knight M. Curtius his and martial young Gentleman, rebuked them therefore, because they doubted whether the Ro-valor and remans had any earthly thing better than armour and valor? Herewith, after filence made, he lift up filution, his eyes, and beheld the Temples of the immortal Gods; scituat neer to the Forum, and the Capitol likewife; and firetching forth his hands, one while toward Heaven, another while to the gaping chinks and gulf in the earth, toward the infernal spirits beneath, he offered and devoted him-

P self to assured death. And mounting upon a brave courses, as richly trapped and set out, as possibly he could devise, armed as he was at all pieces, he leapt Horse and man and all into the hole. The people, both men and women, threw in after him fundry gifts and oblations, and fruits of the earth in great plenty. The place was after called Currius Lieus, of his name, and not of that Curius Lieus, Curtius Metius in the old time, who was a fouldier under Titus Tatius. If I could by any means fearch out the truth, I would not spare for any pains in that behalf. But now seeing that by reafon of antiquity the certainty is not fully known, we must go by the common voyce and report of men. And verily the name of the lake is more renowned and noble by occasion of this later and fresher tale, than the other.

After the expiation of fo great and prodigious a wonder, much consultation there was in the G Senate that year, as concerning the Hernicks: for having tent their Heralds into them for restoration of harms done, but to no effect, they determined with all convenient speed to propose unto the people for to proclaim war against the Hernicks, and bid them defiance. The people generally with one voyce liked thereof, and approved it. The charge of that fervice and exploit fell to L. Genutius his lot, to undertake, Now for that he was the first Consul of the Commons that by his own anspices and conduct should manage war, the City was in great expectation of the sequel and iffine and according to the event that should fall out, good or bad in this journey, they were to judge, whether they had done well or amilis to communicat these dignities with the Commons.

But it fortuned to that Genutius being with great preparation and power fet forth against the enemies, was entrapped by an Ambuicado, his legions upon a judden tear unlooked for defeated, himfelf (the Conful) environed round about and flain by them, that wilt not whom they flew. Which tidings being brought to Rome, the Senators were not to penfive and forrowful for the common calamity, as they fumed and took on most infolently, for this unhappy expedition and conduct of the Commoner Contul: and muttered in all places these and such like speeches: " Now let them "go and create Coniuls again out of the commonalty, and translate the Auspicia whither they "ought not. What? Because the Senators by an Act of the Commons, might be defeated and dif-"possessed of their dignities, could so inauspicate and irreligious a law prevail likewise against the "Gods immortal? Who now themselves have taken the matter into their own hands, and maines tained their power, their deity and Auspices: which were not so soon medled withal, and pol-"luted by one that had no right thereto, nor lawful title, but both the whole army, and Captain "also were vanouished and overthrown; to teach them for ever hereafter, how they make their " folemn Elections of Magistrats confusedly, without regard of the rights and royalties of noble "houses. These speeches both Councel-House and common place rung again withal. So the Conful Servilius with confent of the Nobles, named for Dictator Appius Claudius, who had aforetime in an Oration before the whole affembly of the Commons diffwaded the proceeding of that law; and now with greater authority blamed the mishap of that counsel, which was by him misliked and reproved. A muster was proclaimed and a publick Vacation. But before that the Dictator and these new enrolled legions were gone as far as the Hernicks confines, the other army under K the leading of C. S. loitius the Lieutenant, by occasion of an occurrent that fell out there, got a good hand against their enemies. For when as upon the death of the Conful, the Hernicks advanced in (cornful and contemptuous manner, close under the camp of the Romans, with a full hope to be masters of the same; behold, what with the exhortation of the Lieutenant, and what for anger and indignity, wherewith the fouldiers fromacks were full they made a fally out against them. Whereupon the Hernicks came so far short of their accompt, that they had no hope to assail, no, nor approach the rampier : and so in disaray they dismarched and departed. Afterwards by the coming in of the Dictator with a fresh power, the old army was reenforced double. The Dictator in a folemn audience, having praised the Lieutenant and his fouldiers for defending their tents fo manfully, both encouraged them that heard themselves so highly commended according I to their deferts, and also whetted on the rest to perform the like valorous service. The enemies on the other fide were nothing flack to prepare themselves to fight again: who in remembrance of the honour they had already won, albeit they were not ignorant that the Romans forces were redoubled, encreased their own power also. For the whole Nation of the Hernicks, even as many as were able to draw (word, were called forth to the wars. Eight cohorts by themselves consisting of four hundred in a band were enrolled, even the most able and choice men of all others. This elect and especial flour of their youth and manhood, they fed with hope and encouraged the more to this service, because they had taken order they should have double pay. Freed they were besides from all other labour and Military toil that being thus reserved to intend the fight and nothing elfe, they should make reckoning and know, that they were to indeavour and strain themselves above the ordinary carriage of souldiers. Placed also they were in the battel, apart from the other ranks : to the end their valour and manhood might be more feen and marked. Between both camps of the Romans and Hernicks, there was a plain of two miles in length: and there in the mid way in a manner, was the battel fought. First, the fight was doubtful on both fides, whiles the Roman Horsemen charged and recharged again, but ever in vain, to see if they could break their battailons. Thus when the service on Horseback, proved less in effect than in attempt, they asked the advise and craved leave of the Dictator: which being granted, they abandoned their Horses, and with a mighty shout, ran forth before the ensigns, and renewed the battel afresh. Neither could they have been any longer endured, but that those extraordinary bands opposed themselves, and received them with equal might of body and valour of heart. Then was the fight N maintained between the brave youth and principal flour of both nations. And look what flaughter there was by common hazard of war, as well of the one fide as of the other, the lofs was greater for the quality of the persons, than the proportion of the number. For the rest of the common fouldiers, as if they had shifted from themselves the whole conslict, and betaken it to the vanguards only, reposed their own event and hap in the manhood of others. Many a man on both parts was fmitten down and dyed in the place, but more were hurt and wounded. "At last, those "Horsemen that dismounted, sell to call and rebuke one another, asking what hope remained else " befides? If neither on horseback they were able to drive the enemies back, nor on foot force "them to give ground and remove them, what third kind of service looked they for? Why leapt "they out so lustily and bravely into the foresront before the ensigns? and sought in the place of O er others? With these words provoking one another, they pluckt up their hearts, and with a fresh shout set foot forward and gave a new charge. First, they compelled the enemies terretreat and lose their standing: thento give more ground: and at length plainly to turn their back and run away. Hard it is to fay, being so equally and indifferently matched as they were, what it was that turned the ballance and gave the victory: unless it were the perpetual fortune that ever followed both nations, able to advance the spirit and courage of the one, and to daunt and abare the hearts of the other. The Romans had the Hernicks in chale, all the way long, so far as to their camp: but

A because it was far in the evening, they staid from assailing it. For by reason that it was long ere the Dictator could by facrifice gather any affured token of Gods favour, he founded not the bartel before noon: whereby it continued until night. The morrow after, were the Hernicks fled and their camp abandoned : only fome hurt and wounded fouldiers were found left behind. But one troup of them that for look their enfigns (when as neer upto their walls and forts their banners were discovered, slenderly accompanied, and with sew about them) was scattered abroad over the fields, and in great fear stragled all about, and shamefully fled away. And yet this victory of the Romans cost them well the setting on, and spent some bloud: for they lost a fourth part of their men: and that which was no small dammage unto them some of the Roman Horsemen also were B flain.

The next year following, when C. Sulpitius and C. Licinius Calvus the Confuls, were gone with a power against the Hernicks, and finding not the enemy abroad in the country, had by force won Forentinum a Town of theirs: in their return homeward, the Tyburts kept their gates shut against them. And after many complaints and unkindnesses ripped up between them: this last quarrel was it, that moved the Romans by their Heralds (after reflictation and amends demanded) to fend defiance, and proclaim war against the people of Tybur. That Titus Quintius Penus was Dictator that year, and Serg. Cornelius Maluginensis General of his Horsemen, it is agreed upon by all authors. Macer Licinius writeth that he was created for the holding of an affembly for Election of Magistrates, and that, by the Conful Licinius: because when his fellow Conful made hast C to have the Election before the war, thereby to continue his own Confulfhip, it was thought good to withstand and meet with his naughty defre in that behalf. But Licinius [Macer] in usurping to his name and family, that praise and commendation, maketh himself to be of less credit in writing of the reft: especially, seeing that in none of the old records, I find mention of any such matter. Mine own mind giveth the rather, that the Dictator was created because of the Gauls tumultuous war. For certainly that year they encamped themselves three miles from Rome, beyond the bridge of * Anio, in the way Salaria. The Dictator having proclaimed a Vacation, * Tection because of these troubies of the Gauls, received the Military oath of all the younger tort; and with a pullfaut army departed the City, and upon the very banck on this fide of Anio pitched his tenss. In the mid way between them and the enemies there was a bridge: which they D would not break down on either part, left they should be thought fearful cowards. But about the leizing and gaining of that bridge, first, there was many a skirmish: and judged it could not be, considering the equal forces of both fides, who should be masters of it. Then advanced forward unto the bridge (void of all guards) a mighty tall and big Frenchman, and as loud as ever he could fet out a throat, maketh this challenge; Now (quoth he) let the bravest gallant that Rome hath, come forth and spare not, to combat if he dare, that the event of us twain may shew whether nation is more variant and warlike. The brave Knights and youths of Rome, held their peace a good while, both abashed to resule the challenge, and also unwilling to run upon the present hazard of a fingle fight. Then T. Marlius, the son of Lucius, even he who released his father from the Tribuns troubles, goeth forth of his quarter unto the Dictator. "Without your leave and express 7. Mention to But tributes gotta total of the gastest and th " and Handing, no, not if I should see assured victory before mine eyes: but if it will please your " Excellency to give me licence, I will show unto that beast youder (that so proudly and lustily is "come forth leaping before the enemies enfigns, and braving as you fee) that I am descended of "that house and race, that gave the whole army of the Gauls the foil and turned them down the "Cliff Tarpeia. Then faid the Dictator unto him, God bleffe thee T. Manlius: On forth a Gods fight. As they stood thus between the two armies, and so many men all about looking on, in doubtful suipence between hope and fear, the Gaul like as he had been a huge mountain alost over the other, ready to fall upon him, held forth his target with the left hand to bear off the

Name, in this thy dutiful mind and zeal that thou carrieft both to father and Country: Go on I say, and with the help of the Gods, perform the Roman name to be invincible. Then his fellows and companions holp to arme the young Gentleman. A light footmans shield he takes unto him, and a spanish blade by his side, more handsome to fight short and close. Being thus armed F and fer out, they bring him forth against this vainglorious Gaul, set all upon joy sul foolishly, and (as the ancient writers have thought it worth the noting and remembrance) icomfully lolling and blaring out his tongue. Then the rest departed every man to his own quarter and ward: The combat and the two armed Champions were left in the midft, more like afestival spectacle and pageant between I, to behold, than any fight in field, fuiting to the manner, guife, and law of combat, confidering Mantine and a they were not equally matched, if a man should judge by the eye and ontward view. The one of mighty big them of personage mighty and exceeding tall, his coat armour of fundry colours and gay, his har-Gaul

The other, a man of a middle * six soor high, or five foot or five foot or five foot hold: without any hooping, finging, and joyous vaunting of himfelf, without vain flourishes and ten inches, G and shaking of his weapons in the air: but he had an heart sull of resolute courage, stomack, and close anger within, referving all his fierceness and eagerness unto the very combat and tryal of doubled one or two foins, and thrust him up into the belly at the groin, and so overthrew him.

* Wearing a colar, or Car-

There lay the Gaul along, and took up a great ground in length. When he was down, without any jurgher mangling and cormenting his carcais, he despoiled him only of his colar of gold, which embryed asit was with blood, he did about his own neck. The Gauls with fear and admiration of this fight were aftonied. The Romans with great cheerfulness came forth of their wards and quarters to meet their champion, and with great praise and congratulation brought him before the Distator, And as they merily cast forth (as the manner of fouldiers is) certain pleasant ditties, ballad wife, but without artificial skill of poetry, they were heard to furname him * Torquatus: t which afterwards was taken up and commonly uted, and became an honorable name to his posterity, and the whole house befides. Befides all this, the Dictator bestowed upon him a coronet of gold for a reward, and openly before the whole audience of the army, highly and wonderfully commended that fight of his. And certainly, that combat was of such consequence, and made so much to the event of the whole war, that the night next following, the hoft of the Gauls, fearfully abandoning their tents, departed into the Tyburtin country: and being drawn into a society of war with the inhabitants of * Tybur, and liberally by them relieved with victuals, they passed within a while into Campania. Which was the cause that the next year, C. Petilius Balbus the Consul (when his fellow M. Fabius Ambultus was by lot fent with commission against the Hernicks) led an army, by the appointment of the people, against the Tyburtins. To the aid of whom, when K the French were returned out of Campania; there was foul tooil and havock made in the Lavican. Tulculan, and Alban territories, by the leading and conduct, no doubt of the Tyburtins. And whereas the State stood well contented that the Conful should be the General commander against these enemies the Tyburtins; this new trouble and tumult of the Gauls caused a Dictator for to be created. And that was Q. Servilius Hala, who named for his General of Horsemen, T. Quinting. And by the authority and affent of the Senators, he vowed to fet out the great games, in case he foed well in this war. The Dictator having commanded the Contul with his army to tarry fill, that by his own conduct of war he might keep in the Tyburtins, took the oath of all the younger people: and there was not one refused to go to the war. Not far from the gate Collina was this battel fought, in the fight of their Parents, Wives and Children, Great incouragements, T. doubtless, to cheer up and animate men, abient and far off: but now before their eyes, partly, for shame, and partly, for pitty and compassion, they let the souldiers all on fire. After much blood-shed on both sides, at the last the army of the Gauls turn back and being put to flight they made hast to Tyber, the very strength and fort of the Gauls war. But as they fled stragling one from another, they were encountred by the Conful Petilius not far from Tybur. And when the Tyburtins iffued forth to succour them they with the rest were beaten into the Town. Likewise the other Conful Fabius, first in small skirmishes, and at last in one notable pight field vanquished the Hernicks, at what time as his enemies charged upon him with all their forces and whole puissance. The Dictator having highly commended the Confuls, both in the Senat-house and alto in a publick affembly of all the people, and attributed the whole honour of his own Acts unto M them, gave up the Dictatorship. Petilins, obtained a double triumph, over the Gauls and the Tiburts. For Fabins it was thought sufficient, that he should enter into the City Ovant, in a pety triumph. The Tyburtins scoffed and made good game at the triumph of Petilius, For, "where "was it (say they) that they encountred and joyned battel with us? There went forth indeed out "of the City gates a few of us to behold the flight and fright of the Gauls: but feeing our lelves " also to be set upon, and killed one with another as we came in the way, we retired back, and " and got the City over our heads. And was that fuch a doughty deed, that the Romans should "think, it deserved a triumph? But that they may not deem it still, so noble and so wondrous an "Act, to make some fir, and raise a tumult in the enemies gates: they should themselves see short-"Iv greater fearfulness, even under their own walls. Hereupon, the year following, when M. Po- N pilius Lonas, and Cn. Manlius were Confuls, at the first watch of the night, they came from Tybur in warlike manner to the City of Rome. This fudden occurrent, hapning to fearfully in the night featon, firoke a mighty rerrour into them that halfily awakened out of fleep. Besides, many there were that will not, either what enemies they were, or from whence they came. Howbeit they cryed Alarm with all speed, on every side. The gates were fortified with warders, the walls manned with firong guards. When as early in the morning they were descried to be but a mean number of enemies before the Town, and those none other but Tyburtins; the Consuls sallied out at two gates, and affailed both wayes their forces, as they were now come under the walls ready to scale. Then was it seen that they were thither come presuming rather on the vantage of the time than trusting in valour and manhood: so little were they able to abide the first brunt and charge given by the Romans. Furthermore, it was well known that this their comming turned to the Romans good: for the discord that was now breeding between the Senators and the Com. for fear of this so neer danger was quitestaied. But in the next war that ensued the enemies came after another fort and were more terrible to the fields and country, than to the City. For the Tarquinians over-ran all the marches of the Roman pale, wasting and spoiling all those parts, especially that border upon Hetraria. And after reflicution & amends demanded, but to no effect, the new Coff.

C. Fabius & C. Plantius, by the ordinance of the people proclaimed war against them. The rumors

A also of the Gauls war began to be rife, But amid these manifold and searful troubles, this was their comfort, that the Latins had peace granted unto them, upon their own lute: and from thence a great power was received, according to the ancient league, which for many years space, they had let pass and discontinued. The Roman forces by this aid well frengthned, made a lighter matter of it, when they heard that the Gauls were arrived already at Premite, and were fet down and encamped about Pedum. It was thought good, that C. Sulpirius should be chosen Dictator, named by C. Plantius, lent for to the same purpose, Unto whom M. Valerius was appointed for Commander of his Horsemen. These marched against the Gauls with the choice souldiers of two Consular armies. This was a lingring war and protracted longer a great deal, than both parties liked of At the

B first, the Gauls only were sharp fet and eager of battel but afterwards the Roman fouldiers, by rull; ing into fight and skirmish, exceeded far the fierceness and forwardness of the French. The Distance was nothing pleased herewith, to put all upon the hazard of fortune, when there was no need at all, especially having to deal with that enemy, whom tract of time and disadvantage of the place. made daily worse and worse; being unprovided besides of victuals and making long abroad without any fenced fort: moreover, of that flomack and conflitution of body, as ferved wholly for expedition and quick fervice, and by small delayes waxed feeble and faint. Upon these considerations the Dictator held off fill and drew the war on length, and had proclaimed a grievous punish ment if any without his express commandment should fight with the enemy. The fouldiers could not well brook this: but first within their wards and watches began among themselves to carp at C the Dictator: and other whiles they let flie at the LL, of the Senate in general, blaming them for their direction in that the Confuls had not the managing of this war. They have choicn indeed (say they) a singular General on set purpose, a Captainalone, who thinks whiles he streth still and doth nothing, the victory will fall from Heaven, or flie into his very lap. After this they began openly abroad, and in the day time, to cast out the same, yea, and wor'espeeches too and more malepart: namely, that they would either fight, and ask the Dictator no leave, or go along in order of battel to Rome. The Centurions also joyned themselves to the souldiers: and not only in conventieles and knots together, there was whitpering and grumbling: but in the very * A place in Principia, yea, and within the quarter of the L. together in one accord. So as the multitude began now to grow to a full affembly, and from all D parts to call and cry aloud, to go presently to the Dichator: and that Sex. Tullius should in the name of the whole army speak unto him, as beseemed his vertue and courage. This Tullius now had been seven times already a primipilar or principal Centurion: neither was there in the whole army, of all those that served on soot, a man more renowned for seats of arms. He going before the army of footmen, fleppeth to the Tribunal. And when as Sulpitius matvailed, not fo much to fee that company, as the leader of the company Tullius, who of all the fouldiers had ever been in best order and most obedient. This Oration to of Talling, the multitude seconded with their petitions, calling aloud unto the General on every fide, to found the alarm, and command them to arm. The Dictator, albeit he thought the matter in it felf good, but not handled in good manner; and for example fake not to be allowed: yet promited to latisfy the fouldiers defire. "And calling Tullius secretly apart, questioned with him what this matter meant, what precedent or custom they had for their warrant? Tullius earnestly "befought the Dictator, notto think him to have forgotten either military Discipline, or his own "place nor yet the Majesty of his Soveraign. And whereas he had not withdrawn himself away from the multitude being in a mutiny, nor refused to be their speaker (who lightly resemble "those that are their ring-leaders) it was only for fear lest some other should have stept in place, it "fuch as the unruly people in mutinies are wont to fet up for their Captains. As for himself, do " nothing he would, without the pleasure of the General, Howbeit, he would advise him to look "well about him, and carefully to fee to it, that he keep his army in order, government, and obedience. And high time it is now and would not be deferred. For confidering their hearts were "kindled already, and their bloud up, they would be their own carvers, and chufe themselves "both time and place, if the General would not grant it them the fooner. Whiles they were thus in fad communication, there hapned two Roman fouldiers to take perforce from a Gaul certain sumpter Horses, which seeding without the camp, he was driving away. At whom, the Gauls let flye stones good store. And thereupon rose an alarm from the Roman Corps de guard, and running out there was apace, on both fides. So as now they had grown to a full skirmish and battel gr indeed, had not the Centurions speedily sticked them, and ended the fray. Upon which occurrent, the credit of Tullius with the Dictator was confirmed: and seeing the case would abide no delayes he proclaimed battel against the morrow. The Dictator notwithstanding he had yeelded to fight a field, as prefuming more upon the courage of his men, than their forces: began to devife with himself, and cast about every way, how by some stratagem he might strike a terrour among the enemies. And having a fubtle wit and nimble head of his own, this new policy he thought upon: which afterwards many warriors, both of our own country, and of othersalfo, The ftratagem yea, and some even in our time, have used and put in practise. He gave order, that the mules fumpters should be taken off their backs, leaving only two course twillies or coverings upon them, of C. Sulaiting the Dictator. and fetteth the muletors aloft thereon, furnished with the armour of certain captives, and fick t. and difeased persons. Of these he made wel-neer one thousand, and joyned unto them one hundred good Horsemen. All these he chargeth in the night time to get above the camp into the hills. and among the Furs and woods, to bestow themselves close: and not to stir from thence, before that he gave them a fignal. Himfelf, so soon as it was day light, began with great wariness and confiderate care to embattel and arrange his army in length along the very foot of the mountains: to the end that the enemy might have the hills full against him. Thus having fet out and directed these counterfeit cornets of Horse, to scare the enemies with, who, as it fell out, did more good in a manner than the other forces indeed; at the first, the vanguard of the Gauls thought that the Romans would not come down on even ground: but afterwards, when they faw them upon a fudden descended, they also, as desirous of fight, ran onforward presently to joyn battel, and be- M gan the fight before the Captains had founded. The Gauls charged the right wing more fiercely, To that har fly they might have been abidden, had not by good hap the Dictator been there in perfon, "Who called upon Sextus Tullius by name, and rebuked him, demanding whether he had "given his word unto him, that the fouldiers should in that fort fight? What is become (quoth "he) of thele, that with out-cries and open mouth called for battel? Where are those threats " now that they would begin to fight a field without commandment of the General? Lo, your "General himself calleth upon you as loud as he can to fall to your business, and goeth armed before the entigns in the vanguard: will any now follow after that erewhile would needs lead the "way afore? Fierce (I fee well) in camp fearful in the field. And no fable it was that they heard "him speak. Whereupon for very shame they were so pricked forward, that without cashing any N perils, or minding preient danger, they ran upon the darts and shot of their enemies. This violence of theirs, as if they had been welneer out of their right wits, at the very first troubled and difordered the enemies. The Horsemen that were sent out hard after them forced them to turn back, when they were one ein difarray. The Dictator himself seeing the battel of one side to shrink, advanced forward with the entions against the left wing, unto which he saw the main multitude to refort and gather together, and withal hegave the fign to them that were within the hills, according as it was before agreed. And when from thence also a new shout arose, and that they were feen to march fide-long overthwart the hill, toward the Gauls camp; then for fear left they should be that out from their hold, they gave over all fighting, and ran by heaps to their camp. Where M.V. Jerius the General of the Horsemen encountred and affronted them, Forhe seeing the right of wing discomfitted had fet a compass about, and ridden to the fortifications and munitions of the enemies. Whereupon they fled to the mountains and the woods. Most of them were received by the counterfeit shew of Horsemen, and by the muletors caught up, and came short home: but as many of them as fear drave through into the woods, were fafter the heat of the battel was past) cruelly flain and hewn in pieces. Neither was there any one fetting M. Furim afide, that triumphed more worthily over the Gauls, than did C. Sulprime. He confecrated also in the Capitol a good

A st one. The same year, the Consuls likewise warred, but with diverse fortune and success. For by C. Plantius, the Hernicks were vanquished and subdued. But his companion Fabius fought rashly and unadvifedly against the Tarquinians. The loss in the battel received, was not so much, but that the Tarquinians facrificed three hundred and seven Roman souldiers, whom they took prifoners. This foul and shameful execution, caused the ignominy of the Romans defeat afore, to be much more notable, and talked of abroad. Befides this lois, was the Roman territory much wasted (to help the matter withal) by the Privernats, and after them by the Veliterns, who made sudden inrodes into the Country. The same year also were two more Tribes added, Pomptina and Publicia. The votive folemo playes or games likewife, which Marcus Furius the Dictator B had vowed, were then fet forth and performed.

Then and never before was the first law put up to the people by P. Petilius, a Tribun of the A law against Commons, and that by the confent and approbation of the Senators, against the excessive suit and ambitious seeambitious standing for dignities. By which law men supposed, that the ambition principally of king for offices certain persons new risen and of the first head, who were wont to hannt fairs and places of great of government. refort for that intent, was repressed and kept under. But the year ensuing, when C. Martius and Cn. Manlius were Consuls, M. Duellius and M. Menenius two Tribuns of the Commons, went through with a law and got it enacted, which was not fo well liked of the Senators, to wit, concerning Ulury of one in the hundred. But the Commons were so much the more forward and A law against better contented, to grant and accept it. Over and besides those new wars the year before intendced, the Falisci were declared new enemies : and that, for two quarrels pretended against them; One, for that their youth had served against the Romans under the Tarquinians : the other, because they had not delivered again those Romans which fled unto Felerii, after their defeat and unlucky fight, notwithstanding the Heralds had made claim unto them and demanded them.

This Province fell to Cn. Manlius. But Martius had the leading of an army into the Land of the

enriched his fouldiers with good prizes. For, to the plenty and store that there was found, he added his own bounty and liberality; in that he fet out nothing for the common Treasury, but favoured the fouldiers, and gave them leave to better their own privatestate. The Privernats lay strongly encamped before their own City: and when he had assembled all his souldiers toge-D ther; "Now (quoth he) I give unto you the enemies camp and their City for a booty, fo you " will promise me to quit your selves like men, and to be as ready to sight as to spoil. Hereupon. with a great cry they call for the Signal of battel: and so advancing forward and exalting themfelves bravely and couragionfly, with affired hope of victory, to battel they go. There, even before the enfigns in the vanguard, Sextus Tullius, of whom we spake before, cryed out aloud, Behold, Noble General (quoth he) how thine army performeth their word given unto thee: and therewith laying down his Javelin, with drawn fword confronteth the enemy. Then follow after Tullius, all they that fought in the vanguard before the Standards, and at the first shock put the enemies to flight, followed the chase and drave them into the Town. And as they were scaling the Walls, the Town was rendred up into their hands. So he triumphed over the Pri-E vernats. By the other Consul there was no worthy exploit done, but that as he lay encamped before Sutrium, he proposed a law to pass by the Tribes, (a course never taken before, and without example) concerning a twentith part or vicefime, to be levied of their goods that were made free. The Lords of the Senat (because by that Act there accrewed no small revenue to the Exchequer, that was now wasted) allowed thereof and gave their assent. But the Tribuns of the Com. moved not so much at the quality of the law in it self, as at the dangerous precedent given, ordained under pain of death, That no man ever after should in making of laws withdraw the peo-

the statute in that case provided. After this, the two Confuls M. Fabius Ambustus the second time, and M. Popilius Lenas the second time made two wars. That which Lenas fought with the Tyburtins was performed with ease and facility, For having driven the enemies into the Town, he forraged their fields. But in the other war, the Falisci and the Tarquinians, discomfited in the first battel the other Conful. Their greatest fear arose upon this occasion. For, their Priests carrying afore them light burning torches, and inakes befides, went after a lunatick and frantick manner, and with fo strange and uncouth a shew troubled and disordered the Roman souldiers. And therewithal, at that ve-Gry instant the fouldiers, as if they had been distracted, besides themselves, and associed, dismarched fearfully and stumbled upon the munitions and fortifications of their camp : But after, when as the Conful, Lieutenants and Colonels mocked and rated them, for being scared like ple apart: For, if that were once by law permitted, there would be nothing, were it never so pernicious to the people, but it might be enacted by fouldiers, that have fworn to their Confuls allegeance, and were at his devotion. The same year was C. Licinius Stolo at the suit of M. Poppechildren with these vain bugbears: for shame suddenly they took heart again, and like blind menran upon those very same things, that before they had fled from. And so after they had dispatched this vain devile and preparation of their enemies, they fell upon the armed men indeed, discomfited their whole army and put them to flight: and being the same day masters of their camp, with a rich booty returned victors, both recounting in their military merry ditties and

tilius first Di- the first Dictator that ever was of the Commoners: who named for his General of the Horsemen a Commoner likewise C. Plantins. But the Senators thought this a Hameful indignity, that the Dictatorship also should now be chosen in common: and did all they could possibly to hinder, that there should be nothing decreed toward the war, nor any preparation made for the Dictator. But so much the sooner, and with more readiness, all that the Dictator proposed, the Commons granted. So he departed from the City, and marched on both fides of the Tyber (transporting his army in boats and planks fast ned together) to what place soever he heard the enemies were gone: and surprised many forragers of them, as they wandred and strapled one from another, in the fields. He set upon their camp also, and wan it: and after that he had taken eight thousand prisoners, and either slain or chased all the rest out of the Roman pale; he triumphed, by the suffrages of the people only, without the approbation and affent of the Senators. And for almuch as they would not in any case have an affembly for Election of Confuls, held either by the Dictator a Commoner, or by the Conful: and because the other Conful Fabius was busied abroad in the wars, and not returned; therefore, the matter fell again to an Interreign. So there were Interregents one after another, Q. Servilius Hala, M. Fabius, Cn. Manlius, C. Fabius, C. Sulpitius, L. Amplius, Q. Servilius, and M. Fabius Ambustus. During the second Interreign, there arose fome variance, for that both Confuls were Patritii, i. of the Nobles. And when the Tribuns interposed themselves, and crossed those proceedings, Fabius the Interregent, alledged a Law out of the twelve tables in these terms, That what sever the people ordained or granted tass, the same (hould be good, and stand firm and ratified: and in suffrages and voyces of the people, were comprised their grant and ordinance. But when the Tribuns, for all their gainfaying and stepping behy of the peolength two of the Nobles created Confuls, C. Sulpitius Peticus the third time, and M. Valerius ple.

Publicola: who the same day they were chosen entred in a chief of the confuls. tween, could privail no more, but to prorogue the * Comices for the Election, there were at after the foundation of the City, and the 35 after it was recovered from the Gauls, the Commons loft the Confulthip again, when they had enjoyed it nine years. And two Confuls of the Patritii, upon the Interreign, began to govern, to wit, C. Sulpitius Peticus the third time, and I M. Valerius Publicola. The same year was Empulum won from the Tyburtins, without any memorable warlike exploit: were it that under the conduct of both Confuls there jointly together. the war was managed, as fome have written: or that about the fame time the Tarquinians Country was by the Conful Sulpitius over-run and wasted, whiles Valerius led forth a power against the Tyburts. But more ado had the Consuls at home, with the Commons and Tribuns. The Confuls thought now, it concerned them in trust and credit, as well as in vertue and valour. that as they, being Patritii both of them, had received the Confulthin, to they should make over the same again to twain of the Nobility: and either wholly to give up their interest and title for ever, if to be the Confulfhip should now become a Commoners dignity: or else to keep it wholly in their possession, whereof they were first seized intirely, in right of their ancestours. On the other w fide, the Commons fumed and flormed in these and such like terms. "What should we live any "longer? and why are we accounted citizens? In case, that which was first got by the vertue "and power of two only perions, L. Sextius, and C. Licimus, we cannot now all of us together "hold and keep? Certainly, better we were to endure the KK, and Decemvirs again, or any o-"ther heavier and more fearful name of absolute and Lordly Empire, than to see both Consuls of "the Nobility: and that we, may not both rule and obey in turns, but that the one part fetled in "the place of rule for ever, should think us, the Commons born for nothing else but to obey and " ferve. The Tribuns themselves were nothing behind to set forward these troublesome mutipies. But when the people are up once altogether and in commotion, the principal leaders are hardly feen above the rest in the action, And when as they were come down into Mars field fundry times N to affembly, but ever to no purpose and effect, and that many Comitial dayes of affembly were passed over, only in seditious troubles: at the last, the Commons being overmatched through the ttiffness and oblinacy of the Confuls, took the matter so grievously to the heart, that when the Tribuns brake forth into these speeches; "Now farewel freedom for ever: now are we driven, "not only to forbear coming into Mars field, but also to abandon and forsake the City, taken "captive and oppressed by the Lordly rule of the Nobles; and therewith aldeparted: the Commons "with forrowful cheer did the semblable, and followed after. The Confuls being thus left deftitute of one part of the people, yet nevertheless went through with the Election, as few as they were there remaining. And Confuls there were elected of the Nobility both, M. Fabius Ambustus the third time, and T. Quintius, In some annals or yearly records, I find Coff. M. Popilius, instead of T. Quintius.

In that year, were two wars performed with prosperous success. And the Tyburtins were fought withal until they yeelded. From them was the City Saffula won by force: and other Towns had tasted of the same fortune, but that the whole Nation laid arms aside, and submitted themselves to the Consul his mercy. He triumphed over the Tyburtins: otherwise the conquest was mild and gentle enough, without extremity of execution. But the Tarquipians were cruelly dealt withal: and many a man of them flain in field. Of the prisoners that were taken,

The feventh Book of T. Livius.

A whereof there was a mighty number, there were 358 of the Noblest and greatest Gentlemen chosen out, and sent to Rome. The rest of the common sort were put to the sword. Neither sped they better at the peoples hands that were fent to Rome. For in the mids of the Forum were they all beaten with rods and beheaded. This execution made quittance with them, for facrificing the Romans in the market place of the Tarquinians. This good success in war caused the Samnits also to feek for peace and amity. Their Embassadors were courteously answered by the Senat, and so upon covenants they were received into lociety. But the Commons iped not to well at home in the City, as abroad in warfare. For albeit the Usury was well eased by bringing it down from twelve to one, in the hundred: yet the poorer people were overcharged with the payment of the B very principal, and became bond and thrall to their creditors. Whereby the Com. in regard of their privat freights, that they were driven unto, never troubled their heads with the making of both Confuls of the Nobles, nor with the Assemblies and Elections, nor other publick affairs. Still the two Coniulships remained among the Patritii. And created there were Consuls, C. Sulpitius Peticus the fourth time, and M. Valerius Publicols the second time.

Now when as the City was earnestly amused upon the Tuscan war, by reason that the news went, how that the people of Core, for very pity and compassion, and in regard also of consanguinity, took part with the Tarquinians: behold the Embassadors of the Latins turned them clean against the Volscians. Which Embassadors brought word, that there was an army levied already from thence and in arms, even now upon the point to invade their borders: and would from them en-C ter the territory of Rome, and spoil as they go. The Senat therefore thought good to neglect neither business, and gave direction, that to both places certain legions should be appointed, and the Consuls to cast lots for their several Provinces and charges. But afterwards, the greater care was taken for the Tuscan war, upon intelligence given by Sulpitius the Consul his letters, whose commission was against Tarquinii, that the countrey was wasted and spoiled all about the Roman-Saline, [or Salt-pits] and part of the booties carried away into the confines of the Carits: and that the youth of that people were doubtless employed in the driving of that booty. Whereupon V.:lerius the Conful, who was opposed against the Volicians, and encamped in the marches of Tufculum, was called back from thence, and commanded by the Senat to nominate a Dictator, Who named T. Manlius, the son of Lucius, and he taking to him A. Cornelius Cossus for his General of

D the Horsemen, contenting himself with his Consular army, by the authority of the Senat, and the peoples suffrages, proclaimed war against the Carits, and sent them defiance. Then were the Cerits afraid of war indeed, and not afore, as though there had been more force in their enemies bare words, to denounce and fignify war, than in their own deeds, who by spoiling and plundering, had provoked the Romans to war. Then faw they plainly that they were overmatched and not able to make their parts good: then repented they that they had made such wast and spoil, cursing the Tarquinians for solliciting them to revolt, not one of them making any preparation of armour or war: but every man labouring what he could, that Embassadors should be fent, to crave pardon for their trespais and offence. When their Embassadors were come to the Senat, they were from thence put over to the people. And then they belought the Gods, whose E facred Images they had received in the French war and devoutly kept and cherished, That the Romans now in their flourishing estate, would take that pity and compassion of if em, which they in times past had of the Romans, in their calamity and hard distress. And turning to the chappels of Vesta, they called upon the Flamins and Vestal Virgins, sometime their guests, whom they so chaftly and religiously had received and given intertainment unto, saying in this wife. "Would The Embassa" "any man believe we had deserved no better, but thus of a sudden, without cause given, to be re- dors of Cere, to "puted enemies? Or suppose we had done somewhat smelling of hostility, would any man impute the people of " it rather to deliberat coun'el, than to some fit of heat and folly? And that we would blemish and Rome. F "their wealthy and flourishing State, and in their most happy felicity of war: whose friendship in "their adversity we had embraced? Beseeching them not to term that considerate advise, which "rather were to be called force and necessity. For the Tarquinians, say they, passing with a cruel and "puissant army through our country & requesting nothing but away, had drawn with them some of our ruftical Pealants, to affift them only in fetching of that booty, which now so heavily is "laid to our charge. Whom if you please to have them yeelded, we are ready to deliver them: if "to be punished they shall suffer accordingly: most humbly craving, that their City Care, the very

The people were moved, not so much with the justice and equity of the present cause, as for their old deserts and good turns to forget rather the harm sustained than the good received. Whereupon, the people of Cere were pardoned & agreed it was that a truce for one hundred years should be registred among the Acts of the Senat. Then were the forces diverted against the Falisci, who were tainted likewise with the same offence. But the enemies would no where be found. They wasted therfore at over their confines: & forbare to affail their Towns, So they withdrew their legions to Rome, The rest of the year was employed in repairing their wals & Towers : and the Temple of Apollo was dedicated. In the very end of the year, the contention between the Senators and the Commons, H brake off the Election of the Confuls: whiles the Tribuns stiffy denied to suffer any affembly therefore to be holden, unless it were according to the Law Licinia. And the Dictator again was as flourly and fliffy bent, to abolish wholly out of the City the Consulship, rather than it should be indifferent for the Nobility and common people. Thus by adjourning the Election, the Dictator left his office, and the matter grew to an Interreign. And the Interregents, finding ever the Commons maliciously set against the Senators, succeeded one after another unto the eleventh Interregent: and all the while continued the discord and variance. The Tribuns they called on hard for the maintenance of the Law Licinia. The Commons, they had an inward grief that fluck neerer to them, upon the excessive usury that still increased; and each mans privat care and grievance, brake t our in their publick contentions and debates. The LL, of the Senat weary of these troubles commanded L. Cornelius Scipio the Interregent for the time being, for concord and unity fake, in the Election of Confuls to observe the Law Licinia. So P. Valerius Publicela, had joyned with him in fellowship of government, Cains Martins Rutilius, one of the Commons. Now whiles mens minds were enclined once to concord, the new Confuls labouring to eafe also this matter of usury, the only spill or bone (as it were) between that seemed to hinder the

ment of debts, by creating five officers or Quinquevir's, whom of the despending and disposing of the publick monies, they called Menfarii. And furely, for their equity and careful diligence, they deferved in all monuments and records to be remembred and renowned. And there they k were, C. Duellius, P. Decius, M. Papirius, Q. Publius, and T. Emylius; who underwent and managed this matter, so intricat and difficult to be dealt in : so grievous and combessome to both fides for the most part, but evermore to one at the least. Which they performed both with indifferent moderation otherwise, and also with some cost and defray of charge, rather than any lois and dammage to the State. For the long debts and more entangled, rather in regard of the debtors flackness and negligence, than their want of ability, either the City out of the common flock croffed out of the book, by fetting up certain counters or tables with ready coin in the publick Hall (provided, that there were good fecurity unto the City by fureties and cautions put in aforehand) or elfe the goods of men valued at indifferent and reasonable prices discharged. So as not only without any wrong done, but also without the complaint of both parties, a mighty deal of L All debts clea- debts was fatisfied and paid.

After all this, a vain fear of the Tuscamwar, upon a false Alarm given, that their twelve Nations conspired and were consederate together, caused a Dictator to be chosen. So C. Julius was named in the camp: for thither to the Coss, was the patent of the Senats decree sent. And to him was joyned as General of the Horsemen, L. Emylins. But all was quiet without the City; Within the City the Dictator gave the attempt, that both Confuls should be created of the Patricii: which brought the government for the time to an Interreign. And the two Interregents that were in that while (to wit) C. Sulpitius and M. Fabius, obtained that which the Dictator had reached at in vain; namely, that both Confuls might be created of the Nobility: for now the Commons were more pliable and tractable, by reason of the fresh benefit received, in the easement M and fatisfying of heir debts. So there were chosen C. Sulpitius Peticus, he, who was the former of the twain that gave over the Interreign, and T. Quintins Panus. Some there be that give to Quintius the addition of Cafe for his furname and of Cains for his forename. Both of them went forth to war; Quintus against the Falisci, and Sulpitius against the Tarquinians. Who, for that they could never meet with the enemy in open field, by burning and spoiling made war with the fields rather than with the men. By which lingring continuance, as it were of a languishing confumption, the stubbornnes of both Nations was so wel tamed, that they made petition first to the Confuls, and by their permission after to the Senat, for a truce, and obtained the same for the term of forty years. Thus the care was laid afide of the two wars, which feemed fo neer at hand. And whiles there was fome rest from Arms, it was thought good because the payment of debts above. N faid, had changed the owners and mafters of many things, that there should be held a general Seffing of the citizens. But, when there was an affembly fummoned for the chufing of Cenfors, C. Martius Rutilius professing himself to stand for a Censorship, even he that had been the first Dictator of the Commons, troubled the peace and unity of the States of the City. This he went about (as it seemed) in a very undue and unseasonable time. For, both Consuls were then of the Nobility, as it fell out, who gave it forth that they would not admit him to be a Competitor, nor propound his name at the Election. Howbeir, both he by earnest perseverance in his resolution obtained that which he went about: and also the Tribuns with all their might endeavouring to recover their right, which was loft in the Election of the Confuls, fet to their helping hand. And as the countenance and Majefly of the man himfelf, feemed worthy of the higheft type of honor: 0 fo the Commons were right willing that by the same man who had opened the way unto the Dichatorship, the Censorship also should draw to that side, and be in pare conferred upon them.

Neither in the affembly was there any variance in the Suffrages, but that, together with Manlins c. Martin Ru. Navius. Martins should be created Censor. This year likewise had a Dictator, M. Fabius, not for any fear of war, but because the Law Licinia, for the choice of Consuls. should not be revived and observed. The General of the Horsemen unto the Dictator was Q. Servilius. And yet for all the Dictatorship, the agreement of the Senators together, was in the Election of the A Confuls no more force then it was in the chafing of the Cenfors. For Popilius Lenas was Corful. of the Commons, and L. Cornelsus Scipio of the Nobles. And the commoner Confull, by good fortune, proved more famous of the twain, For when upon tidings brought, that a mighty army of the Gauls were encamped in the Latine country, this Gauls war was laid extraordinary upon Popilint, because Scipio lay grievously fick. Who having soon levied an army and commanded all the vounger men, to meet him in their armour at Mars his Church, without the gate Capena, and that the Queltors should bring thither the Standards and ensignes out of the Acrarium, City chamber and after he had cholen out of them, fully four Legions, he delivered all the refidue of fouldiers unto P. Valerius Publicola, the Pretor 1 and moved the LL, of the Senat to enroll another army to be in readine's, against all uncertain occurrents of war, what need soever the City B should have And now himselfbeing at all points throughly furnished, setting forward to meet the the enemie. Whole power because he would know, before he had triall therof with the uttermost hazard, he began to call a trench and ratie a rampier upon the next hill unto the Gauls camp. that he could come unto. The Gauls, a fierce kind of people and by nature eager of fight, having discovered afar of the Roman enfignes, embattelled themselves forthwith, as ready to bid battel. But when they faw the Roman army not brought forth into the plain and even ground, but that they were ftrongly defended, not only by the height of the place, but also with a ditch and palaifado, and supposing them to be smitten with fear, and the fitter therefore to be assailed, for that they were at that instance bufily occupied about their other fortifications; with an hideous noise C looner (they were the Triarii of the rereward that made their fortifications) but the pearmen or

and horrible front, gave the charge upon them. The Romans gave over their work never the iavelottiers of the vanguard, and the Principes of the middle ward, who flood ready armed in guard for the defence of the pioners, made head and received them with fight. Befides their valour. the higher ground was their vantage : fo as all their darts and spears light not in vain (as commonly the do that are flung and lanced on levell ground) but fluck all falt as being poiled with their own weight : to that the Gauls being furcharged with darts either flicking through their bodies. or falt tet in their fluelds, and lo weighing them down ; having also run themselves upon the hilfirst, as doubtfull what to do, made stay, afterwards, when prorracting of time had discouraged themselves, and encouraged their enemies, they were driven back and fell one upon another; and in that confusion made greater havock and worfe, then the flaughter was by the enemy: and crush-D ed they were to death, more in that crond and thrust, then were slain by sword. Yet were not the Romans sure of victory: for when they were come down into the plain, there was a new piece of work to begin, and a fresh trouble behind. For the Gauls, by reason of their number, little feeling such a losse (as if a new army had started up in fight, out of the ground) stirred up their fresh fouldiers and untoiled, against the enemy in his victory. Whereupon the Romans made a stand and staied their eagernesse: both because they being already wearied, were to abide a new conflict; and all for that the Contul, whiles he laid about him with the formost, without regard of his own person, was wounded well neer the left shoulder with a pike, and thereupon for a while was departed out of the battell. By occasion of which lingring, the victory had like to have been loft again : but that the Conful when his wounds were dreffed and bound up, came back again E with speed to the formost ensigns, and faid : Why stand you still firs pe have not to deal now, with M. Popiling the Latins or Sabins your enemies, whomafter ye haveconquered by the iword, ye may make of Levas, the Conthe Latins or Sabins your enemies, whomaster ye have conquered by the twort, ye may make or enemies friends and confederats; but upon very favge beaffs we have drawn fword. Either we fall the words and confederats is but upon very favge beaffs we have drawn fword. Either we fall the words and confederate is footbared. mult have their bloud, or they ours. From the camp ye have driven them back : chaled ye have them to fight, headlong down the hill fide : over the bodies of enemies lying along, now ye ftand : fill the plain "also with their dead carkases, asye have done the hils already; and never look that they will "flie, fo long as ye standstill. You must advance your ensigns, and charge the enemy afresh. With theie emortations they fell to it the second time, and forced the formerrankes and files of the Gauls to lote ground : and then with pointed close battailons of footmen, they brake through into the heart of the main battell. Whereupon the barbarous people being difaraied, fuch as had F neither certain directions to follow, nor Captains to command, turned their force upon their fellows, were feattered here and there about the plains, fled in this pursuit beyond their tents. and made toward the fort of Alba; which among many hils that flood of even height, they espied mounting above the reft. The Col. tollowed the chafe no farther than their camp; both because his but made himfelf unwieldie, and also for that he was unwilling to put his tited army to a new labour, considering the enemy had gained the his tops, and to refted from farther puriou, And when he had given the whole pillage of the camp to his fouldiers, he brought back to Rome his army with victory, and inriched with the spoils of the Gauls. The Consul his wound staid his triumph. which was a cause also that the Senat wished and longed for a Dictatour, to hold the affembly for for the Election of Coniuls, whiles the other were fick.

G . L. Farius Camillus being cholen Dictstor, had joyned unto him P. Cornelius Scipio for his Generall of the hortmen. He relitored again to the Senators their ancient poffeffing of the Confulthip ; and for this good turn, was himfelf with exceeding affection of them all, created Confull. And for his companion he choic unto him App. Clandius Craffus. But before the new Confuls entred unto their office, Popilise with great love and favour of the Commons triumphed over the Gauls: who mumbling and muttering among themselves, would often ask one another, whether triumpheths there were any repented of a Commoner Conful: rating withall at the Dictator, who despiting

the law Licinia, had got for his reward a Confulfhip; which was more shamefull and infamous, H ill regard of his privat tecking for it, for being Dictator he had made himself Confut then for and sublick harm and injury. This year for many and family troubles was very famous. The Gaulsfrom the Alban woods (for that they were not able then to enquire the cold of winter) ranged all over the Champian and lea-coafts, and walled the country. The leas likewife were dangerous by reafon of the Greeks navy. Alfo all the track along Antium, and the rivet of Laurentum, even to the very mouth of Tyber. So as the rovers and men of war by fea, and the land robbers of the French, met both together, and fituck once for all a dangerons battell and then departed afunder the French unto their standing camp, the Greeks back unto their ships : both doubtfull, whether they had won or loft. Amid these troubles, the greatest fear by far, arose from this, that the r Latine Nation held certain Diets and Councels at the grove of Ferentina; and when the Romans demanded fouldiers from them, flat answer was made, That they must no more think to command to them whose aid they stood need of. And as for the Latins, they were resolved rather to bear er arms in defence of their own liberty, then fight for the maintenance of the dominions of ftran-"gers. The Senat being grieved and perplexed as well for these two forrain wars, as also for the revolt of their confederats, feeing no other way, but to keep them in by fear, whom loisley would not restrain, commanded their Consuls in their mustring, to extend and strain to the utmost the whole strength of the State : for now that their Allies failed them, they were to trust unon their City forces onely. From all parts therefore, the youth as well without in the country as within the City were taken up, and ten legions (as men fay) were enrolled of fouldiers, amounting w to 4200, foot and 300, horse in a legion. Which puillant army, if now at this day any forrain wars were toward, these mighty forces of the people of Rome, which the whole world is hardly able to contain, if they were united and brought into one together, would not exily make again: fo great are we grown in wealth only and superfluous delights, to which we strive and apply our minds.

Among other heavy occurrents of that year, Ap. Clauding one of the Confuls, in the very

tunate in all the tumultuous wars of the Gauls, the Lords of the Senat thought it not decent and r convenient that there should be a Dictatour adjoyned. The Conline having ordeined and appointed two legions for defence of the City, and parted the other eight with the Pretor L. Pinarias. Bearing in mind his fathers valour and manhood; and errook the Giuls war himfelf, without cafting lots therefore : commanding the Pretorto keep the fea-toults, and to put the Greeks back from landing on the flore. He went himfelf down into the country of Pompeinum, and because he was not willing to give battell in the champian, unforced thereunto; and thought the enemy might be westled out well enough by keeping him thort, for forraging and fetching in booties. who of necessity was driven to live of prey chose a convenient place for a standing camp. Where, as they paffed the time quietly in their wards, as a fetled Garrison : there cometh forth a mighty Gaul in perifor tall and beg, for armour brave and glorious : who clattering his shield and M spear together, and thereby making silence, gave defiance and chillenged by his interpreter the Romans to a combat, man to man. There was one M. Valerine a Colonell of footmen, and a very young man, who thinking himlest nothing less worthy of that honour than T. Manling having Gaul and Vafielt known the Contul his pleasure, advanced himfelf forth apart from the reft, armed at all points. lerius furnam-But this conflict as touching the prowefs of themen) was left notable than the other by reason that ed thereupon the hand of God came between & took a part. For as the Roman was ready to joyn and cope behold fuddenly a raven fetled upon the creft his of morion, even ful in the face of his enemie. Which at the very first, the Colonell took jo, fully as a token of good luck sent from heaven. Afterwards he praied devoutlyh that the God or goddeffe wholoever, that fent unto him from above that augurali foul, to prelage and forelignifie the future event, would be favourable and gractions of unto him. And lo, (a wonder to be spoken) the bird not only held the place still, which it first light upon but alfo, as often as the champions buckled and closed together, mounting up with the wings made at the cies and the face of the enemie, with beak and claws both, to long untill Valerius killerh him. For the Gaul being affrighted at this to thrange & wondrous a fight, both his eies dazel-Ed. and his mind was mightily troubled. Then the raven took his rife, flew on high quite out of fight towards the East, All the while the camp on both fides was quiet hitherto. But after that the Colonel began to tifle and diffarme the Body of the flain enemy, neither could the French keep themselves within their Stations, nor the Romans contein, but run with more speed unto their Conquerour champion. And so about the bodie of the Gaul that lay along dead, began fome skirmilh, and thereof grew a thatp and cruell battel: for now not only the companies of the next quarters, and corps de guard, but also the whole legions on both fides, came abroad and fought. Camillus commanded the fouldiers, joyous for the victory of the Colonell, joyous alfo for the gods, fo favourable and ready to help, for to go to battell : and the wing yety

"Follow this brave gentleman, good fouldiers (queth he) and about the dead champion of the

A armies had to conceived and deeply imprinted before hand in their mind the future event of thefe two fouldiers that had fought together. Between the formost, whose concurse had raised others, there was a tharp conflict ; but the reft of the multitude, turned back before they came to the volley of darts. And first they were scarrered along the Volscian and Falern countries but afterward they took their wates toward Apalia and the lower Adriatick fea. The Conful having affembled the fouldiers to an audience , folemnly before them all, commended the Colonell, and rewarded him with ten oxen and a coroner of gold. Him elf, by direction from the Senat, to attend the war by fea; joyned camp with the Preter. And there, because through the cowardife of the Greeks that would not come into the field, the war was like to be long

B and lingring, he nominated, by the authority of the Senat, T. Manlins Torquains for the Dictatour, to hold the Election of Confuls. The Dictatour having named for his Generall of horimen, A Corneling Coffus, held the Election, and with exceeding favour of the people, declared for Confut one like himself, and tracing the steps of his own vertue and glory, M. Valerius Corviam (for that was his furname afterwards) in his abtence : a young man, I fav, three and twenty vears old, To Corvinus was adjoyned companion in government a Commoner, M. Poplius Lengs the fourth time. Camillas performed no memorable exploit with the Greeks: for neither were the Greeks good fouldiers on land, nor the Romans at fea. At the last being kept from landing; and failing, belides other necessaries, of fresh water, they left Italy. Of what people, or of what nation in Greece this fleet confifted, is not certainly known. I would think verly, that they were the Tv-C rants or potentats of Sicily, above all other. For all Greece beyond them, at that time wearied and toiled out with civill wars, much feared the greatnesse of the Macedonians. After the armies were discharged, and that both abroad there was peace, as also at home quietnesse, through the unity of the States : left they fhould be glutted with too much joy, behold a peftilence arole in the Ctv and conftrained the Senat to command the Decemvirs, to overlook the books of Sibylla: and by direction thereof, was a Lettifterne celebrated. The fame year there was a Colony drawn out of the Antiats, to people Sairicum, and the town was repaired for them, which the Latins had destroied. Also there was at Rome a league concluded with the Carthaginian Embassadours, who came of purpole to fue for fociety and amity. The same rest continued still both at home and a-D broad, when T. Manline Torquatus, and C. Plantine the scoond time were Consuls. The plant which was before after one in the hundred, became now but half to much. The paiment of debts was dispensed & ordered into three years by even portions, so as a fourth part should be paid out of hand. And albeit some of the Commons (for all that) were pinched therewith, yet the Senat had more regard to see credit kept with the chamber of the City, then of the difficulties of privat persons. The greatest matters were well eased, in that they forbare to collect the tribute and to multer fouldiers. The third year after that Satricum was reedified by the Volicians, M. Valerius Corvinus the fecond time Conful with C. Periline, upon news of Latine, that Embassadors from Antiques went about to the nations of the Latins, folliciting them to rife up in arms, was commanded to make war upon the Volicians, before the enemies forces were greater : who put himfelf on a: fourney with a fierce army toward Sarricum. Whither when as the Autjats and other Volfcians were come to meet him, with a power provided aforehand, against any preparations from Rome, prefently withour any stay they joyned battel, as being through a deep ittled and long batted malitiously bent one against the other. The Volscians, a nation more hasty to rebell, than hardy to fight, being defeated in a battel, fled amain and highed space to put themleves within the wals of Satricam. But when the wals were not able to fave them, for that the town being environed and invelted round with fouldiers, was ready to be taken by feating, there were upon 400. of them. befides the common fort not meet for fervice, that yeelded themselves. The town was rated down and burnt; only they spared the firing of Marnas church. And the whole saccage and spoil was bestowed upon the fouldiers. But there were not comprised within this booty, the 4000 that r yeelded. Thole the Conful in his triumph caufed to be led bound before his chariot : and after that fold them, & brought a round fum of money into the treatury. Some write, that this number of capeives, werebondflaves. And that is more like to be true, than that they should be fold, who yeelded themselves. After this tollowed Contuls, M. Fabius Dorsno, and Servine Sulptime Camerimus. Then began the Aurunean war upon a fudden invalion that they made. And for fear left the action of that one State and City, had been the resolution of the whole Latine nation and by their maintenance, there was created Dictator (as if it had been against all Latinm already up in arms) L. Furius Camillus : who choic for his General of horimen, Cn. Manline Capuelinus. And (as the use had been in time of great troubles and sudden tumults) he mustered without any respect of Immunity and Exemption, and therewith proclaimed a Ceffation of all courts of law and the legions with all freed possible were led against the Auruneaus, where they found, that they carried the mind G of plunderers rather then of warriors. So that in the first battel, that war was dispatched, Howebeit the Dictator, because they not only made the quarrel and warred first but also offered light without any drawing back, supposing there were some need of Gods belp withall from heaven, had vowed a temple to Juno Moneta: and after he had obtained that he vowed for and therby was charged to perform his vow, to foon as he was returned home to Rome with victory, gave up his Dictstorship. The temple of The Senat commanded two officers called Duumvirs to be created for the edifying of that temple. Juno Moneta, according to the magnificence of the people of Rome. The place was appointed and let our on the [Capitoll] hill, even the very plot of ground, where fometime before flood the dwelling house of H M. Maulius Capitolinus. The Coff having imploied the Dictatour his army in the Volician war, furprifed at unwares the town Sora out of the enemies hands. The Temple of Moueta was dedicated the year after it had been vowed, when C. Martins Rutilius the third time, and T. Manlius Torqueins the second time, were Consula. Immediatly upon the dedication of that church, there enfued a strange wonder, like unto that old marvel of the hil Albanus : For it rained stones, and in the day time it feemed to be dark night. And the books of Sibilla being peruled for that the City now was mightily given to superstition) the Senat ordeined, that there should be a Dictator named for the ordering of certain fealts and holy daies So P. Valerine Publicula was cholen, and with him; Q. Fabina Ambustus Generall of the horimen. Order was given, that not only the Tribes should I go in folemn procession with their praiers and Letanies, but also the nations that bordered upon them: with a precise direction unto them upon what daies every one shall make supplication. That year (as it is reported) there passed heavy judgments and the Sentences of the people against the Vincers, with whom the Ædiles had commenced fuit. And without any notable cause to be remembered, they grew to an Interreign. Upon which, that fomething might be thought thereby done, both Confuls were made of the Nobles, M. Valerim Corvinus the third time, and A. Corneline Coffus. Now from hence-forth will we treat of greater wars, both for the puissance of the enemies, and also for their far distance: as well for their spacious countries they inhabited, as long tract of time that they continued. For this year began the Romans to bear arms against the Samnits, a ning of the nation powerful in wealth, and valiant in field. After which war, fought on both fides with alter- K Samnit war. native fortune, there succeeded Pyrrhus their enemy, and after Pyrrhus the Carthaginians. Neither thought they, that the people of Sensium could in any equity or colour of Julice, invade that land or attauk that City, which was intrendred and aspected to the imperial State of Rome, Whereupon presents they agreed to dispatch Embassadors unto the Samutes, who had incharge and commission to make declaration unto them; First, of the Campains petitions; secondly, of the answer of the Senat returned unto them, implying the remembrance of the Samuite amity : last of all, of the I Campains surrender. Which feathlineds of theirs, they bewarded not only by the present every of the bettell but also by their dislodging and departure away in the night. The man-zow after the Romans were masters of their empty and naked camp, noto which all the whole muleitude of the Campaines came running in number to rejoice and congretulate their victor But this Joy had like to have been fouly blemilled with an overthrow and defeat in Sammian. For Cornelinathe Contal being depared tropp Sarricula, had engaged his army weadvitedly within a forcil, through which went an hollow valley or lawo, forfaid on both fides with an ambufb. entignes into a place of late receit. But whiles the Samous Itsied only until he had brought his struy fully down into the bottom of the vale, P. Decius, a Colonell of footmen, espied in the forreft one little high hill, which commanded the place where the enemies by encamped and as it was for an army heavily armed, and charged with carriage, hard to be got up more : fo for them that were lightly appointed and burdened, nothing difficult. He perceiving the Conful troubled

Being commended by the Conful, and having received that troop and guard which He demanded, he instructed the through the woodly with, and was stoudeferied by the center to be feet to approached the place that he woodly with a state of the center and woodled, and wholly turned their eles to him wind, the both guined the Conful force time to wieddraw his army into a more convenient and open ground, and polletied himlelf of the bill top, and there refled. The Samnits, whiles they turn their enfignes to and fro, (as men that loft the vantage of both fides) could neither make after the Contol, but through the lame valley, wherein a while before they had him under their thot, nor yet erect their fequations, and marchup that hill, which Decise over them had already gained, Bur being more angry with those, that thus had dilappointed them of the fair means they had of a brave exploit, and confidering withall the neernelle I of the place, and their fmall number which were gotten thither, they were one while of mind to environ the hill round with armed men, and to keep Devine from the Conful; another while, to make them way, that when they were come down into the valley, they might fee upon them. Thus whiles they were in doubt what to do, the night overtook them. Decim at the first, was in good hope to fight with them from the higher ground, as they mounted up against the hill : but afterwards he marvelled much, that they neither beganto charge upon him, i.e. yet when they were disappointed and put by that purpole, through disadvantage of the ground, lortified themfelves with trench and rampier, and other pioners work. Then calling the Centurions unto him; " what unskillulneffe (queth he')of military fervice, what supine flacknesse and sloth is this? and "how got these lozels the victory of the Sidicins and Campains? All this went he to espie and discover himself in person clad in a common souldiers jacker, leading with him the other captains in the habit of their fouldiers ; to the end that the enemies might not take mark of the Generall himfelf, how he went about to view them. After this, when he had disposed the sentinels and corps de guard, to all the rest he commanded a watchword to be given, that when the trampet founded the second watch, they should come all unto him armed, and L. make no noise at all. "Now as many of you that think this good counsel, and a course like to speed well, make no more ze adobut pals on my right hand. So they all palsed, and followed after Decims as he went through the quarters void of watchmen and warders. Now were they eleaped the mids of the camp, when a fouldier, as he clambered over the warchmens bodies; lying heavy affeep, chanced to flumble at a shield, which gave a found again. Wherat the Watchman being awakened, raifed his next felA low; and they being frart up, callup other, not knowing whether they were enemies or fellows, whether the garison of Decim on the hill was broken forth, or the Conful had surprised the camp. Decise then, leeing his fouldiers could not passe clear and undescried, commanded them to let up a shout. And therewith he amaled them with a new fright, who were already drowned in drowfinels, fo as they could neither take we apons readily, nor make heed against them, nor yet purious after them. Whiles the Samnits were thus amazed and in confusion, the Roman garison had by this time flain the warders whom they met,& were marching towards the Conful his camp as yet was somewhat of the night to come : but now they seemed to be safe, and past all danger. Then anoth Decise on forward in this courage of yours, O hardy Romans; This your passage and re- P. Decises to R turn to and fro, all ages shall extoll and praise. But for the full fight and view of io great valour, we had need of broad day light: for ye deserve better, than that the still night should hide you in so e glorious a return of yours into the camp. Let us here reft, and wait for day, His words were o. beied; and to foon as the day brake, he dispatched a mellenger afore unto the Conful; and to with exceeding joy they made speed to the camp. And when it was known in the camp by the privy watchmen, that they who had put their lives in most dangerous hazard for the fafty of them all, were themselves returned (afe : then every one came forth to meet them as fait as they could with praises and commendations, calling them both all & some, their faviours, praising the immortall gods, and giving thanks, yea, and extolling Decius to the skie. This was the triumph of Decition the camp, as he marcheth through the midft thereof with his armed garrison, whiles every man C cast his cies upon him, and made him a Coronell, equall to the Conful in all kind of honour. When he was come to the Protorium, the Conful by found of trumpet, called all the army to an audience, and as he entred into a discourse of the deserved praises of Decime, Decime himself interrupteth bim, and cutteth off his speech. Whereupon the Conful put off the Oration. Decises then perswadeth the Cousul, to set aside all other things, and whiles the occasion and opportunity was offred, he urged him effectually, to give an al'arm to the enemies, both while they were amazed with this scare by night, and also lay scattering about the hill, as it were in their severall fconces. Befides, he thought verily that some were lent out after him to make fresh suit, and wandred aftray in the forrest. So the Legions were commanded to arm, and being departed one of the camp, and by means of the espials better acquainted with the forest, they were conducted by Dawider and more open way toward the enemy, whom juddenly they furprised & charged,upawares and unprovided as he was. And for as much as the Samnit fouldiers were stragling abroad, and most unarmed, and could neither rally themselves and take arms, nor retire into their trench. they drave them at first with fear into their camp; after, whiles the guards about it were disordered and troubled, they were maîters thereof alfo. The noise was heard all about the hill, and caused every man to flie out of his hold. So a great part of them took their heeles before the enemy could come. But fo many as for fear were driven within the trench(& those were some 30000) were all flain : and the camp rifled & spoiled. The Conful having atchieved this exploit, called an affembly. and not only finished the praises of Decius, as he before began, but also amplified them with fresh commendation of this new fervice. And besides other military gitts, he rewarded him with a crown of gold, a hundred oxen, and one speciall white one, fat and fair above the reft with guil-E ed horns. Whereupon, the whole manhood and flower of their youth that remained at home were fent for and assembled, determining to fight it out and trie their fortune once for all. Featfull news hereof came from Sueffulato Capua: and from thence carriers and polts were dispatched to Valerine the Conful, for aid. Forthwith he advanced the standards, and leaving the carriages belonging to the camp, with a ftrong guard, he marched forward in great halt : and not far from the enemie, took a little plot of ground to encamp in; as having belides their horses of service, no beafts at all for carriage, nor a rabble of flaves and variets that follow the camp. The Samnits (as if without further delay they were to fight) embattelled themselves. But seeing none to encoun-G ter them, they came with banner displaied to the very camp of the enemies. And there so soon as they beheld the fouldiers upon the rampier, and understood by them that were fent out of purpose to view the circuit of the camp, in how smal compasse they had fortified, guessing therby how few their enemies were; there ran a noise throughout the army, to make no more adoc but to fill up the ditches, to cut through the banks, and to presently to break into the camp. And cven in that rathnesse had the war been decided and dispatched, but that the captaines held in the violence of the fouldiers. But for as much as their own number fo great, required good ftore of victuals, and was both by their lying before Sueffala, and also by their long flay there without h fight brought to fcarcity well-neer of all things: it was thought good, that whiles the enemies kent within their hold as affrighted, the fouldiers thould be fent about the country a foraging. In which mean time they supposed that the Romans likewise, would have spent all, who were thither come lightly appointed, and had brought no more corn with them then they could carry on their shoulders, besides their armour. The Conful having elpied the enemies stragling over the country, and their gnards flenderly manned, after a brief exhortation to his fouldiers, led them forth to give an affault upon their camp. Which when they had won at the first shout and onset, and killed more of the enemies within their tents, then either upon the gates or upon the rampier; he cauled the enfignes that he had taken, to be brought together into one place : and leaving there two legions, for a guard and defence, with a straight charge, that untill he came again, they should forbear to rifle and make (poil, he went forward in order of battell. And when the horimen which he made out afore, had like hunters driven the scattred Samnits, as it were, within net and toil, he fell upon them and committed an exceeding great flaughter. For frighted as they were, they knew neither at what fignall they should rally themselves together, nor whether they should make speed to the camp, or flie further away. But to great was their fright and flight both, that there were brought to the Conful. 40000 (hields, more indeed then there were men flain; besides 170 en. figns, together with those that were won in the camp. Then returned he unto the enemies tents. and beltowed the whole pillage there, upon the fouldiers. And fuch was the happy fucceffe of this war, that it both caused the Falisci being in truce, to sue unto the Senat, for a league a and also w turned the Latins, who had prepared their forces already from warring with the Romans, to wage war upon the Peligni. Neither refted the fame of this to fortunate a victory within the marches of Italy: for even the Carthaginians also, sent their Embaffadors to Rome, with gratulation, and a present of a golden crown weighing * twenty five pounds, to be fet up in Jupiter: Temple within the Capitoll. Both Confuls triumphed over the Samnits : and Decime tollowed after, all After this the Embaffadours of the Campains and the Sueffians had a day of audience : and upon their humble request it was granted, that thither should be sent a standing garrison to winter r there, for to frop the excursions and invalions of the Samnits. But Capua, even then no good place for military discipline, wrought an alteration in the fouldiers there : who having once got a talks, and taken a delight in a world of pleatures of all torts, quite forgot their own natural country. For they of the garrison, began to lay plots and devile how to get Capua from the Campains even by the same wicked practile, by which themselves had won it first from the ancient possessors "and inhabitants, faying, " It made no matter, and they were but rightly ferved, in cafe their own " precedent lewd example, should return upon their own heads. Again, why should the Campains. "not able to defend themselves, nor maintain their liberties and goods, be LL, of the most plentiful "country of Italy, and of a City answerable and correspondent thereunto, rather then the victorious army, which with their (weat and blood had repelled and expelled the Samnits from them? And M " was it any reason, that they who had yeelded to be vasfials unto them, should enjoy that fruitfull " and pleasant traft, while they themselves wearied with fighting, firinggled fill and wreftled in a es pestilent air, and dry barren foll, about the City of Rome, and within that City, indured the fet-" led inveterat and intestin mischief & plague of usury, that surcharged them daily more and more? Whiles these projected conspiracies were contrived in secret conventicles, and as yet not broached and divulged to all mens knowledge, the new Conful, C. Martin Rutilin came in place : whose lot it was to be L. Deputy of the province Campania, I aving his fellow Q. Servilius in the City. who having intelligence by the Captains and Colonels, of all the particularities of those defignes: being a wife man, both for his old age and long experience (as who was now Conful the to make void and frustrat the present heat and outrage of the souldiers by deferring and prolonging their hope, as if they might put in execution their plots at their belt leifure, whenfoever they pleased. He raileth therefore a rumour, that the garrisons should in the same towns winter againthe year following. [For divided they were into fundry Cities of Campania: & the web begun at Capsa, was fored from thence through all the forces.] By means of this good respit to bethink themselves and advise of these matters, the mutiny for the present was well quieted. The Confuls then led forth the fouldiers into the fummer places of abode and repole, and purpole while he had the Samnits in quietness to cleanse the army by the casheiring &discharging those busic bodies and troublesome spirits; pretending colourably, and saying, That some of them had served ftrength decaied. Some had their paiports limited, and were tent home : arthe first one by one fingled out , afterwards, certain whole cohorts or bands, as having wintered far from their dwelling places, from their goods and substance. Under a pretence and colour also of mile ary fervices and imploiments, whiles to me were dispatched one way, some another, a great part of them were rid clean away. All this multitude, the other Conful and the Pretor kept still at Rome ; deviling this caule, and that, of delaies and abiding benind. And verily at nrift, they

Thefe and such like speeches sow they and whilper secretly, that were in the camp, when they saw the principall authors of the mutiny, who were the finews and firength thereof, by the wily policy of the Conful to be dilmenbeted from them. One cohort of them, being not far from Antur fat Amutiny and them down of Lantula, in a narrow paffe or wood between the fea and the mountains, to inter-fedition of the cept and flay; whom lower the Conful felt about this or that pretended buffineffe as is above aid, diers of Cam-Soon were there gathered together a right firong power : and nothing wanted to make after pains, of a full army, but only a head and Captain. And difordered as they were, they went robbing and spoiling, as far as the Alban country, and under the hill of long. Alba they encamp themselves within a trench and rampier. Which workbeing finished, they ipend the rest of the day in confultation about chufing a Commander, little trulting any one there prefent in place. And who possibly (say they) could be fent for as far as from Rome? What Senator or Commoner was there, that either wittingly would venture upon to great and dangerous an enterprise for to whom the cause of an army, enraged upon an injury received, might safely be committed ? The next morrow, whiles they reasoned still about this point, and fadly debated the matter, some of the wandring and vagrant forragers of the Country thereabout, bring certain intelligence, that Titus Quinting imploied himlest in basbandty, and held a farme in Tufculanum, minding neither the City, nor dignities of state and Common weal. This man was come of noble linage, and having ferved with great credit and honour in the wars by a wound received, was lame of a leg and gave over fouldiery, determining to lead the rest of his life in the country, sequestred far from all courting and ambitious fuing for civill offices. They had not fo foon heard his name, but prefently they took knowledge of the man, and (that which might turn to their good) agreed with one accord, he should be sent for. Small hope there was that he would willingly do any thing : they thought therefore to use force and to bring him to it by fear. So, in the dead time of the night, they n that were fent thereto, entred the farm house, and finding Quinting found and a fast asleep, they T. Quinting awakened him : propounded unto him either rule and honour, or elfe pre ent death : and no futprifed by mean between, in case he made stay and refused to go with them : and so they haled and brought the rebels and mean netween, in case he made they are failnted L. Generall at his first coming. And when the leader against man was affrighted at this fudden and wonderful occurrent, they endue him with the oinaments his will, and enfigus to that honor belonging, and will him to lead them as their commander to the City of Rome. Thus having plucked up the standards, in this heady fit of their own, rather then upon any advile or counfell of their captain, they march in warlike maner with an army toward Rome, within eight miles of the City, apon the causey or street way, now called Appia Via: and had spproached immediatly in that train to the very City, but that they heard there was a power comine against them, and a Dictatour created to withstand them, to wit M. Valerius Corvinus, tone-E ther with L. Empline Mamerons General of horimen. So Soon as they were come in enterview one of another, and took knowledge of the armor and enfigos : the remembrance of their native country wrought with them straightwaies a mitigation of their mood, They were not yet fo far gone, nor fo hardy, as to fined civil bloodsheither had they knowledge of any other wars but forrem , and the uttermolt rage and maddelt fit that ever they proceeded unto, was counted their Seceffion and departure away from their own countrymen. And therfore both captains and fouldiers on either fide fought means to meet together, and draw to imparle. Quinting for his part, who hawing had already his handsfull of wars in defence of his country, could worse brook taking arms against the fame : Corvinse likewise for himself, as one that with loving affection embraced all his fellow-citizens, but the fouldiers especially, and above all others those of his own army that fought E under his banner, came forth to a patle. And forth with as foon as he was once known, he had no leffereverence done of unto him of the adverse part, than filence and audience given of his own men. The immortall gods (quoth he) O fouldiers as well those which are common to you all, as mine own particular patrons, when I took my leave of the City, I adored and worshipped in this wife, craving numbly upon my knees at their hands, to vouchiafe me the honour, not of a victory over you; but of procuring concord and unity among you. The fouldiers indeed were to be capitulate, as N " once heretofore the Commons, and a fecond time the legions had done with the  Senateurs : namely, that this their revolt and pety rebellion might not be laid unto their charge, and their huxts and utter undoing. Then the Dictatour, after hee had first commended Quimins, and willed thefrest to be content and of good cheer, rode polt to the City, and by the advile of the Senatours, preferred a bill unto the people in the grove Petelinus : That the mutiny and infurrection should turn no manto fear Military ordinances and danger. He besought the Quirites also of this much favour besides, That neither in jest nor earnest, this should be laid in no mans dish. The same time there was proposed besides, a sacred military law under pain of death, That no souldiers name once entred into the musterm ster his booke, should be rased out against his will : With O this branch amexed over and befides , That no man who had been aforetime a colonell or Tribune, should after have the leading of bands, and be a Corporall. This was tollowed hard and urged by those of the conspiracy, in regard of one P. Salonins, who in maner each other year had been either a Colonel, or a chief * Centurion, whom now they call Pri-

A posed himself against their conspiracies and innovations, and took not part with them who fled from Lantula. But when this one point could not be obtained of the Senat, for the favour they bare to Salonius: then Selonius himself belought the Senators that they would not regard his honour more than the concord of the whole City; and so at length it also was granted and enacted. As unreasonable a demand was this also, That of harfement pay, (and that was triple at that time) Tome Affes should be deducted, for that they also had withfrond the conspiracy. Over and besides, third in some writers, that L. Genuius, a Tribune of the Commons, published this Law unto the pebble, That Wury might be made altogether unlawfull. Likewise in other Acts of the Commons it was provided, That na man within ten years space should be capable of the same Office twice: nor in R one year bear two Offices : and that both Confuls might be of the Commons. Which if they all were granted to the Commons, it appeareth that this infurrection carried fome Iway and force with it. In other Chronicles it is recorded, that neither Valerius was chosen Dictator, but that all this bufinels was by the Confuls managed: nor fo great a multitude of Confpirators role, before they came to Rome, but even in Rome took arms: nor yet that they came by night, in forcible manner into T. Quintius farm-house, but in the dwelling house of C. Manlius: and that he was taken up by the rebels to be their General, and from thence went as far as four miles end, and there encamped in a fortified place: that the motion of Concord arose not from the Captains, but that of a fudden, when both Armies stood aranged in order of battel, they fell to greeting one another; and that the fouldiers began to take one another by the hands and embrace with tears: and that the C Confuls feeing the fouldiers to backwark from fight, were forced to move the Senat for an attonement. So as among ancient writers, there is no certainty fet down but that a fedition there was, and the same appealed. But the rumor thereof, and the cruel war which the Sampies begun, withdrew certain nations from the Romans fociety and alliance. For befides the faithless and untruffy League (a long time) of the Latines: the Privernats also with sudden rodes, invaded and wasted

He Latines, together with the Capuans revolted: and the Latines having fent their Embassadors to the Senat (of Rome) offered and presented peace, upon this condition only, that they would create E one of their Confuls out of them. This Embaffie thus declared, Annius their Pretor, who had audience in the Capitoll, in going down from thence, took such a fall, that he died in the place. T. Manlius caused his own fon to lofe his head, because, contrary to his express commandement, he had fought against the Latines, not withfranding his good successin that combate. At what time as the Romans were greatly difireffed, and like to lofe the field, P. Decius then Coff. with Manlius devoted and offered himfelf to prefent death, for to lave the Army: and fetting spurs to his horse, rode into the midft of the enemies battell: where he was flain and by his death recovered victory to the Romans. The Latines yielded and rendred themselves. When T. Manlius returned into the City, there was not one of all the youth came forth to meet him, and do him honour, Minutia, a profeffed Veftall Virgin, was condemned for her inceft or incontinent life. The Ausonians being subdued, a Colony was planted in Cales, and another likewise in P Fregella, Many Roman dames were detected of practifing porson: and most of them were forced to drink of their own empoyloned cups first, whereof they died presently. Whereupon was the first Law then ordained against poyloning. The Privarnates, when they rebelled were vanguished, and afterwards endued with the Burgessie of the City of Rome. The Palapolitans were defeated in battell first, and after siege, surrendred upon Composition. Quintius Publilius, who blocked them within their wals, was the first man that had his Commission renued, and continued still in government, when the ordinary time was expired: and by means of the Confuls had atriumph granted anto him. The common people were active red from the danger of their creditors, by occasion of the filthy lust of one of them, Lu Papirius, who would have for-ced, and against nature abused C. Publius, a debtor of his. When L. Papirius the Dictator was returned from his Army into the City, for to take the Auspices anem, by reason of some errour supposed in the for-G mer, Q. Fabius the Generall of the horsemen having in his absence espied the opportunity and advantage of performing a worthy exploit gave battell contrary to his Edict, and put the Samuites to the worfe, For which cause, when the Dictator would seem to punish him accordingly, Fabius made an escape and sted to Rome. And when his cause would not bear him out, he had his pardon, at the earnest sate and prayers of the people. This book containeth also the fortunate exploits against the Samnites.

Ow was C. Planting Conful the second time, with L. Emyling Mamercus, when as the Setines and Norbans brought tidings to Rome of the Privernats revolt, with complaints of harms sustained at their hands. News came likewise, that an Army of Volscians, under the conduct of the Antiats, were encamped at Sarricum. Both these wars fell by lot to Plantins. Who taking his journey first to Privernum, forthwith badthem battel: and with no great conflict gave his enemies the overthrow. The Town was won and restored again to I the Privernats, with a firong garrison therein placed, but two parts of their Lands were taken from them. The Army thus having obtained victory, was conducted thence to Satricum against the Antiats. Where was a cruel battel fought with much bloudshed on both sides: and when as the tempessions and stormy weather parted them asunder, before that either side enclined to vi-Story the Romans no whit wearied with that conflict to doubtful, addressed themselves to fight against the morrow. But the Volscians having taken a view and account what men they had lost an fight, were not of like mind to adventure the hazard again : and therefore as vanquished men they diflodged by night in diforder, and fearfully took their way to Antium, leaving behind them their wounded, and part of their baggage. Great store of armour was therefound, both upon and among the flain bodies of the enemies, and also within the Camp: Which the Con- K ful promifed to dedicate to dame Lua, and to he forraged and spoiled the confines of the enemies. even as far as the sea coast. But against the other Consul Emylius, who was entred into the Sabellian land, neither were the Samnits encamped, nor their Legions opposed any where. Whiles therefore with fire and sword he wasted their Countrey, the Samnits Embassadours came unto him, craving peace: but being by him posted off to the Senate, after they had audience given. they let fall their flout flomacks, and requested peace for themselves with the Romans, and liberty to make war against the Sidicins: which petition they enforced with more reason and equity, "First, in that they had entred into amity with the people of Rome, during their prospe-"rity, and not as the Campains in their advertity: again, they were to take arms against the Si-"dicines, enemies alwaies to themselves, and never freinds to the people of Rome: who also, L "neither in peace (as the Samnits) fued for friendship and alliance, nor in time of war (as the "Campains) fought for aid and succour: and finally, were neither under the protection of the " people of Rome, nor yet their vaffals and tub jects. When as T. Emylins the Prator had confulred with the Senate about these points demanded by the Sampits and that the LL thought good that the league with them should be renewed; the Prator in the name of the rest made answer to the Samnits, "That neither the fault was in the people of Rome, that the confederacy between them was not perpetual; neither gainlaied they, but for a fmuch as they were weary themselves "first, and repented of the war commenced through their own default, the league might yet be "newly made again. Touching the Sidicins, they would be no hinderance, but that the Samnite "people, might use their liberty, and do what they thought best, either for war or peace. The M League being thus concluded and confirmed and they returned home presently the Roman Army was brought from thence upon receit of a years pay, and corn for three months, according to the capitulation covenanted with the Conful, in confideration of a truce granted, untill their Embaffadors were returned.

The Samnits, with the same forces which they had employed to withstand the Roman war, went forth against the Sidicins with undoubted hope, speedily to win the City of their enemies. Then, had the Sidicines before made an offer to yield themselves unto the Romans, but seeing the Nobles to reject them as coming too late, and wrested as it were perforce from them in their last extremity, they tendred the same to the Latines, who were already of their own accord rises up and had taken arms. The Campains likewife (fo ready and forward were they to bear in mind N an injury of the Samnits, rather than a good turn of the Romans) forbare not to joyn in this quarrel. Thus was there raised a mighty power of so many Nations banded together, finder the conduct of the Latines, and invaded the borders of the Samnits, where more hurt was received by rodes than skirmishes. And albeit the Latines in fight had the better hand, yet were they well content for avoiding to many conflicts, to depart out of the enemies country. Which gave the Samnits leiture to fend Embaffadors to Rome, who before the Senat complaining, that they endured the same measure still, being now affociats, which they had abidden before when they were enemies: befought most humbly, "that the Romans would be satisfied with that victory of the 6 Campains and Sidicins, their enemies, which they had got out of the Sampirs hands, and not "fuffer them to be trodden under foot by those Nations, the most dastards and cowards of all O others: requelling moreover, if so be the Latines and Campains were under the dominion of "the people of Rome, that they would command them by vertue of their authority to forbear the . Sampits country; and if they refused to obey then to hastife and keep them in by force of war. To these demands they stamed a doubtful answer, as being loath and abashed of the one side to confels, that the Latines were not at their devotion, and fearing again on the other fide by reproving and provoking them to turn away their hearts, and losethem for ever. And this was the anfwer. As touching the Campains, their case was otherwise, who were not by covenants and cona "ditions in forme of League, but by voluntary and simple submission, under their protection; and "therefore they should be quiet whether they would or no: but as for the Latines, by any capi-"mlation comprised in their accord, they were not prohibited to levy war with whom they lift, Which answer as it sent the Samnits away, in doubt what to think what the Romans would do fo it estranged and alienated the Campains for fear: and made the Latines more stout, as supposing the Romans now would give them the head & yield any thing unto them. And therefore under a colour of preparing war against the Samnits, they summoned and held many Councils one after another: and in all their meetings and confultations, their Princes and chief men secretly amongst themselves did nothing but plot and practice war with the Romans. In which conspiracy also, the B Campains had their hand as deep as the reft, even to bear arms against those who had been their Protestors. But although they did what they could to keep all close of purpose, and were defirous before the Romans should fir to be secured from the Samnits, (an enemy pressing hard upon their backs) yet neverthelels this complor was discovered, and intelligence thereof given at Rome, by means of certain persons linked to the Romans in privat acquaintance and mutual hospitality. Hereupon were the Confuls commanded to refign their Magisfracy before the ordinary time that fo much the sooner there might be new created against so great a danger and preparation of war. But here role a scruple of conscience, that the affembly for Election should be holden by them; whose government was thus shortned and abridged. Whereupon they proceeded to an Interreign. And two Interregents there were one after another, M. Valerius and M. Fabius: who crea-C ted Confuls, T. Manlins Torquains the third time, and P. Decius Mus.

In that year, it is recorded for certain, that Alexander King of Epirus, arrived in Italy with a Navy: who, no doubt if he had sped well at his first entrance, would have proceeded farther and warred upon the Romans. In this age flourished Alexander the Great in glorious conquests, who Alexander that being this man his fifters son, and a warrior invincible, whiles he atchieved feats of arms in another part of the world, hapned to die in his best time and prime of his youth. But to proceed forward. The Romans although there was no doubt but that their affociats, and namely the Latines were revolted: yet, as though they were carefully busied about the Samnits only, and nothing intended them; they fent for to Rome ten of their chief Peers, pretending to give them in charge what their pleasure was to have done. At that time the Latines had two Prators or Provosts. L.

Annius of * Setia and L. Numitius of Circeia both Roman Colonies. By whose means, besides Sig- * Sezzes nia and Velitre, being also Colonies of Rome, the Volscians were sollicited likewise to take arms. And thought good it was, that those Latine Prators by name, should be cited with the rest. No man was ignorant for what intent they were sent for The Prators therefore, called a Council before they went, and there declared how they were convented by the Senat of Rome, demanding their advice what answer to make as touching those matters, wherewith, as they supposed, they fhould be charged. When some were of this opinion, some of that; then Annius spake and said: The speech of "Although I my self-have moved you to resolve upon an answer, yet I think, it concerneth us more Annius in the "in our main estate, to determine what to do, than what to say, And when we are grown to a re-"folution once of our affairs, and what course to take, an easie matter will it be to frame words fit E "for the purpose For if even now already under a shadow and pretence of an indifferent league, we can abide and find in our hearts to endure bondage, what standeth in the way, but that ha-"ving abandoned and betraied the Sidicines, we be obedient not only to the Romans commandement, but also to the Samnits? and answer the Romans in these plainterms, That at their beck "only, and if they do but nod their head, we will presently lay down all arms? But if at length, the "defire and longing after liberty do touch our hearts, and give an edge unto our spirits: if there " be a league between us : and if confederacy ought to be nothing else but a society and equal frui-"tion of liberty and priviledges: if, I say, we may now glory and vaunt, whereof sometimes we "were ashamed that we are of kin to the Romans, and of their bloud: if they have an Army of as-« fociats, by the addition whereof they redouble their forces, and which the Confuls in leaving or F " levying their proper wars, will not part and lever from their own: why is there not equality in " all things else? Why is not one of the Consuls a Latine? Look where is part of power and foret ces, therealfo is part of rule and command. And certainly even this in it felf is not a matter of fo great honour unto us, as who have granted and confessed Rome to be the head of Latium: yet by "long patience and continual sufferance only, we have brought to pass that it might seem honou-" rable. But if ever ye wished to see the day wherein yemight participate in government and re-"cover your liberties again, lo, that time is now come presented unto you by your own valour, and " the gracious goodness of the immortal gods. Tried their patience ye have indenying fouldiers: "who doubted not butthat they were in a great choler and angry at the heart, when we brake a "custome of two hundred years prescription and above: yet nevertheless this grief have they put G "up, and given us not one foul word. We warred upon the Pelignians in our own name and quar-"rel:and they, who aforetimes allowed not us the liberty fo much as to defend our own marches of our felves, nothing gainfaid and croffed it. That the Sidicins were taken to our mercy and

" protection, that the Campains revolted from them and fided with us, that we levied an army a-" gainst the Samnits their confederats, they heard and knew wellenough and yet they stirred not "once forth of their City. How come they to be so calm and quiet, but upon a privity and know"ledge, both of our puissance and c. their own weakness? I am able to avouch by the report of

"men of good credit, that when the Samnits complained themselves of us, they had such an an-

"Twee again of the Senat of Rome, that it plainly appeared that they themselves pretended not to H er require that Latium should be under the Roman Empire. Do ye but take upon you, and lay " claim unto that which they secretly yield unto you themselves, and reposses it at your pleasure. "Now if any man beaffraid to be the speaker, Lo, here am I, who profess to be the man, and to " fay thus much not only in the audience of the people and Senat of Rome, but also of Jupiter him-"felf, who is refiant in the Capitol, namely, That if they will have us to be of the League and con-"federacy, they shall admit from among us one of the Consuls, yea, and a part of the Senat. As he with great spirit and boldness, not only advised this, but promised also thus to do; all that were present with a general applause and affent permitted him to do and say whatsoever he thought expedient for the common good of the Latine nation, according to that trust which they re-I posed in him, So soon as he was come to Rome (with other Embassadors) he was admitted into the Senat, and audience given him in the Capitol. Where when T. Manlius the Conful by the authority and direction of the Senators, had dealt with him and the reft, not to make war upon the Samnits their confederats: Annias raging like a conqueror, as if he had won by force and arms the Capitol; and not as an Embassador, who was to deliver his mind and message safely, by the protection of the Law of Nations, began in this fort: " The time required (quoth he) now at "length, OT. Manlins and ye Senators of Rome, not to treat and deal with us in any affairs by "way of authority and commandment, namely, when you faw Latium by the favour of the gods "to flourish exceedingly both in men and munition, as having subdued the Samnits, confederate "with the Sidicins and Campains, and now also combined with the Volicians : and besides, even K "vour own Colonies and townships too, have made choice to submit themselves to the Latines

" rather than the Romans. But forasmuch as you cannot find in your hearts of your selves, nor see "how to make an end of your proud and outragious Lordship and tyranny; We, albeit we are a-"ble to restore Latium unto her ancient freedom by force of arms, yet for kindred sake wil be conet tent to offer indifferent articles and equal conditions of peace, forafmuch as it hath pleafed " the immortal gods, that we are equal unto you in power and puissance. Imprimis, there is no reer medy now but your two Confuls must be one a Roman, and the other a Latine : Item, that the " number of Senators be elected as well out of the one nation as the other, Item, that we become " one people incorporate, and one Common-wealth. And to the end that there may be one im-"perial feat, and one name of all, and therefore we or you must needs yield, we are content a Gods I "name(and to the good of both nations may it prove)that this City and State of yours be couneted the better and more noble: and let us be called all by the name of Romans, By good hap it fo fell out, that the Romans also had for their Consul T. Manlins to match him; one as stout and hot as the other: who could not contain his anger no longer, but openly faid, "That if the Senaer tors were so far overseen and besides themselves, as to take conditions of a Setine, he would " come with his sword by his side into the Senage house, and what Latine soever he saw there in council, he would not fail but flay him with his own hand in the place. And therewith turning "to the Image of Jupiter: Hearken (quoth he) O good god Jupiter. Hearthis wickedness and in-"dignity: hear O Justice: and piety to Godward. Wilt thou abide to see, O Jupiter, in this thy ho-"Iv and facred temple, wilt thou endure, as taken captive and troden under foot to fee Confuls of M "aliens & a Senat of forreiners? Are these the covenants, O ye Latines, which Tullus King of Rome "made with the Albans your forefathers? or which L. Tarquinius after him, concluded with you? "Remember ye not the battel at the lake Regillus? Have ye so forgotten indeed, both your "own calamities and overthrows of old, and also the good turns and benefits received at our "hands? When this speech of the Consul was seconded with the indignation also of the Senators, it is recorded, that when they called upon the gods, witnesses of those covenants, and reiterated their names oftentimes, Annius in mockery of those protestations, was over-heard to despise and fcorn the power and godhead of the Roman Jupiter. But this is certain, that as he in heat of anger stepped hastily to the entry or porch of the temple, and went apace, he fell down the stairs, and so hurt his head that dashed against the bottom stair, that he swooned withall, and lay for dsad But N because all writers agree not, that he yielded up his last breath thereupon, I also wil leave it doubtful, as I find it: as also this, that in the very charging of him with breach of covenants, there poured down a tempestuous storm, with many mighty thunderclaps, For, as these and such like things may be very true, so they may be prettily devised and invented on set purpose to represent & shew the wrath and vengeance of God. Torquatus being fent by the Senat to give the Embaffadors their dispatch, seeing Annius there to lie along, cried our aloud, in the hearing both of the Senat and the people, and faid, "No force, it is well, and as it should be; thus begin and bless, O ye immortal gods, our just and rightful war. Surely there is a God above, there is a power divine and deity "in heaven, thou art no feigned and imaginary god, O mighty Jupiter & not in vain have we hal-"lowed thee in this place, as the father both of gods and men. Why ftay yethen, O Roman Qui-O " rites, ye likewise my LL, of the Senat, to take arms in the name of the gods, having them already "as you ee to be your Leaders? I for my part shall soon so overthrow and lay the Legions of the "Latines along on the earth as ye now see their Embassador, lying here at the stairs soot. The words of the Conful, received with so great applause of the people, animated and enkindled them in such lort, that had not the careful diligence of the Magistrates been more (who by commandment of the Conful accompanied the Embassadors as they went) than the ordinary safe conduct of the Law of Nations they had not escaped the rage and fury of the multitude.

The Senat also gave their affent to this war, and the Confuls having levied two atmies, and paffed through the country of the Marfians and Pelignians, and joyned unto them the Samnies power, encamped themselves before Capua, whither the Latines with their associats, were already come together. There as the report goeth, the Confuls both of them in their fleen had a viton; and there appeared unto them, one and the same shape of a mans personage much greater and more stately than the ordinary port of men, who should deliver their words unto them, "That of the two armies embattelled and affronting one another, the one was appointed as a due tri-" bute to the infernal spirits, and to Mother Earth : and of the other the chief General only. And "look of whether army the faid foveraign General should devote and offer unto those internal B" spirits, and to mother Earth, the Legions of the enemies, and his own person withall, that part "and that Nation shall have the victory. When the Consuls had imparted one to the other these night-visions, it was thought good and agreed (for to divert and appeale Gods anger) that certain facrifices should be slain, and also if the same shewed in their inwards, as appeared in their fleep, then one or other of the Confuls should fulfil the destinies, and accomplish fatal appointment. When as the answers of the Soothsaiers agreed also to that secret religion which was now entred and fetled already in their minds, then the Confuls calling together the Lieutenants and Colonels to a Council and openly declaring before them all the pleasure of the gods, (to the end. that the wilful and voluntary death of one of the Confuls, might not fright his army in the field i they agree between themselves, that of whether side the Roman battallons began first to give back and retreat, the Conful of that Army, should devote and betake himself to die for the people of Rome and the Quirites. It was debated also in that assembly, that if ever at any time before there had been war managed by severe rule and government, the military discipline should now be revived and reduced to the old manner and ancient rigour: their care in that behalf was the greater and more redoubled, for that they were to fight against the Latines, suting altogether to them in language, fashions, armour, and especially above all, in the orders and laws of warrare. For, many a time, in these two armies souldier with souldier, Centurion with Centurion, Colonel with Colonel had forted and converfed together, as collegues and compeers in the same garrisons, year and under the same colours and enfigns. By reason whereof, to the end, that by no errour the souldiers should be mistaken or deceived the Consuls made proclamation through the Camp, That no man should fight with his enemy out of his own tank, and place appointed unto him. It fortuned now, that among other Captains and Cornets of horsemen, which were sent our every way as from and espials to discover the coasts, T. Manlins the Consulhis fon together with the rest of his Corner and Troup, was passed above the enemies Camp, so near, as he was within an arrow shot of their next Corps de guard, In which was quartered the cavalry of Tufculum, under the leading of Geminius Metius a Knight, both for birth, and also for his noble feats of arms highly esteemed in his country. He espying the Roman horse, and knowing the Coss, son, advancing before them, and of especiall mark above the rest (for all Noblemen and of quality were well enough known one to another.) What, will ye Romans (quoth he) with one Cornet of horse fight with the Latines and their confederats? What shall your Consuls, what shall two Consular armies do E the mean while? Marry (quoth Manlius) they will be here time enough for you, and with them Jupiter himself, a witness of league and covenants by you broken. Jupiter I say who only can do more than allmens forces in the world. And we who at the pool Regillus, have given you lighting your bellies full, will here also quit our selves so, that never after ye shall have any great joy and pleasure to encounter and joyn battel with us again. With that, Geminus, riding forth as he was on horseback, a little from his company, Wilt thou then (quoth he) till that day come wherein ye mean with so great a do to set forward your armies to a general set field, break a staff with me in the mean time; that by the proof and event of us twain, it may henceforth appear, how far the Latine men of arms, surpais the Roman? The young man his bloud and courage was foon up either upon anger and choler, or for very shame to refuse the combat, or because God p would to have it, and it was his deltiny that could not be avoided. Forgetting therefore his fathers, commandment, and the express Edict of the Confuls, he returneth on head and rashly, to a fingle fight; wherein it skilled not much, whether he had the better or the worfe, for any great odds thereby in the main trial of the quarrel. Thus when the rest of the horsemen of both parts were retired afide (as it were) to behold some spectacle or running at tit: in the void place of the plain field, that lay, between, they right their hories in full carreer one against the other, with tharp and deadly spear in rest. Manhin with his lance alost gid over and raised the Morion of his enemy, and Merins with his spear lightly touched, and passed by the horse neck. Then having turned about their horses, Manlius came upon him first with a second charge, and so redoubled the puff, thathe thrust the others horse in between theears. At the smart of which wound the Ghorfe reared and mounted with his forefeet, and with great force shaking his head cast his rider. And as he bare his spear and shield, to raise himself from his grievous fal, Manlius ran him through at the throats fo that the spear head came forth at his ribs, and nailed himfast to the ground, And having difarmed & despoiled him rode back to his own troop and both together with exceeding Joy halfned to the Camp, and to to the Generals Pavilion, even to his father; full little knowing his tatalldelliny, and what was to befall unto him, whether he had deserved praise, or incurred danger of punishment. That all the world, quoth he, (O father) may be perswaded and report truly that I am descended indeed of your bloud, and your undoubted son Lo here I am, who being defied and challenged to fight man to man, have killed mine enemy a man of arms: fee here the M spoils of him flain and dead. Which so foon as the Cos, heard, presently he could not abide to look on his fon, but turned away, and by found of trumpet, commanded the hoft to a publike audience. Which being affembled in great number. "Foraimuch (quoth he) as thou, T. Manling, with-" out regard of Coff, authority, or dread of thy fathers ma jefty and power over thee against our E-"dict and express commandment, hast fought with the enemy, and that without thy rank and "place; and as much as lay in thee half broken the discipline of war, whereby to this day the State " of Rome hath flood maintained, and half brought me thy father to this hard point, that I must "forget either the Common-weal, or elfe mine own felfand mine we will abide rather the pu-"niffhment and mart for our own middeeds, than the whole state, to her so great prejudice and da- I "mage should pay for our folly and transgression. A fearful and dolorous example will we afford: "but good & profitable to all youth for ever hereafter. As for meverily, both the inbred love and "affection of all fathers to their children, and also this shew and proof of thy valour and knight-"hood (although seduced with deceitful apparance and vain resemblance of honour) moveth "me not a little: but fince that, either by thy death the Coff, commands must be established, or by "impunity of thy disobedience for ever disamulled, I would not wish thee to refuse (if there be any " of my bloud in thee) but by thy punishment to restore and set up again the military discipline "which this day by thy default is fall down and ruinate, Go fer jeant, and bind him to a stake, At this fo cruel a sentence, they were all amazed and in an extasse, that were present: and as if they had feen the edge bent against themselves, for fear more than for any modelly or reverence, they K were quiet. So when they were come again to themselves, as if their spirits had been recovered after some deep impression of a wonder which had assoned them, they sood still with silence:but fo foon as the poor wretch his head was chopt off, and his bloud feen to gush and spin out, then began they all of a sudden to speak freely and complain with open mouth, so as they forbare neither lamentations nor curies: they covered the youth his body with his own victorious spoils, they erected a funeral pile of wood over his corps without the trench and rampiers, fet it on fire, and burnt him accordingly; and so with as great love and affection as souldiers could shew, performed their last duty unto him, and solemnized his obsequies. Thus the commandments of Manling were not only dreadful for the present, but gave an heavy and searful precedent for the

fouldiers more dutiful to their Captains and Leaders: and besides that, the rounds and sentinels, and the fet corps de guard, were every where more carefully looked unto and observed : even in the very hazard and extremity also of the battel afterward, that austere severity did much good.

For their fight was much like unto a civill war. So little, or nothing at all in a manner differed the

Latines from the Romans Common-wealth, but only in heart and courage,

Aforetime they used Roman long large shields, covering their whole bodies; but in process of time, after that they became Stipendaries and to take pay, they bare shorter targets. And whereas aforetime they had their battallons thick and close together, like to the Macedonian Phalanges, afterwards they began to range their battel into bands more loofely and diffinctly; and last of all, they were divided into thinner orders and squadrons: every such order or squadron M contained threefcore fouldiers, two Centurions, and one Port enfign. The forefront of the vangard ware javelineers called Hastari, in sisteen squadrons, distant some little way one from another: fuch a foundron had twenty fouldiers lightly armed, and all the reft a fort of Targeteers. And those were called light-armed, who carried only a spear or javelin to fight with at hand, and other darts to lance from them aloof. This forefront contained the flower of youths, that grew up as apprentices to war-fervice. Then followed after them of stronger and riper age, as many bands or squadrons, which were called Principes; whom there followed hard at heels, thirty squadrons, all targeteers or shield-bearers, with brave armour above all others. And this battallon of thirty companies they called Antepilani [avant-darters] for that the other fifteen orders of bands were placed hard before the entigns. And of these every band confifted of three parts : and each of them N they called Primum plum, and it was composed of three banners or pannonces : and every such banner contained 186 men. The first Pannonce or banner conducted the Triaris, who were old fouldiers of approved valour: the second, those that were called Rorari, of less purifiance both for age and prowels: the third, such as were named Access, who were of least account and trust, and therefore they were cast behind unto the tail of the battallon. When the Army was thus ordered in battel array into their bands & fquadrons, the javelineers formoff of all began the fight: if they were not able to discomfit the enemies, than they with steady footing and soft pace retired back into the void places between the foundrons of the Principes, who received them: then began the Principes to enter into the batter and to maintain fight; and were seconded by the Ha-If at i or Javelineers. The Trigiti remained standing all this whiles firmly, about their enfigns, fetting O out their left legs afore them at length, with their Targets on their shoulders, and their pikes or javeling flicking on the ground, with their heads somewhat bending forward, much like as if their battel were fortified with a Pallilado or rampier of pales and sharp stakes. Now if those Principes had not good fuccefs in fight, they retired themselves by little and little from the forefront to the Triarii. And hereupon grew the proverb that when a thing was at a dead lift and in diffress, they would lay, We are come to the Triarii. Then the Triarii standing up right, lo soon as they had received the Principes and Haftati, into the void place between their files, prefently drew in their ranks and files close together, and thut up as it were all waies of passage and entrance, and with one main joint and close battallon (as if now there were no more hope behind) advanced toward the enemy. And this most of all feared and terrified the enemies, when thinking to chale those that they seemed to have vanquished, they saw a new battel of fresh men starting up, and the fame increased in number. Now were there commonly four Legions enrolled, confifting of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse to every legion. As many more were added unto them, and those mustered out of the Latines, who at that time were enemies to the Romans, and had ordered their battalions after the same manner in all respects. And they knew well enough that not only ensign with ensign, R all pikes and javelins with pikes and javelins, Principes with Principes, but one Centurion with another, if the arraies were not broken, were to encounter. Two Primipili or chief Centurions, there were amongst the Triarii in the one army and the other. The Roman of body not so strong and well fet, howbeit a good fouldier otherwise, skilfull and of great experience : the Latine, exceeding mighty, and a notable fighter of all others. Well known they were one unto the other, because at all times they had the same conduct and equal place of charge. The Roman not greatly trutting to his own strength, was permitted even at Rome by the Col. to chuse unto him an under-Centurion whom he would: who might protect and defend him tale from an enemy that should have to deal with him hand to hand. And it fortuned that the yong man by him elected, fought in the throng and got the victory of the Latine Centurion. As for the battel, it was fought not fir from the foot of the hill Veluvius, in the very way that leadeth to Veleris. The Roman Confuls before they came into the field killed their beafts for facrifice. And the bowel-prying Sporthfaier (as it is reported) shewed to Decime the head of the Liver on the inner fide wounded (35 it were) and cut off: otherwise in all respects, his facrifice was acceptable to the gods. As for Mantius, he had as good figns of Gods favour in his, and all as well as might be. That is well yet (quoth Degins) if my collegue speed well, and have good success by his facrifice. Their battels being to arranged as I faid before they marched into the field. Manties led the right wing Decims the leit. At the first they tought on both sides with equal forces and like courage and heat of stomack. But afterwards on the left wing, the Roman Hastati, not able to sustain the violent charge of the Latines, retired to the Principes. In which trouble and fearful diforder, Decius the Cof, called aloud n to M. Talerius. "We have need of Gods help (quoth he) O Valerius. Where art thou, the publike "high Priest of the people of Rome? Come and say afore me that form of words, whereby I may "devote and betake my felf for the Legions. The Priest commanded him to put on his long purple robe embroidered before, called Pratexta, to cover his head, and to put forth his hand under the faid robe at his chin, and standing upon his javelin, with both his feet, to pronounce these words after him, as follow: [O Janus, Jupiter, father Mars, Quirinus, Bellona, Oye Lares and domesticall gods, the gods Novembles and Indigetes; ye gods likewife, whose power extendeth over us and our enemies, and O Manes the infernal gods, you I invocat, you I wor hip and adore, your pardon I befeech and favour crave, that ye would profeer all power and victory unto the people of Rome and Quitites; and put to fear fright, and death, the enemies of the people of Rome and Quitites. And just as I pronounce infet E words for the weal publike of the Quirites, the Army, Legions and aids of the people of Rome, I betake with me unto Manes the infernal spirits, and dame Tellus, the Legions and aids of the enemies, and my felf after them; Having made this praier he willed the Ser jeants or Lictors to go to Mailing, and with all speed to rell him, that his collegue was devoted for the army. Himself girded after the Gabine fashion, and armed at all pieces, mounted on horseback and so rode into the midst of his enemies. Of both armies he was feen to carry with him much more flately and venerable portthan a man as fent from heaven to be a fatisfaction of all gods wrath, and to turn away all plague and milchief from his own people upon the enemies. All terrour and fear he carried with him as he went and first disordered the enigns of the Latines in the edge and border of the battallons, and afterwards entred within into the whole army. This was noted and feen most evidently, that F which way so ere he rode the enemies were smitten with fear, as if they had been blasted and struck with some untoward aspect and influence of a planet. But so soon as he was fall and overcharged with thot of darts, prefently from that place all about, the cohorts of the Latines (out of all queftion) as am ized men, fled away and avoided, And therewithal likewife the Romans, as if they had been dif harged and freed from their religious fear and scruple of conscience, and as if they had but then and not before heard the found of the trumpet to battel, began to charge and fight afresh. For both the Rararii advanced forward and ran among the ranks of the Antepilani, and therby re-enforced the Haltari and Principes, and cauled them to fight more stoutly: and the Triarii kneeling on their right knee, waited till the Cof gave them sometoken to arise. Afterwards in pto els of fight, when in other parts the Latines in their number prevailed, Minims the Conlin, ha-G ving heard of the final end of his companion, and (and right as piety would) accompanied as well with plaints and tears as with due praites fo worthy and memorable a death for a while doubted, whether it were yet time for the Triarii to arise. Afterwards thinking it better that they should be selerved in heart and fresh, unto the last push of extremity, he biddeth the Accentifrom the hindmoletail of the rereward to come forth before the standards. Who so loon as they were come in place forthwith the Latines, supposing the enemies had done the like railed their Triani, Who having or a good while fought her ely and wearied themselves, and either broken their javelins or dulled their points, and yet by meer force repulled their enemies; thinking now all had been done and the victory archieved as being come as far as to the utmost skirts of the battallons; "Then, H "duoth the Conful to the Triarit, rife now fresh and lusty as ye are, against the wearied, mindful " of your country, parents, wives and children, mindful of the Conful, who for your victory hath " taken his death. The Triarii all hearty & unfoiled, were not so soon risen up, shewing themselves in their bright and glittering armour, but there began on a fudden & unlooked for, a new skirmith and conflict. For they receiving the Antepilani between their files, fet up a shout and outcry troubled & disordered the Principia of the Latines, gored their faces with their javelins, flew the principal flower and ftrength of their best & formost men and passed untouched in a manner through the other bands, as if they had been difarmed: yea, and brake through their pointed and close battallons, with so great a murder, that scarcely they lest behind them a fourth part of their enemies I alive. The Samnits also under the foot of the hill, being seen a far off in battel array, smote a terror among the Latines. But among all either Citizens or Allies, the especial commendation of that fervice rested in the Consuls: of whom, the one turned all the threats and dangers from the gods both above and beneath, upon himself alone; the other in that battel shewed such valour and policy, that it is confessed both of Romans and Latines, who have written of that journey and commended it to posterity, that of whether army T. Manlins had the conduct, that way doubtless would the victory go. The Latines after their defeat and flight retired to Minturna: their camp presently upon the battel was won, and many a man there surprised alive and cut in pieces, but the Campains especially. That day could not the corps of Decius befeen, for that the night came upon them as they fought for it: the morrow after it was found amongst a mighty company of K flain enemies, overwhelmed with swords, dares and javelins : and with all honour and solemnity according to his death performed by his brother Conjul were his funerals.

This also amongst the rest, seemeth worth the remembrance and to be inserted in this place, namely, That it was lawful for Conful, Dictator, and Protor, whenfoever they facrificed and betook to the Devil the Legions of their enemies, for to vow and offer withall, not themselves in any case but any Citizen whom they would: provided alwaies that he were one of the enrolled legion of the Romans. [And if the man who is thus additted and destined to death, hap to die, all is well, and as it ought to be: But if he die not then was the image of him seven foot high or above buried in the ground, and a purging or propitiatory sacrifice was slain in his stead: but where soever it chanced that Image to be so interred thither was it not lawfull for any Roman Magistrate to set foot and come. But if L a man would needs offer and vow himself to death, as Decius did, and die not, he shall not purely perform any lacred duty or do lacrifice, either for himself or the City, that hath once thus betaken himself. If he will bequeath and offer his armour to Vulcan, or to some faint whom soever he lift be it permitted and tamful for him fo to do, either by way of facrifice or other off ering as he pleafeth. As for the weapon or hear over which the Conful standing on both his feet, made his prayers and invocations, it is not lawful the enemy to feize thereon: but if befortune to win the same, a propitatory sacrifice must be offered to appease Mars to wit, a swine, a sheep, and a Bull.] And albeit the records both of all divine and humane customes and traditions, make no mention hereof, and are now grown out of use and remembrance, by reason that we prefer new and forrein ceremonies, before the old ancient rites of our own country and ancestors, yet I thought not amiss to make report hereof, even in those very M words and terms as they were nied delivered and pronounced.

In some writers I find, that the Samnits having waited to see the event of this battel, came to aid the Romans when all was done and past. Also, that there was succour a coming from Lavinium unto the Latines, but not before they had the overthrow; by reason that they spent a great time in deliberation. And when as now the formost ensigns and some part of the army was gone forth of the gates, and news came of the defeat and flaughter of the Latines; as they turned their banners and returned into the City, it is faid, That their Prator or Provoft, named Millionius, ipake these words, "That so small a way as they had gone, must cost them dear, and full sweetly would the Romans be paid therefore. Such as were remaining of the Latines after the battel and were scattered asunder in many and divers waies, when they were rallied together shrowded N themselves for safety in the City Vescia. Where in their Councils and assemblies, Numifius their Generall, averred, and affored them, that Mars indeed was common, and the hazard indifferent to both parties, as having made an equal massacre in the one army and the other; and that the base name only of victory went with the Romans: for otherwise, they carried away with them the fortune of men vanquished, and sped no better than they, For (faith he) The two royal pavilions of their Cosare polluted and defiled; the one with the particide of his own ion, the other for the death of the Cos, who had vowed himself to die: all their forces in manner slain : their Javelineers and principals killed: a bloudy flaughter committed both before and behind the Standards: and only the Triarii at the last upshot renewed the fight and set all upright, And albeis (anoth he) the power of the Latines also be shrewdly abated yet for a fresh supply, either Lati-O smor Volsei are nearer than Rome. And therefore if they so thought good, he would with all speed taile the lufty flower and cholen manhood both out of the Latines and the Volicians, and return again with a fresh army to Capua; and with his sudden coming unlooked for, surprise and defeat the Romans, expecting as then for nothing lets, than a fecond barrel. So by dispatching his cantelous and deceitful letters into all parts of Latium and the Volician nation (by reason that they who had not been present at the battel were sooner induced to give rash credit) there was artimulenary army in great half levied, entrolled, and affembled together out of all quarters.

A This hoft as it marched, Torquatus the Conful met at Tifanum, a place between Sinue ff a and Minturne. And before they could chuse out a plot of ground to encamp in they bestowed their carriages and baggage on heaps of either fide: fell to a battel prefently, and made a final end and conclufion of all the war. For the enemies were brought to low, that as the Conful led his victorious Army to waste their Country, all the Latines yielded themselves to him; and this their rendring the Campains likewise followed. Thus Latium and Capua forfeited and lost part of their Territories. The lands of the Latines with the Privernats laid thereto, and the Territory of Falerii, which belonged to the people of Capua, even as far as the river Vulturinus, was divided amongst the Commons of Rome. Two acres in the Latine Country, with a supplement of three sour parts out of n the Privernats land to make up the whole: and three acres in the Territory of Falerii, with addition of a fourth part to boot for amends, because it was so far off, were assigned for a man. The Laurentins only, of all Lavium, and the horsemen of the Campains escaped this punishment and were exempted from the rest, because they had not revolted. And a decree passed, that the League with the Laurents should be renewed: and from that time usually every year is it renewed, after the tenth day of the Latine holidaies. Those Campain horimen were made free denizens of Rome: and for a monument and memorial thereof, they fet up and fastned a brazen table at Rome in the Temple of Caftor. The people of Capua were enjoyeed to pay yearly to every one of them, (and

C ding to each mans defert, T. Marlins returned home : whom the elders only [for certain] went forth to meet on the way: the youth, not only then, but ever after, during his life abhoried, and with curles detefted him. The Antiats made certain rodes into the Territories of Hostia, Ardea, and Solona, And for that Manlins the Conful was not able himself in person to intend and manage that war, by reason of fickness, he nominated for Distator L. Papirius Crassus, who as it hapned was at that time Prætor: by whom was named for General of the horiemen. L. Papirius Curfor. This Dictator, albeit he kept the field, and lay encamped certain months within the Confines, yet atchieved no worthy and memorable exploit. After this year thus renowned for the victory of so many and so puissant nations, and withall, for the nobie and samous death of the one Conful, and for the government of the other, albeit stern and rigorous, yet notable and renowned; n there succeeded Consuls, T. Amylius Mamercus, and Q. Publilius Philo, who met not with the like subject and matter of great affairs: and they themselves were more mindful either of their own private business, and studious to maintain a side and faction in the Common-weal, than to advance the State of their Country. Howbeit, the Latines (who rebelled for anger that they lost their lands) they discomfited in the plain of Fenetta, drave them both out of their Camp, and forced them to leave the field. Where, whiles Publilius (by whose governance and conduct that victory was atchieved) received furrender of the Latines, theflower of whose youth was there all flain and killed up Émylius led his Army against Pedum. As for the Pedans they had maintenance from Tybur, Preneste, and Velitern, who took their parts : there came also aid from Lanuquium and Antium. Where the Roman Conful, albeit he had the better hand in skirmish, yet for E that there remained behind a new piece of service about the City it self Pedam, and the Camp of their Confederats which was adjoyned close to the Town: all of a sudden he gave over the war. unfinished, because he heard that triumph was decreed unto his brother Consul. He also himself returned to Rome, and called earneftly for triumph before victory. At which untimely and covetous desire of his, the Nobles being offended, denied flatly; that unless he either forced Pedum by affault, or won it by composition he should not triumph. Hereupon Emplius being discontented and alienated from the Senat, bare his Consulship atterward like to the seditious Tribunes. For so long as he was Consul he ceased not to charge and accuse the Nobles before the people; and his Collegue no whit gainlaid him as being himself one of the Commoners. He took occasion of these acculations upon this, that the lands in the Latine and Falern Countries, were divided in F pinching and scant measure among the Commons. And after that the Senat, desirous to abridge the time of the Consuls government, had decreed that a Dictator should be declared against the

Latine rebels; Emylius (whole turn it was at that time to govern) nominated his owncompanion in office to be Dictator, by whom Junius Brutus was named General of the horse. This Dictatorship was popular and altogether framed to the humour of the common people: both by reason of slandrous and accusatory Invectives made against the Nobles: and sorthat it enacted three Statutes, most save able and pleasing to the Commons, and as cross and adverse to the Nobility: first, That the Acts devited and enacted by the Commons, should bind all the Quirites or Citizens of Rome: lecondly, That all laws which were proposed and to pass by the suffrages of the Centuries, before the Scrutiny began, and their voices gathered, the Nobles should allow

@ and approve: thirdly, That for a fmuch as they were come thus far already, that both the Cenfors might be of the Commons, now one Cenfor at the leaft should be a Commoner of necesfity. Infomuch as the Nobles thought verily that there was more loft at home this year by these Consuls and Dictator, than gained to the Empire abroad, by their victories and warlike ex-

In the year following when C. Furius Camillus and Q. Menius were Confuls, to the end that Æmylius the Conful of the former year, might be more notably reproached for the quitting and letting flip of a victory that should have been atchieved in his year, the Senat began to mutter as. Denarii in their speeches, that Pedum by force of arms, by valour of men, & all possible means what soever. H should be destroyed and rased to the ground. Whereupon the new Contuls being forced to lay afide all other affairs and to go in hand with that service, first took their journey thither. Now was Latinm grown to those terms, as they could neither abide war nor endure peace. To maintain the wars they wanted means and peace they could not away with nor abide to hear of never fince the loss of their lands, So they thought best to hold a middle course; to stand upon their guard, and to keep themselves within their towns: that the Romans being not provoked, should make no quarrel of war : and if there were tidings brought of any town beleaguered there might be aid fent from all parts to the befieged, And yet for all this, were the Pedans succoured but of very few. The Tiburtins and Praneftins, who fecountry lay nearest came to Pedum. But for the Ari- I cins, Lanuvins, and Veliternes, who joined their forces with the Antiats and Volfcians, were fuddenly affailed and fet upon near the river Astura by Menius, and vanquished, Camillus sought before Pedum with the Tiburtins, who came into the field with a right puissant army, and put him to much trouble and hazard: howbeit, he had as good success in the end as Menius. The greatest tumult and trouble was caused especially by occasion of a sudden sally of the townsmen in the very time of the conflict. Against whom after that Camillus had opposed part of his forces to make head, he not only drave them within the wals, but the same day also, when he had discomfitted both them and their succours, he scaled the town and was Master thereof. Then it was thought good, with greater preparation of power and couragious resolution, after the winning of that one City to go about with the victorious army from one to another, and so to subdue and tame for e- K ver the whole nation and name of Latium. Neither rested they, untill partly by main force, and partly by taking one City afterlanother by way of furrender, they had brought all Latium under their jub jection. After this having disposed and placed garrisons in every town which they had got, they departed to Rome for triumph: which was to them by a general consent of all men granted Besides their triumph this honour was to them done, that two statues of horsemen (a rare thing in those daies) should be erected for them in the Grand place called Forum.

The Oration of Camillus to the Senat of

But before that they gathered the suffrages of the people, in the assembly for Election of Coss. against the year following, Camillus in this wise made a speech to the Senat, touching the Latine nations. "My LL and Senators of Rome, That which by war and force of arms was to be done in "Latium, is now by God his goodness and the valour of our fouldiers brought to good pals. The L "Armies of our enemies flain before Pedum and Astrua: The Latine towns all, and Antium a Ci-"ty of the Volicians either by force won, or rendred by composition, are now held and kept to "your behoof by your own garrifons. It remaineth now to confult (foralmuch as they trouble us " oft by rebellion) and to devise some means how to keep them quiet in continual peace. In this " consultation, the immortal gods have given you thus much power to resolve upon that it lieth " wholly in your hands to chuse whether Latium shall continue still a nation or no: and therfore " may ye for ever procure your selves repose and security from thence either by rigour & punish-"ment, or by clemency and pardon, chuse you whether. Are ye minded to proceed by way of c su-"elty against those that have yielded themselves, and are vanquished? Ye may, indeed, destroy all "Latium, and make all wast and a desart wilderness, from whence oftentimes in sundry and dan- M "gerous wars of yours, ye have had the help of an army of Allies, & found them fast and valorous. "But wil ye(as your ancestors have done before you)enlarge the Roman Empire by receiving un-" to your City those whom ye have conquered? Then have ye matter & means to grow up stil and "wax mighty, to your great honour and glory, Surely, that government & dominion is of all other "most strong and sure, wherein the subjects take joy in their obedience. But whatsoever you mean " to determine in this behalf, ye had need to make speed and resolve betimes. So many nations ye " hold in suspence of mind between sear and hope: and therefore behooseful it is, that you both "rid and deliver your felves (as soon as you can) of the care they put you to; and also whiles their "heads are busied and minds unresolved (standing as they do amazed in doubtful expectation) "either by punishment or by benefit, to forestal and prevent them before they take heart again, N "For our part, it was hitherto our endeavour to effect and bring about, that ye might be able to "dispose of all at your pleasure, and as you would your selves: now your duty it is to determine " what is best for your selves and the Common-weal. The Lords and chief of the Senat praised this motion of the Cof. and deemed good in general. But forasmuch as the condition of the parties was divers, and their cause not all one, they said that they might resolve and determine best, according to the desert of each state, if they were specified by name, and the opinions asked in particular, So they fell to consultation of them severally as they were propounded: and set down this order and decree. Imprimis, that the Lanuvins be enfranchised Citizens of Rome, and enjoy again their own religion and facred ceremonies, with this proviso, that the chappel and grove of Juno Sofbita should be common to the Burgesses of Languium and the people of Rome, Kem, that the O Aricins Nomentans, and Pedans, shall be made denizens of Rome, and endued with the liberties and priviledges of the Lanuvins. Item, that the Tufculans retain fill that freedom of their City fafe, which as then they enjoyed : and the crime and attainder of rebellion, to be charged upon a few of the chief to fave the common state from danger. Item, that thereshould be grievous punishment inflicted upon the Veliterns, who being ancient Roman Citizens, had notwithstanding to often taken arms and rebelled: that their wals should be dismantled and rased: their Senators from thence translated, and confined beyond Tyberis, there to dwell, upon pain, that

At Antium was there a new Colony planted, with this pro-ifo that the ancient inhabitants of the Anciars should be permitted (if they themselves would to be enroyled there, and remain fill, From thence were their long Gallies and war-flying had away, and the people of Amium wholly forbidden the fea: but the freedom of Roman Citizens to them was granted. The Tyburts and Prenettins forfeited their lands, not for their late tref-B pass of rebeliion, common with other Latines, but because they repining and envying the good estate of the Romans had in times past joyned erms with the Frenchmen, a savage and unsociable nation From the other Latines Cities and States, they took away the priviledge of marriage, the commerce of traffick, and entercourie of mutual intelligences, and holding countels themselves, for ever after. To the Campain Gentlemen that served with horse aforesaid, for that they would not give consent to revolt with the Latines: to the Fundans also and Formans, through whole country they had alwaies had free, fafe, and quiet passage to and fro, this honour was done, as to be made Citizens of Rome; but without the liberty of giving voices. Item, it was decreed, that the Cumans and Sueffulans, should be of the same condition and state that Capua was. ably under their dominion, all the countries, as well through thefavour which they won by bountiful dealing as by might and frong hand, there arose war between the Sidicins and Auruncians. The Aurunci, who had yielded afore to T. Manlius Conful, and were taken into protection afterwards rebelled not: whereby they had a more just cause to request and seek for aid at the Romans hands But before that the Confuls had led forth their power out of the City (for the Senate had commanded, that the Aurunci should be defended tidings came, that the Aurunci for D fear had quit their town: and being fled with their wives and children, had fortified Sinue la which now at this day is called Aurunea: and that the ancient wals, with the town it feli, were by the Sidicins destroyed. Hereat the Senate offended with the Consuls, by whose delay and lingring their allies had been betraied in time of their necessity, ordained a Dictator to be chosen. So there was elected C. Clondius Regillensis, who appointed for General of horiemen C. Claudius Hortator. But hereupon role a scruple of conscience about the creation of the Dictator. And when the Augurs had pronounced, that they thought him, not rightly created, both Dictator and General of horsemen gave over their rooms. The same year Minutia, a Vestal Nun, was first suipested of incontinency,, for going in her apparel more trim than was decent for one of her calling and profession: and after that, brought in question and accused by a bond-servant, that infor-E med against her to the High Priests. The year next enfuing, under the Confulfhip of L. Papirius Craffus and Cafo Duellius, was notable and famous for the war of the Autonians, in regard rather of the novelty, than the greatness, and danger thereof. They were a people that inhabited a towncalled Cales, and had joyned their power with the Sidicins their next neighbours. The whole power of which two nations being difcomfitted in one battel, and the same not so memorable, was for the nearness of their Cities more ready to flie, and in their flight more sate and secured. Yet the Nobles of Rome omitted not the care of that war: for that the Sidicins so often, either had themselves moved war, or aided those that began, or else were the cause of all troubles. Whereupon they endeavoured all that they could to make Conful the fourth time, the noblest warriour in those daies, M, V. lerius Corvinus, who had for his brother in government M. Artilus Regulus. And lest haply some errour by chance

G should be committed suit was made to the Consuls, that extraordinarily, and without casting lot, that province might fall to Corvinus: who having received the Army (after the victory at Cales). of the former Confuls, went forth. And when at the first shout and onset he had discomfitted his enemies, who in remembrance of their former late overthrow were affrighted he affaied to affault their very wals: and so eager and hotly bent (I assure you) were the sou diers, that even at the first they would have set ladders to, as making full account to scale up to the top, and enter the town. But Corvinus, because that was an hard adventure, wis desirons to accomplish that enterprise by the long toil of his souldiers, rather than their present perill the raised therefore a countermure, and platforms, and rolling frames, mounted against the wals but as good H hap was by an opportunity that fell out they had no nie of their munitions and fabricks. For M. Fabius a Roman priloner, taking vantage of the negligence of his keepers upon a festival holiday, and making means to break his bonds, let himself down by a long cord, fattned as one end to a pinacle or battlement of the wall, and flid by the arms, among the munitions and fabricks of the Romans: who to pertwaded and prevailed with the General that he caused him to give an assault upon the enemies now being fast asleep, as having filled their bellies with wine and good meats. So that with as little ado were the Ausonians and their City surprised, as they were afore vanguished in fight. A great booty of pillage was there got and after a garrison placed at Cales, the Legions were brought back to Rome. The Conful by de ree of the Senate triumphed : and that At- I tilius should not be without his glory too, both Coff, were appointed to lead forth an Army against the Sidicins: but before they went, they appointed by a decree of the Senar, L. Emplius Mamercus to be Dictator, to hold the election of Confuls. Who named Q. Publins Philo for his General of horfemen.

In this Election holden by this Dicator, there were created Confuls, T. Veturius, and Sp. Po-Shumius. Who albeit there remained some part behind of the Sidicins war yet to the intent they might gratifie the Commons by some good turn, and prevent their longing beforethey spake themselves; proposed an Act concerning the bringing of a Colony to Cales: and when as the Senate had ordained that two thouland and five hundred men should be enrolled and affigned thither; they created Triumvirs for to bring them thither, and to divide the lands, namely, Cafe K Duellius T. Quintius, and M. Fabius. After this, the new Conful having received the army of the old entred into the enemies confines, wasting all before until they came to the very walls of their City. Now, for that the Sidicins had affembled a puissant army, and seemed themselves fully resolure and bent upon utter delpair to put all unto the latt adventure, and to fight it out to the laft man. Moreover because it was noised that all Samnium was risen up in arms: by authority from the Senate the Confuls appointed P. Cornelius Ruffinus Dictator, and M. Antonius was nominated General of the horse. But hereupon grew again another f ruple, that there was some errour escaped in the creation: so they religned up their places, and because there ensued also a plague hereupon (as if all their Auspices for Elections of Magiltrates had been touched and infected with that errour and default) the managing of all affairs tell to an Interreign. Which being now entred L upon by the fifth Interregent, M. Valerius Corvinus, then Confuls were created, L. Cornelius the fecond time and Cn. Domitius. When all things eife were at quiet, the rumour of the Gauls war was fo rife and hor that it was

The rumour taken for a very "Tumult, Whereupon it was thought good, that a Dictator should be created. And M. P. pirius Crassus was nominated who had P.V terius Publicata for General of the horsemen. When they had mustred the souldiers more streightly and with greater regard than would have been for wars near hand the espials who were tent out, brought word that all was well and viet among the Gauls. But suspected it was that Samnium now the second year was ready to drop our of their allegeance and teek a change. Whereupon the Roman army was not withdrawn out of the Sidicin country. Howbeit the war of Alexander King of Epirus, drew the Samnits into M the Lucans country, which two nations uniting their for es, gave the King a battel, as he made rodes from Peffus. In which conflict Alexander having got the upper hand, entred into a League and amity with the Romans: although it was much doubted, with what faithfulness he would obferve the same, if all his affairs prospered as well. The same year was a solemn Levy or Numbring of the people of Rome held, and the new Citizens were matriculated and enrolled. And therefore two Tribes were annexed, Melia and Capria: the Leviers that ordained them, were Publ. Philo, and Sp. Posthumius. The Acerrans became Roman Citizens, by an act proposed by L. Paperius the Prator: by vertue whereof they were enfranchifed Denizens. but without the pri-viledge of giving voices. These were the afts for this year both at home and abroad.

The year next following (were it through the unkind distemperature of the air, or by some N wicked practice of man) was infamous when M. Claudius Marcellus and T. Valerius were Confuls. I find the furname of this Conful to vary in divers Chronicles, in fome Flaccus, in others Potitus. But it matters not much whether be true, This rather I could willingly have wished (and yet all Authors do not record it) that it had been falsely recorded. That those persons by sorcery and poifon were made away, whose death hath defamed that year with the note of a petilence, But yet as the thing is left in writing, I purpose to de iver it, lest that I should seem to derogate ought from the credence of any writer. When as the chief personages of the City died upon like diseases, and after one and the same manner of symptomes a certain chamber-maid pre-ented her self to Q. Fabius M sximus (being for the time an Adile of State) and professed to bewray the cause of that pub ike and contagious malady, if the might be affured by faithfull promite from him, that by the O utterance thereof the should not come to harm nor trouble. Forthwith Fabins delivered this matter to the Confuls : and the Confuls made relation thereof to the Senate: by the confent of which State affurance was made accordingly unto the party aforelaid, to reveal the matter. Then she declared that by the lewd and mis hievous wickedness of women the City was thus afflicted: and namely. That certain Dimes of Rame, even their own wives, boiled and tempered rank poifons, (to kill their husbands) and if they would follow it prefently they might be taken in the manner. So they went flraight waies with the wench, and found fome women as they were

A feething and preparing venomous drugs, yea and fome poyloned confections already put up. Which were brought into the market place, and about 20, of those dames, with whom the poyfons were found, were fent forby a Sergeant. Two of them Cornelias and Sergia, both noble women born, flourly standing upon these tearms, and stifly avouching. That they were soveraignmedicitines and wholfom for the body of man, were by the chamber-maid aforefaid confuted, and enjoined to drink thereof, that they might disprove her, and make her a liar, and to have devited of her own fingers ends this false flander. Who took a time to commune and confer together, that the people were avoided aside to make them way. Now when as in fight of all the World. thele two Dames had propounded the matter to the rest there in place, they also refused not: and B to having drunk the poyloned potion, they all perished by their own mischievous mactife. Then prefently were their complices apprehended, who detested and discovered a great number of other Wives: of which 170, were condemned. Never afore that day was there any inquintion nor process at Rome, about poyloning and forcery. So as the thing was taken for a prodigious wonder, and imputed rather to their minds, befotted and bewitched, then to any fellonious intent of theirs. Whereupon the Magistrates of the City, calling to mind and searching the old Chronicles. found, that in times past, at what time as the Commons in a mad fit withdrew themselves and departed the City, there was a spike or great nail driven and fixed by the Dictator: and that the minds of the people, which by discord had been distracted and out of their right wits, were by that ceremonial latisfaction, brought again in good tune: and therefore it was thought good, C that for the fasting or sticking up of such a nail, there should a Dictator be created. So Cn. Quintilius was nominated, who named L. Valerius General of horsemen, who so soon as the nail was fastned, gave over their places.

Contuls then were created, L. Papirius Craffus the second time, and L. Plantins Venow. In the beginning of which year, there came from the country of the Volicians as Embafiadors to Rome. the Fabraterns and Lucans, making request that they would take them into their protection promiling that if by them they were defended from the forces of the Samnits, they would become loyal and obedient subjects to the people of Rome: Then were Embassadors sent from the Senat, to give commandment to the Samnits, to forbear doing any violence upon the borders of those nations. Which embaffage fped well and took place; not fo much for that the Samnits defired . D peace, as because they were not as yet ready prepared for war. The same year began the Privernats war. The confederates whereof, were the Fundans, and their Leader likewife a Fundan, one Viruvius Vaccus, a man of great name and reputation, not only in his own country, but also at Rome. His dwelling house flood sometime in mount Palarine, even the very same, which after the building was pulled down, and the ground forfeit and confiscate, was called Vacci Prata. Against whom as he wasted and spoiled far and neer the Setin, Norban and Coran countries, L. Papirius went forth with a power, and rested not far from his very camp. But Vitravius neither had the wit to keep himself within his trench against a mightier enemy, nor yet the heart to encounter far from his fort. But having put his fouldiers in battel array, before they were all well out of the gate of the camp, whiles the fouldiers had more mind to flie backward, then march forward E and encounter the enemy: without either advise or confident courage he fought: and with as little ado, and without any question of the matter he was vanquished : so by reason of the shortness of the way, and the easie retire into the camp so neer, he found no great trouble to save his souldiers from much flaughter. For in the very conflict, few or none in a manner were flain, and not many in the press of the rout and tail of the flight, at what time as they rushed into their camp. And in the beginning of the night, the army thus discomfitted, made haste to Privernum, there to defend themselves within a wall rather then a trench. Plantim the other Coss. having from Privernum, overrun and forraged the territory, and driven booties away, conducted his army into the Fundan country. The Senat of the Fundans as he entred into their confines met him, faying: " They were not come as Orators to entreat either for Varyavius, or for those F " that took his part; but for the people of the Fundans: who that they were innocent and not

"culpable for this war, Vitruvius himself hath plainly proved and declared, in that he chose Pri-" vernum to be his place of retreat and refuge, and not the City Fundi, the very place of his nativi-"ty. And therefore at Privernam the enemies of the people of Rome were to be fought for and "purfued, who unmindful of both their own countries, had revolted as well from the Fundans "as the Romans. As for the Citizens of Fundi, they were at peace with Rome, may, they were "Romans in heart, and carried thankful remembrance of a benefit received: they entreated there-"fore and befought the Conful to forbear hostility with a guiltless people : assuring him that their Lands, their City, their own Bodies, their Wives and Children were and should be at the devo-"tion of the people of Rome. The Conful after that he had commended the Fundams, and fent Gletters to Rome that they remained firm and fast in their allegiance, turned his way to Privernum.

But before he diflodged (as Claedius writeth) the Conful executed those that were the heads of the conspiracy, and three hundred and fifty of those rebellious conspirators were sent prisoners to Rome. But the Senat accepted it not, and were not content with that submission, as judging the Fundan people, defirous to be excused and discharged, with the punishment of the needy and bale fort of people. Now when as Privernum was belieged and invefted with two Confular Armies, the one of the Confuls was called home, to hold the Election of Magistrates. That year were erected in the great race called Circus, the Barriers from whence the horles and their charriots are.

let forth, when their prizes. But before they were well past the care of the Privernats war, there w arrived a terrible and fearful brute of the Gaulswar, which never was regarded fleightly of the Nobles of Rome. Incontinently therefore the new Confuls, L. Emplius Namerous, and Cn. Plantius, on that very day, namely, on the * Calends of Iuly, wherein they entred their offices, were * Pirft of July. commanded to determin and agree between themselves upon their Provinces: and Mamerous who had the charge of the Gauls war, levied and enrolled an army without allowing any immunity and exemption from warfare, Moreover and befides, even the poor handicrafts men and artisans, such as keep their shops, and live by sedentary occupations, a sort far unmeet for martial fervice, are faid to have been called forth, and prest to the wars: and a mighty army was affembled and met together at Veii, that from thence they might march to encounter the Gauls: For it I was thought good that they should now go farther forward, for fear lest the enemy taking another way, might deceive them and march directly to the City of Rome. But a few days after, when it was known for certain that all the trouble and fear for that time was overblown they diverted their forces from the Gauls, and bent all against Privernum. But the islue hereof is reported two manner of ways, fome write that the City was forced by assault, and that Virywiii came alive into their hands: others, that before the utmost extremity of assault was used, they of their own accords, carrying before them white wands in token of peace, yeelded themselves unto the Conful: and that Virravius by his own Country men was rendered and delivered unto him. The Senat being moved, and their opinion asked concerning Varuoius and the Privernats; fent for the Conful Plantius to triumph, after that he had dismantled the walls of Privernum, and K there placed a strong garrison: and they gave order in the mean time that Varuvius should be kept fast in prisonuntil the Consuls return, then to be whipped and put to death. They appointed also that his habitation in Palatinm should be pulled down, and his goods consecrated to their Idol Semon Sangus. And look what money [of brass] was raised thereof, it served to make brasen round Plates, which were offered and set up in the Chappel of Sangustowards the temple of Quirinus. Touching the Senat of the Privernats, thus it was decreed, that every one of the Senators calling, who remained at Privernum after their revolting from the Romans, should in the same condition and state as the Veliterns, beconfined beyond Typris, and there dwell. These Acts being thus fet down, there was no more talk of the Privernats until the triumph of Plantins. After the triumph, the Conful having executed Vitruvius and his complices, supposing now that hee L might fafely propound the cause of the Privernats, to the LL. of the Senat, whiles they were newly latisfied with the execution of the guilty offenders. "Since that (quoth he) my LL, of the "Senat, the principal authors of this revolt and rebellion, have both at the hands of the immor-"tal gods, and at yours, suffered now already condigne punishment; what is your surther plea-"fure, and what shall be done with the innocent and harmless multitude? For my part verily, "although I be rather to demand your opinions then deliver mine own: yet seeing the Priver-" nats neer neighbors unto the Samnits, with whom we now at this time entertain a most uncertain and slippery peace, I would have as little grudge and rancor leit as may be, between us and "them. As the question in it self was doubtful and ambiguous, whiles mengave advice some to proceed cruelly, others to deal gently, according to each man his nature and inclination: fo, there M was one of the Privernat Embassadors that made it more doubtful, and put all out of square; 2 man mindful of that state wherein he was born more than of his present need and extremity. Who being demanded of one (that had spoken to the point, and delivered some sharp censure and heavy sentence against them) What punsishment he judged the Privernats deserved ? Marry (quoth he) that which they deserve, who deem themselves worthy of liberty and freedom, At whole flour and arrogant answer, when the Consul saw those to be more eagerly and bitterly bent, who before impugned the cause of the Privernats: to the end that he himself by some mild and gentledemand might drawfrom the party more modest language: What (quoth he) if we should remit and pardon your punishment; what kind of peace might we hope to have at your hands? If (quoth he) ye offer us good peace, ye shall find it on our part loyal and perpetual; but N if ye tender hard conditions of peace, ye shall have it last but a small while. But then one gave out, that the Privernat began to threaten plainly: and faid moreover, that such speeches were enough to stir up any peaceable and quiet people to war, that never thought to have sought. But the better part of the Senat drew these his answers to a better sense, and said that it was the speech of a man, and of a man free born. For, was it credible (quoth they) that any state, nay, any particular person, would longer abide (than needs he must) that condition which he misliketh and goeth against his stomach? There only is peace sure and like to hold, where men are contented and willing to keep themselves in peace: and never let men look or hope to find faithful loyalty, where they will impose thraldom and servitude. And to this purpose the Consul himself especially moved and enclined their hearts, reiterating these words to the Senators that were first to give o their opinions, and that io loud, as he might of many more be over-heard, That they above allother, and none but they indeed were worthy to be made Roman Citizens, who minded and efleemed nothing in the world, but their freedom. Whereupon, both in the Senat they obtained their fuit: and also by the authority of the LL, a Bill was exhibited to the people, That the Privernats might be enfranchised Romans. The same year were three hundred sent as a Colony, to inhabit Anxwr: and had two Acres

A home affairs or forraign, in the time of P. Plantin Procular, and P. Cornelius Scapula Coff. Only this fell out that year, that in Fregella (which sometime was in the territory of the Sidicins, and after, of the Volkians) there was a Colony planted and unto the people there was given a dole, of distribution of raw field amongst them, by Makeis Plantins, at the summart of his mother. Some there were that thought, how didder a coloid of honoring his mother, he defrayed and paid unto the people a deserved hire we reward; in that which his was by the Ediles arrested & brought to his answer for adultery committed with Planting of Affaired Wife in the Give, the people had by their voices acquit him. This dole given for a savoil blanting that his trial, was the occasion also of a dignity following: for in the next Election, not with that they be were ablent, he was preferred to the Tri-B bunship of the Commons, even before those Commons, even before those Commons, Bipinitip of the Commons even before those Competitions that were present in place.

This City relying and trusting in their own powers as well as presenting upon the faithless and disloyal society of the Samnits with the Romans, or bearing themselves bold upon the rumor that ran of a petilience that raigned in in the City of Rome, wrought much mischief and hottlity against such Romans as inhabited the

C Campain and Falern Councies. Whereupon; when as (in the time of Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, and Quantus Bublus Philo Confuls, the fee and time) there were Facials fent to Palappili, force damand refluentin again, and a proud answer returned back from the Greeks, a Nation mone flout and valiant in congue then in deed and execution; by the authority of the Senat, the people decreed, that there should be war made upon the Palapplitans. And when as the Confuls had divided their provinces between themselves; it fell to Publius his turn to war upon those Greeks, Cornelius with another atmy was opposed against the Samnits, if they should hap to stir any way. For the report went, that they looking and expecting affuredly the revolt of the Campains, would encamp neerer and join with them. There, Cornelius the thought it best to keep a standing camp, The Senat was certified from both Confuls, That they had small hope of peace with the Samp nits. Publius gave intelligence, that two thought of the Nolans, than with the good will of the Greeks, received at Patapolis. At Rome it was for certain known, that it Samoinne there

Yet for all this, was no affembly for the faid election, holden by the Dictator, Forit came in question, Whether he were rightly created or no. In that year it was recorded, that the City Alexandria in Egypt was founded: and that Alexander the King of Epicurus was murdered by a certain Lucan, a banished person, to verifie the O-K racle of Jupiter Dodoneus, which had foretold his death. For when he was fent for into Italy by the Tarentins, he had warning given him, [To take beed of the Acherufian Water, and the City Pandofia, for there it was his destiny to end his days:] and therefore, with more speed he passed over into staly, to be as far off as might be, from the City, Pandosia in Epirus, and the river Acheron; which issuing out of Moloffis into the lower Meets and Lakes, dischargeth it self, and falleth into the Thesprotian Gulf. Howbeit (as commonly it is seen when men seek most to flie and avoid their fatal death, they run headlong and plunge themselves into it) he, having oftentimes vanquished and overthrown the legions of the Brutians and Lucans; won by force Heracleaa Colomy of the Tarentines, and Confentia in Lucania, and Sipontum, and also Acerina a Colony of the Brutians, and other Cities afterwards of the Messapians and Lucans: fent into Epirusthree hun-L dred Noble houses and families, whom he meant to keep as hostages,: he encamped not far from Pandofia, a City fituate neer to the Confines of the Lucans and Brutians, And there he held three hils fomewhat diffant a funder, from whence he might make excursions and rodes into every part of his enemies country: and he had in ordinary about him almost 200, banished men of the Lu-erns, for his fure trusty guard: who not with standing (as she natures are of such for the most part) thanged with every wind, and carried mutable minds according to the variety of fortune. Now fifellout for that the continual rains which overflowed all the fields, had foreclosed and flopped the passages three ways between his armies to as they could not help one another whereby those two girifions where the King was not in perion, were unpurzed by the unexpected coming of the entimies: who having put them all to the fword, turned their who legiores to before the King, N From whence, there were by the Lucan exiles, medlengers sent to their own countrimen: who in the name of the reft capitulated, that if they might be reftored again, they would deliver the King either dead or alive into their hands. However, he bunded with passes would deliver the King either dead or alive into their hands. However, he bunded with passes and encountring the noble and hardy adjecture, and brake through the middle of the remeits and encountring the chief Commander of the Lucans hand to hand, talled him outright, and having ralled his men near rogerhet, who were fartered alunder in fight, he came a legath to a river, which by the fresh ruins of a broken bridge. That the violence of that water, had honed own, shewed passes. Which as the army passed over at an unknown and blind sports, one, sousting mearied with fear and travel, curfing and deretsing the wholeky and aluginable name of the River, fortuned to say. Thou hast nor thy name "Achers so I naught, which word when it same once to the King his ear, he presently began to think and mule of his final end; and them staged full impasses so the heart of the King his weet, he presently began to think and mule of his final end; and them staged full impasses so the second him with he lingered and made delay, being in to great a peril and jeopasty as he was hand shews ed him withal, how the Lucans intended to play sale, with him and sought opportunity to some From whence, there were by the Lucan exiles, meffengers fent to their own countrimen : who in ed him withal, how the Lucans intended to play falle with him, and longhapportunity to force lay and do him a mitchief. With that the King looked behind him, and edited them aim off indtroop coming against him: Whereupon he drew his tword, put his horiestories anok the Rivery and rode through the midft thereof, and when he was now to far passed that he was ready to take the land, one of those banishit Lucans lanced a dart algos, at him, and firuck him quite through. who presented himself unto Philo, and said unto him, "To the good and happy fortune be it " "faid and done of the Palapolitans and the people of Rome, I am determined to deliver and fur-"render the City into your hands: in which Action, whether I may be thought to have be-E"trayed or faved my country, it refleth only inthetrust and fidelity of the Romans. As for my " felfe privatly. I am come neither to indent, nor yet to crave ought at all: but publickly in the "behalf of the City. I would rather by way of petition requelt, than article and capitulate, thus "much, That if this enterprise intended, speed well and take effect, the people of Rome would "think and confider, in what affection, endevour and jeopardy, our City returneth again into "their amity, rather than upon what folly and rashness, it brake their allegiance and revolted. Then, after he had been bidden welcom by the General, entertained with good and gracious words, and highly commended, he received 3000 fouldiers, to keep, surprize, and to seize that quarter of the City, where the Samnits were lodged, and which they held: of this regiment and garrison, L. Quintius a Colonel had the conduct. During this time, Nymphius also did his part, F and dealt fo craftily under hand with the Pretor of the Samnits, that he induced and wrought him to this point, That for as much as all forces, were either about Palapolis or in Samnium, he would permit him with the fleet to cast about to the Roman coasts, for that he intended to forrage and waste, not only the maritine parts, but the territories also adjoyning to the City: and the better to deceive the enemy (quoth he)/I had need to go by night, and therefore the Ships presently must lanch forth, and be let afloat And to effect this more speedily, all the youth of the Samnits besides the necessary garrison of the City, was sent to the shoar. Where whiles Nymphiwin the dark, and among the multitude that thindred one another purposely, spent time in setting confusedly, some to this and others to that, Charilans, according to the complot set before, was by his affociats received into the City and having filled the highest places of the town G with Roman fooldiers, confinanded to let in a short, whereat the Greeks upon a secret tokengiven them by their Captains, kept themselves ftill and quier. The Nolans then, at the backfide of the town, escaped and fled by the high way, that leadeth to Nota. And the Samnits being excluded our of the town, as they had a more readier mean to flie for the present, so they found it, after they were pust danger, a more shameful dilgrace. For, they were disarmed and naked men, they had left all the good they had amongst the enemies, and returned home spoiled, poor and needy, and served for a laughing stock and derision, not only to other nations, but also to their own neighbors and countrimen. Albeit I am not ignorant that there is another

A flayed them from farther mangling thereof: Thus all that was left of the Kings body, by the means of one only woman, was burnt at Confentia: and his bones ient back afterwards to the enemies unto * Metapontum, and from theme conveighed to Epirus, unto Cleopaira his wife and * Torride Mar. his fifter Olympias, whereof the one was fifter, the other Mother to Alexander the Great. Thus much concerning the woful and unhappy end of Alexander the King of * Epirus, Whose * Albanias fortune albeit was such, that he came short, and was cut off before he intermedied in the Roman war, yet because he warred in Italy, let it suffice that briefly by the way I have touched his

The fame year was there a Lectiflern at Rome, (which was the fift after the foundation and Bbuilding of that City) for the pacifying of the same gods as heretofore, Afterwards the new Confuls by the ordinance and direction of the people, tent defiance and proclamed war against the Samples. And as they themselves made greater preparation every way than against the Greeks so they had besides new aids, whereof (as then) they least thought of; The Lucans and the Applians (nations which to that day had no dealing nor commerce at all with the Romans) became their liege and loyal Allies, offering men and munition toward that war. Whereupon they were by form of Covenant and league entertained and received into their amity. At the same time also the Romans had good fucces in the Samnits quarters : for three towns there yielded unto them. and they became Matters thereof, to wit, Allife, Callife, Ruffirm: all the territory befides at the first coming of the Consul, was pilled and spoiled far and near. These exploits thus prosperously C atchieved, the other enterprize also of besieging the Greeks, was well followed and at the point of an end. For over and besides, that by certain sconces and bloccuzes between the enemies forts and forces, one part was cut from the other; they endured also within their own walls, much more mifery and calamity, than the enemy menaced and threatned without and as if they had been Captives to their own garrifon fouldiers, whom they had called to them for their defence, they fuffered infinite villanies, and indignities, in the persons as well of their wives as of their children, and even the hardest extremities, that follow upon Cities forced by the enemy. And therefore when it was noted abroad, that there were new fuccours coming from Tarentum and the Samnits: they supposed that for Samnits, there were already within their walls more of them than they would marry, as for Tarentins they looked willingly for their help, as Greeks both the one & O the other, hoping by their means that they might as well withfland the outrages of the Samnits and Nolans, as the Romans their open and professed enemies. Last of all, of many inconveniencies that they were driven unto, the least and easiest was thought, to yeeld imply unto the Romans. Charilans and Nymphius two great men and the chiefe personages of the City, having laid their heads and plotted one with the other, fo parted the matter between themselves, that the one should flie unto the Roman General, and the other stay behind, to find some opportunity, and

opinion, whereby it is given out that Palapolis was by the Sammits betrayed: yet as I have cre-fit dited and followed herein tuch authors, as methicks it were hard if they should not deliver a truth; for so I am induced the rather to beleeve that the Neapolitans returned into amity with the Romans, because of the league extant in their name (for unto them afterwards the State and chief sear of the Greeks was translated.) Unto Publius was decreed a trumph, for that it appeared clearly and was believed constantly, that by his siege the ememies were tamed, and to constrained to come to a composition and surrender. Two special favours hapned to this man above all others before him, namely, the proregation of his government, not granted to any man aforetimes and triumph after his Magistracy was expired.

Upon the tail of this war, arole another with the Greeks of the other tract or coast. For the Ta- I rentins having born the Palapolitans in hand a good while, and fed them with a vain hope of help, when they heard once that the Romans were possessed of their City, complained themselvs like menforfaken, and not as those who had forfaken others, much blaming the Palæpolitans, and with anger and envy raging against the Romans. Disquieted also they were, for that news came that the Lucans and Apulians (for both these nations that year began to contract alliances) were under the protection of the Romans, For now (fay they) they are well near come unto us, and shortly we shall grow to this pais that we must acknowledge the Romans for our Lords, or have them our heavy friends. And verily the trial and hazzard of our estate, dependeth only upon the Samnits war, and the event thereof, which nation alone, and the same nothing mighty, remaineth now; fince that the Lucans are gone and revoked to the Romans: who yet might be reclai- K med and moved to shake off the lociety with the Romans, if any feat were wrought and practifed to fow fome discord and diffention between them. These devices and overtures rook place and prevailed with fuch, as were defirous of change and novelty: in fo much as certain of the Lucan youth (better known, than trufted and reputed honeft, amongst their countrimen and fellow Citizens, hired also for a sum of money) whipped one another with rods, came naked into the affembly of the Citizens, and with open mouth cried out afoud and faid, that for preinming only to come into the Roman camp, they were by the Coss. thus scourged, & escaped narrowly the lofing of their heads. The thing it fell piteous and unicemly to behold, as bearing a flew rather of wrong done unto them, than of any malicious & fubtil practice by them intended thirred the people up, to force their Magistrates with their uncessant outcries to assemble a Councel, Some stan-L ding round about the Senat in councel, call hard for war against the Romans: others run up and down to raise the multitude of Peazants to take arms and in this stir and uproar, which was able to disquiet and amaze even those that were well minded, a decree passed; that the league with Samnits should be renued and Embassadors dispatched forthwith, to the same purpose. This was a fudden change: and as it had no colour of cause, so it carried smal credit with it amongst the Samnits, who forced the Lucanians to give hoftages, and to take garrifons into their fortreffes : and they, blinded with anger, and invegled with flattery, refused nothing. But shortly after beganthe fraud to appear and thew it felt namely, after that the authors and devilers of thele falle furmiles and flanders, were retired to Tarentum: but having put themselvs out of all, and being not at liberty to dispose of their own affairs ehey had nothing else left them, but like fools to repent in vain. M

That year hapned to the Commons of Rome another beginning of their liberty in that they were no more either bound in chains, or held in thraldom by their creditors. Which priviledg against poor debtors, was altered, by occasion of the filthy lust and notorious cruelty of one Usurer, And L. Papirius was the man unto whom C. Publica for his fathers debt, became bound, and configned himlelfhis prisoner; whose tender age and lovely favor which might and should have moved pity, inflamed the mind of this Ufurer to unkind luft and shameful contumely: for making ful account, that the prime and flower of his youth should satisfie and pay for the interest of the debt, he first began to allure and entice unto him the youth with wanton & unchast speeches: afterwards seeing that his ears abhorred to hear such filthines, he fel to minatory words, & ever and anon put him in mind of his present condition wherin he stood but last of all perceiving by him, that he stood more N upon his honor and freedom by birth then respected his hard estate by fortune, he caused him to be stripped naked and whipping chear to be presented unto him. The poor stripling thus piteously rent and torn, ran forth into the open freet, complained of the filthy luft & cruelty of his creditor. Whereupon, a number of people, enkindled as well with pity and commiteration of the ftripling, and indignity of the injury, as also in regard of their own case, and of their children came running into the Forum or common place and so from thence in a long train to the court of the Councel. The Confuls upon this fudden uproar were forced to call a Senat, and as the Senators entred into the Councel chamber, they lay all proftrat at their feet, as they paffed by, one after another, & shewed unto them the young mans back and fides in what taking they were. And that one day by occation of the outragious enormity of one person, brake the neck of that mighty bond, whereby, to O that day, the creditors had their debtors, in danger unto them. For the Confl, had in charge, to propose unto the people, that from thence forward, no person what soever, unless he had committed some heinous fact, and until he wereto suffer therefore, should be either kept in setters and gives, or firetched upon the rack. Item. that for lent money, the goods of the debtor and not the body should be obliged. So they that were in bondage, became released and enlarged: and order was taken for the time to come, that none should be imprisoned by their creditors again.

The same year, whiles the Samnits war of it self alone, besides the sudden revolt of the Lucans, together

A together with the Tarentins the hatchers thereof, held the Senators of Rome in care and perplexity enough: behold over and above all thefe, the Veftin people, as a furcreafe to their troubles, joined and banded with the Samnits. Which new occurrent, as, for that year it rather maintained this discourse amongst men in their ordinary talk every where, than ministred cause of serious debating in publick Councel: so the Consuls of the year following, L. Furius Camillus the second time, and Jun. Brutus Scevy., thought no one thing more important than it, and needful to be treated of in the Senat, with the first. And about the thing were but new, and a breeding, yet so greatly were the LL, hereabout troubled, that they seared no less to begin to take in hand, then to neglect it altogether, and not to see it: doubting, lest if they were let go unpunsshed, the B neighbor nations would grow too lusty and proud: and again, if they seemed to challife them by

B neighbor nations would grow too lufty and proud: and again, if they feemed to chafflife them by war, the reit for fear of the like measure, might be provoked to anger, take arms, and enter into a general rebellion. And all, and every one of them, namely, the Marsians, the Pelignians and Marticins; were in leasts of arms: comparable and equal to the Samnits every way: which nations they might be inter to have their enemies, if they medled with the Vessins, and touched them once never to little, Howbeit, that part prevailed and took place, which for the present feemed to carry more courage and valor, then sage advice and wisdom: but the silien and event shewed, that, Fortune favoured Fortitude. So the people by authority and direction of the Nobles decreed war against the Vessins: the charge whereof sight by lot upon Brutus, and Samnium sell to Camillus.

against the Vestins: the charge whereof light by lot upon Brutus, and Samnium tell to Camillus. To both places were the armies conducted and by the care and industry employed in the desence of fithe marches and frontiers the enemies were impeached for joining their forces together. However, the constitution of the constituti fhed of his own men) that his enemies not only fled into their camp; but also as not trutting now to their tramparts and trenches, they were conftrained to fleal away into their towns, minding for to fave themselves, as well by the natural scituation of the places, as the strength of their good walls. In the end, hemade assault upon those walled Cities, purposing by force to win them. And first he gained Cutina by scaling, either through the exceeding courage of his fouldiers, or their anger, being so chased as they were at their hurts received: for that fearcedy one caped out of the throng and skirmish, cleat & not wounded. Then he likewise took Cingilia: and gave the pillage of both Cities to his souldiers, Neither gates nor walls could frand in their way and keep E them out. But into Sammism the journey was undertaken by the Dictator with doubtful Anspices and uncertain knowledge of the will of the gods. The default and terror whereof took not effect in the main event and time of the way. (for it was proper yous and for through.) by were to the

in the main event and issue of the war, (for it was prosperous and fortunate) but turned to the rage and anger of the chief leaders, who fell out deadly one with another, For Papirus the Dickator, advised by the Pullarius [that had the custody and charge of the sacred Pullets] went back to Rome to take the Auspiciums or the presage by the bird-slight] again: and straightly charged his General of horse to keep himself close within his hold, and in no wise to give the enemies battel during his absence. But Pains after the Dickators departure, advertised by the spilas, that theenemies were even as careless, as loose and disordered, as if there had been no Roman in Samnium? whether it were, that being a shout and susty young Gentleman, he rook soul scorn and thought it F an indignity, that all should seem to rest in the Dickator only: of that he was induced with the good opportunity of doing some brave exploit (I wor not:) but he went forth with an army in good opportunity of doing lone trave exploit [A word not?] but newent form with an army in order of battel, to Imbinium, (that was the places name) & there fought a field with the Sampits. But such was the happy issue of this battel, that if the Dictator himself had been there in perion, it could not have been better managed. For, neither Captain failed his souldiers, nor fouldiers their Captain. The horsemen also under the leading of L. Cominius a Colonel by his place, (who sundry times charged and recharged again, and could not with force break the enemies arrays) unbridled their hories, and so ran them all on the sput; that no strength was able to abide them: such an havock, such a lane made they allabout over armour and men. The footmen seconding this hot charge of the horse, advanced the ensigns against the enemies thus put in diarray; and G twenty thousand men (by report) were that day sain. In some authors I find that twice in the Dictators absence he fought, and twice had the upper hand. But in the most ancient writers I read but of one battel. In some Chronicles the whole matter is passed over and less out clean, The General of the horie, having gained a mighty mass of spoil, as otherwise he could not chuse, upon so great a staughter & massacregathered together into one heap all the enemies armor made a fire under, & burned them: were it that he had made some such you to one of the gods: or (as I list rather to believe, it was a motive of Fabius himself, that the Dich. should not reap the fruit of his glory, and entitle his name theretoior in pomp carry those spoils before him at his triumps.

out and often iterating these words. Then hath the master of horsemen in deed as well everted and overthrown, both Dictators Majesty and military discipline, as defeated the Samnits legions, if he can to go clear away and escape unpunished, with so manifest contempt of my express commandment. Whereupon, full of threats and indignation, he halfned to the camp, and took long journeys: yet could be not prevent the bruit of his coming. For, there were Vantenriers that I posted from the City before, to bring word that the Dictator was coming, full of revenge, and fet upon punishment, and at every second word almost, commending the late exemplary justice of T. Marlius. Then Fabius immediatly calling an audience, belought the fouldiers, that with what valour and vertue they had defended the Common-wealth from most deadly and mortal enemies, with the same they would protect him from the outragious cruelty of the Dictatour. himselfe (I say) by whose conduct and fortune they had gotten so glorious a victory. Fabius* forgat not his place, but bare himself as General of the "Cavalry, and not as a Servant and follower of the Dictator, standing at receit, and waiting "at an inch when some under Captainship would fall, that he might step into the place. What "would this man (think ye) have done, how would he have fretted, if (asthefortune and L "doubtful chance of war oftentimes goeth) we had been put to the worfeand loft the day; who "now that the enemies be vanquished, the field so well fought, the State so well served, as by "the most singular Captain in the world, better it might not be, thus menaceth execution to me "the General of the horse, even in the honour of my conquest? To conclude, I recommend my life, and wholeestate to your vertue and faithful protection. Then from all parts of the audience they cried unto him aloud & bade him take a good heart: for fo long as the Legions of the Romans were fafe, there should no person do him harm or injury. Soon after came the Dictator, and presently N by found of trumpet fummoned a general affembly. And the publick Crier after an Oiez made, called by name for Q Fabius General of the horse. Moreover, the letters of this victory by him fent to the Senat, and not a word thereof to the tr

Dictator, were some proof, that he was not willing to impart and communicate his praises with him. But certainly, the Dictator took the matter in so ill part, that when every man else was joyful for this noble victory atchieved, he only shewed anger and sadness in his very countenance.

Whereupon suddenly he dissolved the Senat, and departed in great hast out of the court, giving

Now come Serjeans and do thine office the while. To which leveral Articles, when Fabius could not readily answer point by point, one while complaining that he had him for his accuser, who was the judge of his life and death: otherwhiles crying out aloud, that sooner might his life be taken from him, than the glory and honor of his Bacts: and as he justified and excused his own felf, so he began again to challenge and accuse [the Dictator.] Then Papirius being in more heat of choler than before, commanded the General of the horiemen to be stripped out of his cloaths and uncased, and the rods and axes to be brought forth ready. With that, Fabius calling earnestly for the help of the fouldiers, whiles the officers were a tearing and renting his cloaths from his back, made means to retire himself into the ranks of the Triarii, who began already to make a mutiny and uproar in the affembly. From when e there arose an outery over all the audience. Some were heard to intreat, others to threat, They who fortuned to stand next to the Tribunal, because that being within the view and eye of the Dictator, they might be known and noted, befought his Majetty to spare and pardon the General of the horie, and not with him to condemn the whole army. They that were farthest off C in the skirt of the assembly, and especially that troop and company about Fabius, rated and cried out upon such a rigorous and merciless Dictator. And a little thing more would have made them mutiny: nay, within the very compaals of the Tribunal all was not clear and quiet. The Lieutenants or Colonels of whole legions, standing about his feat or chair of state intreared him to put. off thematter until the morrow : to give his choler some time to cool, and allow space and refpit to confider of it with advice and counfel : faying, "That if Fabius had plaid a youthful part, he had paid sufficiently for it already, and his victory had received disgrace and dishonour e-"nough. The General of the horse was commanded to appear on the morrow Now when a every man gave it out and avonchied unto him that Papirini would proceed more vehemently, for that contelling of the Lieuteplanes, and that the more he was dealt withat the worle he was. But the general content of the people of Rome, turning to prayer and intreaty, eafed them of this heavy load and burden: and with one voice humbly belought the Dictator, to remit the punishment of the General of horses for their take. The Tribuns also, seeing that was the way, and all enclining and growing to Petition, followed after and did the like; earnestly beleeching the Dictator to forgive this human fraguity, and youthful tolly of Q. Fabius, faying, That he had fuffered chaffilement enough. Then the young man himself, then his father M. Fabius, forgetting allfrife, and laying afide debate, fell down at the Dictator his feet, and befought him to appeale his wrathful displeasure. Hereupon the Dictator after filence made, "Yea marry (quoth he) O Quirites, this Llike well, and thus it should be; now hath military discipline got the victory, now hath the majesty of your Em-C " pire prevailed indeed, which lay both a bleed ng, and were in hazzard to have been abolished "and overthrown for ever, after this day. Live (Isay) thou that hast been so bold to commit that sact, which "thine own father here, if he had been in L. P. pirius his place, would never have pardoned. And " as for me, into my grace and favour thou mayit come again, at thine own will and pleasure: But to the people of Rome, to whom thou art beholden and obliged for thy life, thou shalt perform D "no greater duty and service than that the example of this days work may be a teaching and war-"ning to thee for ever, to obey, as well in war as in peace, all lawful commands of superiour Ma-"gistrates. After that he had pronounced the pardon of the General of horse and discharged him of the Court, and was departed himself out of the common place of audience, the Senat joyful and highly contented, and the people much more, came all about them, and on the one fide bidding jov to the General of the horse aforesaid, and on the other side giving thanks to the Distator, followed after, and accompanied them both: and it was generally thought, that military government was no less confirmed and established by this peril and danger only of young Q Fabins, then by the late pireous execution of young Manlius. By chance that year so fell out, that as often as the Distator absented himself from the Army, E so often the enemies rose and raised troubles in Samnium. Howbeit, the fresh example of Q. Fabius was ever in the eye of M. Valerius, Lieutenant General and Governor of the camp, who feared as well the dread wrath of the Dictator, as any violent attempts of his enemies what soever. Insomuch, as when purveiours for corn being entrapped by an ambush were slain, in a place of difadvantage; commonly it was thought and beleeved that they might have been by the Lieutenant tescued and saved, but for sear of these rigorous and terrible edicts. For anger hereof, the Dictator loft the hearts of the fouldiers, who were already malecontent, for that he was fo inexorable in the cause of Q. Fabius, and had denied them that, at their instant intreaty, which afterwards he yeelded unto and pardoned, at the fuit and request of the people of Rome. The Dictator, after that he had left for the government of the City L. Papirsus Craffus the General of horse, discharged F Q Fabrus, and forbidden him to administer any thing by vertue of that office, returned into the camp. Whose coming was neither very welcome and joyful to his own countrimen the souldiers, nor yet firuck any terror in his enemies the Samnits. For, the next morrow, were it, that they knew not that the Dictator was come, or little cared and weighed whether he were prefent or absent, they approached the camp in order of battel. Howbeit, that one man, L. Papivius the Dictator, was of such valor and importance, that if the love of the fouldiers had seconded the policy and fage conduct of their Commander, the war with Samnits had that day been quite dispatched and ended, past all peradventure, so skilfully set he the battel in array, so warily chose he his ground of advantage, fo strengthned he the same with supplies out of the reregard, in all warlike skil and fingular policy. But the fouldiers failed for their parts, and went coldly to & their business, even of purpose, that the valiant and commendable parts of the Captain might be differedited and deprived; and so the victory was much hindred and impeached. Howbeit, many of the Samnits were flain; and in exchange as many of the Romans hurt. But he like a wife and expert Captain, foon perceived, what was the cause that stayed the victory. He saw well enough, that he was to temper his own nature and to allay that feverity of his, within mildness and courtesie. And therefore taking with him the Lieutenants himself in person went about to visit the wounded foldiers, putting his head into their tents & cabbins asking each one how they did; harged the Lieutenants, Colonels, Provost-Marshals, and other officers of the camp, to tend and look unto the fick fouldiers, recommending their care unto them particularly by name. This being a p thing in it felf popular, he handled and ordered with such dexterity; that by curing their bodies their minds also and hearts were much sooner gained and reconciled to their General. And nothing made more for the speedy recovery of their health, than their thankful acceptation of that care and diligence of his. When he had thus refreshed and repaired his army, he encountred once again the enemy with affured hope of himself and his souldiers, to obtain a final victory; and so discomfited and put them to flight, that the Samnits after that day, durst never fight again with the Dictator. Then the victorious army marched, as any hope of booty and pillage guided and directed them : and as they overran their enemies country, they found no force nor relitance. either in open shew, or covert ambush. This also encouraged them the more, and cheered their I hearts, for that the Dictator had by proclamation given away the whole spoil among the souldiers: so that their privat gain whet them on against their enemie, no less then the common anger and publick quarrel. The Samnits tamed and subdued by these losses and overthrows, sued to the Dictator for peace: with whom they capitulated, and made offer to allow unto every fouldier one livery, and the full wages of one year. But being commanded to go to the Senat, they made answer, That they would accompany the Dictator, recommending and putting their cause and whole estate to his faithful protection, to his vertue and goodness only. Thus the Army was withdrawn from the Samnits, the Dictator with triumph entred the City: and when he would have refigned up the Dictatorship, the Senat ordained, That before hegave over, he should create Consuls. So, C. Sulpitus Longus the second time, and Q. Emylius Caretanus were K

The Samnits not having concluded peace, (for that they varied about the conditions, and were to treat farther thereupon) yet brought with them from the City of Rome, truce for a year. Which they observed not faithfully : so soon were their stomacks up again to make war after they had intelligence, that Papirius was out of government. Whiles C. Sulpitius, and Q. Æmylius (or Aulius as some Chronicles have) were Consuls, besides the revolting of the Samnits, there arose a new war also from the Apulians. Both ways was therea power sent. Sulpitius his lot was to go against the Sampits, and Emplius against the Apulians. Some write, that upon the Apulians themselves no war was made, but contrariwife, that the confederate States of that Nation were defended from the violence and wrongs of the Samnits. Howbeit, the low effate of the Samnits, at that time, L hardly able to maintain and defend themselves, maketh it more likely and credible, that the Apulians, were not warred upon by them, but that the Romans made war with both Nations at once. But no memorable act or exploit was there performed only the Apulian countrey, and Samnium was wasted: and the enemies no where at all to be found, but at Rome there hapned a scare by night, which raised every man so suddenly out of their first sleep, and so affrighted the City, that presently at one instant the Capitol and the Castle, the Walls and Gates were full of armed men. And when as from all places there was running, and crying alarm, the morrow morning at the break of day, there appeared neither author, nor cause of this sear.

The fame year the Tufculans were judicially convented before the people of Rome by process, and that, by a law that Flavius preferred. This M. Flavius, Tribun of the Commons, exhibited M a bill of Endictment to the people that some punishment might be inflicted upon the Tusculans; For that through their affiftance and Counfel, the Velicerns and Privernats had taken arms against the people of Rome. The Tufculans with their wives and children reforted to Rome. Which multitude having changed their apparrel, and clad in poor array and habit, as prisoners at the bar, went about from Tribe to Tribe, falling down upon their knees to every man. Whereupon, pity prevailed more to obtain pardon of punishment, then the goodness of their cause to the purging of their guilt. So all the Tribes except Pollia, disanulled and made void the Endistment aforefaid. But the fentence of the Tribe Pollia was, That as many as were of age and undergrown, to wit, fourteen year old and upward, should be scourged and put to death, Irem, that their wives and children, by martial law, should be fold in open port-sale. And for certain it is reported that N the Tusculans took to deep an anger against the authors of so hard a censure and cruel doom, that they have carried it in mind even to our fathers days. For in despite thereof no Candidate, or Competitor for an office of the Tribe Pollia, was ever wont to get the voices of the Tribe Papyria. The year following, whiles Q. Fabius and L. Fulvius were Confuls, A. Cornelius Arvis na Dictator, and M. Fabius Ambustus General of horse, having taken a straighter levy of souldiers then ordinary, for fear of a greater war in Samnium (for it was reported that the whole manhood and flower of the youth were taken up and waged out of the countries adjoining) lead forth a goodly and puissant army against the Samnits. But they pitched their camp so carelesly in the enemies ground, as if the enemy had been far off: and the Samnit legions came on a sudden so proudly, that they set forward the trench and rampart, and encamped close to the Corp Q. de gard of the Romans. Howbeit the night approached so fast, that they were hindered for affayling the Camp: but they gave it out plainly, they would do it the morrow after by day light. The Dictator seeing that he must fight neerer than he expected or hoped; for fear lest the straightness and disadvantage of the ground, might prejudice and hinder the valour of his souldiers, leaving fires thick burning in the camp, for to disappoint the fight of the enemies, in the fill night with filence leadeth for h his legions: but yet could be not for the neerness of their camp elcape, but be espied of them. The horsemen forthwith followed upon them in the tail,

A and pressed hard upon the army in their march, yet insuch fort, that before it was day, they would not fight, nay, the very footmen were not all iffeed out of the camp before day light. At length when it was broad day, the Horsemen adventured to charge upon the Romans, and partly by playing upon the tail of the hindmost, and partly by skirmishing in places that were hard to be passed over, they hindred their march and kept them behind. In the mean while their Infantery also overtook the Cavalry, so as now the Samnits with all their forces came upon them. The Dictatorseeing he could not go farther without his great losse and disadvantage, commanded his men to fortify even in that very place where he flood : but, for almuch as the light Hotsemen of his enemies were overfored all about, they could not possibly go to provide stakes to make a parapet or rampier, nor begin to cast a trench. When he perceived therefore that he neither could go

B forward, nor stay and fortifie, he removed all his baggage out of the ranges ; and set his men in battel array. The enemies do the like, and were not behind either in courage or in forces. But this most of all heartned and encouraged them, for that they being ignorant that the occasion of the enemies retreat was the disadvantage and straightness of the place, presumed that they did it upon fear; and therefore they in terrible manner followed after them, as if the Romans had fled and been affrighted. And even that for a good while held the fight in doubtful ballance, albeit the Samnits now a long time had not been used to abide somuch as the first shout of the Roman army when they give the charge. But verily that day, from the third hour unto the eight, it is faid that the battail flood to equal and indifferent, that neither the fliour and cry was redoubled, rrom nine of the clock in nor heard the second time, after it was once set up at the first buckling: nor the ensigns were set the morning, C forward, or withdrawn backward, but remained where they first were : nor yet of any pare were until two after they seen to retire or go back, but every man in his degree and place, bending forward and pressing noon. with his shield. without breathing or looking back, still fought a-front; the same noise, one refolintion to die or fight it out, and not to give over before utter wearines or dark night. Now began the frength of men to fail, now the spear point and edge of the sword, began to turn and loie their force, and now the Captains themselves were to leek for countel and what to do a By what time all at once the Samnits Horsemen, hearing that the cariages of the Romans with one only Corner were gone a good way off from the armed fouldiers, without any other guard and fortification; for greedinels of spoil set upon them. Which when a messenger in great halt and fear reported to the Dictator; Let them alone (quoth he) let them ercumber themselves with

D the spoil, and spare not. Then came others one after another, windless with running, crying out and faying, that all was gone: and that every where the fouldiers goods were rifled, ranfacked and carried clean away. Whereupon he fent for the Generahof Horsemen, See ye not (quoth he) O M. Fabius, the battel abandoned of our enemies Cavalry? They fland fill and are encumbred and peffred with our cariages. Now therefore charge upon them, disbanded as they are, (which usually hapneth to any multitude, busy in pillage) find them you shall (no doubt) sew on Horseback, and as few with weapon in hand: and whiles they are loding their Horses with spoil, kill them unarmed, and make it a bloody booty to them, and let them buy it full dearly: as for me, let me alone with the charge of the legions and footmen; have you the honour of the Horsemens service. Then the Cavalry ranged into a Squadron, as exquistly and skillfully as possibly E might be , ran forcibly upon the enemies difarrated and clogged with carrage , beating them down, and making a miterable massacre of them in every place. For being (as they were) among packs and fardels which they cast from them suddenly, and now lay against their feet to stumble on as they fled, and in the Horses way, that were amazed and affraid, they were not able well. either to flie or to fight, and so were slain. When as the enemies Cavalry were thus defeated and welneer all come to naught, then M. Fabias wheeling about his wings of Horsemen, for to fetch a compass, set upon the Infantry at their backs: Whereupon arose a new fearful cry, which caused the hearts of the Samnits to tremble and quake. The Dictator withal, seeing the formost of the enemies fighting in the front, looking back ever and anon, their enfigns out of order, and all their battailons waving and floting to and fro; called hard upon his fouldiers, and exhorted F them to fight luftily: cried unto the Colonels, the Sergeants of Bands and Corporals severally by name, to re-encharge and renew the battel again with him. Thus with a fresh and new shout, they advance the Standards, and fet forward the enfigns : and the farther they march on, the more perceived they the enemies to be troubled, and in dilaray. And now by this time, the Horsemen also were within the fight of the formost in the vanguard: and Cornelius looking back to the bands and companies of his footmen, making fign with hand and with voyce as well as he could, shewed and made demonstration unto them, that they saw the colours and targets of their own fellow Horsemen. Which when they once heard, and saw withal; presently as if they had forgot the battel which they endured almoibanthole day, and felt no mart of their wounds, they befirred themselves against the enemy as lushily, as if they had newly come out of their tents, fresh

6 and in heart, and seen but now the figual, and heard the sound of trumpet, to a battel. Now were the Simples no longer able to sustain the terror of the Horsemen behind, and the violence of the footmen before: but were either flain in the mids between, or scattered abroad in flight. Such as stayed and were environed about, the sootmenslew: those who sled, were trodden under the Horse seet and killed: among whom, the General himself left his body on the earth. This battel above all other, so quelled and daunted the hearts of the Samnirs and crushed their forces, that in all their Diets and Councels they mutterered and gave out, That it was no marvel that they feed so ill, in all their affairs of arms, the quarrel was so bad and ungodly, and the war be-tigun focontrary to a covenant of truce, and having the very Gods, and that juftly, more against them and greater enemies than men: and that such a war must needs cost some great overthrow, and might not be expiat without some notable satisfaction. Here only was the difficulty and difference, whether vengeance and punishment should be taken of the guilty bloud of some few, or the guiltless bloud of all. And even then, some there were, that durit nominate the very authors of this war. And one specially, to wit, Brutulus Papins, whose name was by the common voyce and consent heard above all the rest. A noble and mighty man he was, and without question, the principal breaker of this last truce. The Pretors being enforced therefore, to determine as touching him what was to be done; at length decreed, That Brutulus Papius should be delivered to the I Romans, and that together with him, all the Roman pillage and their priloners should be sent to Rome: and that of all the goods, unto which according to the covenant and composition, the Fecials laid claim, there should, according to right and equity, restitution be made. Then were the Heralds, by vertue of the decree, fent to Rome, together with the deads corps of Bratulus: for he to avoid shame and punishment, wilfully killed himself. It was thought good, that with his body all his goods also, should be delivered. Howbeir none of all these things but only the captives, and whatfoever could justly be owned out of the booty, was received: all the reft were offered, but in vain, for nothing was accepted. The Dictator by vertue of an act of the Senat, triumphed. Some write that this war was fought by the Confuls, and that they triumphed over the Samnits: and that Fabius also went forward into Apulia, and from thence brought away K great and rich prizes. But without all controversie A. Cornel, was Dictator that year: this only was the doubt, whether he were created for the conduct of this war, or at the Roman games [Circenfes,] (because L. Cantins hapned to be grievously sick) to give the signal when the chariots and steeds should be let out of the Barriers to run the race for their prize: and that having done that function of a charge (I wis not worth the remembrance) he should leave his Distators place, It is not an easy thing to prefer either one matter, or one author before another. I suppose rather for my part, that the record and memorial of these matters hath been deprayed and corrupted, by these funeral Orations of praises, and by these counterfeit and salie titles of images: whiles every house and family draweth to it, the honour and renown of noble exploits martial feats and dignities, by any untruth and lie, so it be colourable. And hereupon, surely it is, that both the L deeds of particular persons, and the publick records and monuments of Acts, are confounded: neither is there extant any one writer, who lived in those dayes, upon whom, as a true and certain author, we might ground, and rest our selves.

The Ninth Book

The Breviary of L. Florss upon the Ninth Book.

Titus Veturius and Sp. Posthumius Confuls, having engaged their army fo far, within the Gullet 1 or streight of Caudium, into a place of great disadvantage, that they had no means nor hope to get forth again, fell to capitulation with the Samnits, and compounded with them: and after they had deliveredunto them 600 Roman Horsemen for hostages, they went away with the rest of the army, but so, as they were forced all of them to pass shamefully under the gallows. The same Consuls (even by the N motion of one of them, Sp. Polthumius, who perfuaded the Senat, that by rendring of those into the ene-mies hands, through whose default so shameful and ignominious a covenant was concluded, the City might be delivered and discharged of the promise given in the name thereof) with two Tribans of the Commons, and as many besides as had subscribed to the foresaid accord and agreement, were sent and reclied to the Samnits : but they might not be received. Not long after, Papirius surnamed Curfor, defeated the Samnits and put them likewise under the gallows: and recovered again those 600 Roman Horsemen aforefaid, that were left for hostages. By which means, the shame and disgrace of the former beastin Att was cancelled and abolished. Two Tribes were added to the rest, Usemina and Falerina. New inhabitants were sent to people Suessa and Pontiæ. Ap. Claudius being Cenfor, brought a chanel of water to the City, called of his name Claudia: and paved the highway, named after him likewife, Appia. He O admitted also into the range of Senators the sons of Libertins. But for asmuch as this state and degree of Citizens, seemed as it were polluted with these unworthy persons among them, the Consult of the year following, in the review of the Senators, and chusing new, held themselves to the order that other Censors next before had observed. This book conteineth moreover the prosperous wars against the Apulians, Tuscans Umbrians, Marsians, Pelignians, Equians, and Samnits: with whom was renewed the ancient league and amity. Flavius the scribe or notary, the son of a Libertin or enfranchised Roman, was made Ædile Curule, by the faction of the base common people. Which faction, because it troubled and disA q nieted all the assemblies for Elections, the whole Court in Mars field, wherein they have a great Broke and ruled all by means of might and strong hand, were by Q. Fabius the Cenfor, reduced into four Tribes by themselves : Which was the thing that purchased Fabius the surname of Maximus i right Great.

The Ninth Book of T. Livius.

Fter this year, immediately followed the peace made at Caudium, fo memorable for the Romansfoil and misfortune, which hapned in the Consulhip of T. Veturius Calvinus, and Sp. Pastinumius. During which, the Samn is had for their General Conducter, C. Pontius, the fon of Harennius, a most prudent and politick father, and was himself a worthy warrior and a most excellent Captain. This Pontins, after the Embassadors aforelaid (who had been fent to yeeld and deliver the goods) were returned home without peace concluded, foake thus in a frequent affembly of the Samnits, and faid: "Multers and friends, think never, The Oration but good there hath been done in this voyage, and our Embassage hath taken some effect. For of C. Pomins to "look what wrath the Gods in Heaven conceived against us, by our breach of covenant and the Samnits. "truce, is thereby wholly latisfied, and fully done away. This I know afforedly, that the Gods a-"bove (whose pleasure it was, that we should be driven to this neer point and hard exigent, as "to render the goods claimed of us, by vertue of an accord and covenant) were nothing conten-C " ted and pleased, that this our fatisfaction and recompence for the breach thereof was so proud-"Iv and disdainfully despited and rejected of the Romans. For what could possibly have been "done more, either to pacify the Gods, or to appeale men, than that which we offered and per-"formed? Whatsoever we won by way of hostility and spoil, from our enemies, and which by "right of war feemed to be ours, we fent back again: the counfellors and perfwaders of taking "arms, because we could not send alive. we delivered dead as they were: and their very goods "also (because nothing might remain with us, to bring us within the compass of their guiltiness) "we brought to Rome. What ow I more to thee O Roman? what am I bound to perform be-"fides, in regard either of covenant, or of the Gods, the judges of the covenant? Whom shall I "chuse and take for an indisferent arbitrator between thine anger and my punishment? No State D "and body of people in general, no private person in particular do I resuse: and if no equity and " reason for the poor and needy, be reserved amongst men against the greater and more mighty, " yet flie will I, and have recourse to the Gods, the Revengers of such intolerable pride: and I "will pray them to turn their anger upon those; whom neither restitution of their own goods, "nor thetendring of other mens withal to boot, will serve and content: whose fell cruelty, nei-"ther the death of the guilty perions, nor the delivery of dead bodies, neither the owners them-" felves yeelded, nor all they had in the World rendred with them, can fatisfie: briefly, who may "not possibly be appealed, without we should part with our heart bloud unto them, for to drink; "and give our bowels and entrails to be torn in pieces. The war (O Samnits) is just and right: Son their behalf, who have no way and means to avoid it: and ever lawfully take they arms, who E " have no other hope, but in force of arms, Since then, in all the affairs of this World, nothing "is of more importance than this, That men weigh and confider, whether the Gods be gratious " or adverse unto their enterprises: be sure of this, that as we made our former war not so much "against men as the Gods; to, we shall fight that which is now in hand, in the name of the "Gods, and under their conduct and guidance. Having spoken by way of Prophese these words. (which as they were right pleatant and plantible in the hearing, for they proved as true and were verified in the faccels entuing) he lead forth an army into the field and about Caudian he encamped himfelf; assovertly as he could. From thence, he fendeth to *Calatia (where he heard that the Guiazza. Roman Consuls and their forces lay in camp) ten souldiers disguised in the habit of Herdmen; and commanded them to keep their cattel grafing apart, fome in one place and fome in another. Four neverthe from the Romans forts and guards: with this infranction, That when they happed upon any of the Roman foragers and vantcurriers, they should agree all in one rale, and fay. That the Sammit legions were in Apatia, belieging Luceria with all their forces, and were at the point of winning it by affault. This rumour alfo was on purpose by others before, fee abroad and spread yea, and came to the Romans ears : but thele captives made it found more credible and like to betrue, for this especially, that all their words agreed one with another. No man doubted but that the Romans would aid the Lucerins, their good and faithful Allies, and the rather for fear left all Apulia would upon this profine trouble and fearful example revolt, and band with the Samuits : and the only thing they flood upon was this , Which way to go unto them. For twain there were leading to Luceria; the one broad and open, along the coast of the Adria-Grick Sea: but as it was the fafer, fo it was the farther abour, Another fhorter cut there was through the freights or guller of * Candium called Furenta Candina. But the natural fituation of * Scretto de Arthe place is thus: There are two deep; narrow, and wouldy pales, or dales, one in the rail of the pain, or if Ingo other, with continual crefts and ridges of hills round about them a between them lieth enclosed. do S. Maria, in the midit, a good largeplain or meadow, green of grassand full of waters, through the and Valle di midft whereof , there liether direct passage, But before ye come to that green a ve mutt enter Gardans. into that first streight aforesaid, and return again either the same way that ye went in, or it ye proceed to go forward, ye must pass through another such pass or streight, but narrower and more cumber ome than the other. Into that plain aforesaid the Romans marched down with the their army another way, through and hollow rock, but when they went on forth to the other fireight valley, they found it flopped and made up with the fall of trees, one crois over another. and likewife with an huge heap of mighty stones, laid full against them in the way. And they had not so soon discovered this guilful practise of their enemies, but they might descry withal, a power of them also on the top of the Hill. Then with all speed they seek to go back again the same way they came; but it they found also dammed up in like fort, and belet with armed men. Whereupon they made a fland, without any mans commandment: and as their minds were all amazed and aftonied, to their bodies also were possessed as it were with a strange and extraordinary nummedness in their limmess: and whiles they looked one upon another, each man thinking his fel- I low to be more witty, and have better understanding than himself; for a good while they stood fill, and faid not a word. But afterwards, when as they faw the two Confuls pavillions a ferting up, and some making ready things necessary to fortification; although they saw well enough, that in this desperate cate, past all hope of recovery, for all the desences they could devise, they should but lose their time and travel and prove tools in the end: yet nevertheless, because they would not feem to encrease their distressed fortune, and double it with their own default and negligence, every man what he could, to his power, without the direction of any leader, fetled himself to work, and to fortify along the water side their camp, with a trench and rampier. And besides the insolent and proud scoffing and derision of their enemies, every man with pittiful confession scorned and checked his own work and travel, as vain, and to no purpose. As the Consuls & then were pensive and discomforted, and called none about them to counsel, (for that indeed they supposed they were past all advise and help) the Lieutenants and Colonels came unto them of their felves unfent for, and the fouldiers turning to the Prarorium or Conful. Quarter, cryed to their Captains for help and fuccour, which hardly the very immortal Gods could afford and give them. But they, rather made their moans and complaints one to another of their misfortune, than fat in fage counsel to give or take advise, until the night came upon them: whiles each man according to his natural humour and fancy, muttered diversly. "One faid, let us break through "the stoppages opposed against us in the way: another, let us pais over the mountains and "woods before us, what way loever we may be able to cary armour; for lo we get to the ene-"my once, whom we have almost for these thirty years vanquished and chased before us; all will L "be plain, even and easy unto us Romans fighting against these faithless, perjured, and disloyal "Samnits. Tufh, faith another, whither should we go, or which way? What? Are we about to " remove mountains out of their places? So long as these tops of Hills are over our heads, how "will you possibly come to the enemy? Armed or unarmed, couragious or cowards, all is one, en-"trapped we are and undone every one. Our enemy will not to much as offer us the fword, " whereon we may dye like men with honor: he will fit still and end this war. Thus passed words to and fro, and thus passed the night away: unmindful were they of taking repast, never thought they of taking repose and sleep. The Samnits on the other side, in this so fortunat and happy opportunity preferred unto them, were as much to feek what to do, and what course to chuje and follow. Whereupon, they all in general were to dispatch letters to Herennius Pontius, the fa-M ther of their General, and to know his opinion. Now this man beforetime, by reason of his great age, had given over not only Military affairs, but also all civil businesses: howbeit in that old crafy and spent body of his, he bare the fresh vigour of mind and a pregnant wit to give counfel. When he understood that the Romans army was shut up fast within the two forrests, at the Caudine Gullets, and that his advise was asked by his sons messenger: he gave presently this counsel, That with all speed they should be let go from thence every one, without any harm at all done unto them. Which opinion of his being rejected [of his fon and the army] his mind was demanded a second time, by the same currier sent again unto him of purpose, And then he gave advile, that they should be all killed, and not one lest alive. Upon which answers so far dilagreeing, and thus delivered, as it were out of a doubtful Oracle: albeit his son himself N imagined, of all others most, that his fathers wit was in the wane, and aged as well as his feeble wasted body: yet by a general content of all he was overcome, to send for him in person for to declare his meaning by word of mouth. Neither thought the old man much thereof, but was brought (by report) to the camp in a chariot: and beeing called to counsel, he was in the same tale still, so as he nothing changed of his former advite, but alleaged only causes and reasons thereof. "Namely, that in his former resolution (which he took to be simply the best) "his meaning was, by a fingular benefit and good term; to confirm peace and amity for ever, "with a most mighty and putssant people: in the second his purpose was, by the utter losse of "two armies, whereby the State of Rome would not eafily recover their frength again, to defer "the wars for many a year. And as for a third counsel, he had none at all. When his son and O other chief Captains, by questioning inquired of him, what if a middle course between both were taken, namely, to difmis them safe, and according to the Law of arms and conquest to impose upon them, hard Laws and Conditions? "Mary (quoth he) this is the way indeed, that "neither winneth you friends, nor yet riddeth you of your foes: fave them whom ye have pro-"voked with shame and disgrace; and see what ye get thereby. The Romans are of this nature, "that they cannot be still and quiet so long as they have the worse; it will never dye in their "hearts but wil be alwayes fresh whatsoever shame this present extremity shall brand them with:

"and never will it give them any rest, before they have been by manifold and fundry wayes reven-"ged of you. So his advite was not accepted, neither the one nor the other, and old Herennius was carried home again from the camp. The Romans likewife in the camp, after many attempts (but all in vain) for to breakforth and escape away, being now in great penuty and scarcity of all things, for very necessity were driven to lend Embassadors unto the enemies: who first should crave an equal and indifferent peace: and if they might not obtain it, then to bid defiance and challenge them to a battel. Pontius made answer, that there was no talking of battel; for that the field was won already: and because they being vanquished; and as good as taken captive, knew not how to come down and confess their poorestate; he gave them to understand, That he would put them under the gallows, despoiled of their armour, and stript into their shifts: and as B for other conditions of peace, they should be such, as were meet to pass between men conquered, and conquerours: namely, if they would depart out of the Samnits country, withdraw their colonies, and to both Samnit and Roman in equal alliance live under their own laws and cultomes: nponthele Articles and Capitulations, he was content to come to some point of accord with the Consuls. If any of these covenants disliked them, then he forbad the Embassadors to repair again to him anymore, but at their peril. When relation of this answer was made in the camp, there arose juddenly such a sighing and groning amongst them all, and so great pensiveness and anguish of heart feized upon them, that it feemed they could not have taken it more heavily, and to the heart, if word had been brought that they must all have died in the place. After long filence, when as the Confuls wift not how to open their mouth, either for the accord and composition C fo shameful, or against it so necessary: then L. Lentulus, who as well in regard of his vertue, as of his dignities, was chief of all the Lieutonants, faid: "I have heard my father (quoth he) Oye "Confuls, oftentimes make report, that he was the only man in the Capitol, who perswaded the "Senat, not to ransome and redeem with gold, the City from the hands of the Gauls; at what "time as they were not inclosed either with trench or rampier by their enemies, (a Nation to "fay a truth, of all others most idle in such works, and fortifications) but might have broken "through them, if not without great danger, yet without evident ruin, and affured destruction. "Were the case so now, that as they then, being armed might have run down out of the Capitol upon their enemies under them (in which fort oftentimes the besieged have sallied out upon "them that lay in fiege) so we might but fight with our enemies in any place (it skilleth not) D " good or had even or uneven: I would not in giving counsel, be any jot behind my father in cou-" rage and valor. For I confess verily that to die for our country is a brave death: and for my own part, ready am I even to offer my body as a facrifice to prefent death, yea, and it were to engage my felfamong the thickest of my enemies, thereby to lave the people of Rome and the legions: "But alas, here I see my country, here I see all the Roman Regiments and Legions that are, who "unless for their own selves they will run upon their death, what have they else to save by their "death? Why, will fome manfay, the houles and buildings of the City, the walls, and that mulc titude that inhabit the City. Nay rather, if this army fortune here to micarry, they are all clean "betrayed into the enemies hand and not faved. For who shall defend them? Peradienture, the ce weak and unarmed multitude: even as well furely as they defended it against the violence of the E « Gauls: Or, will they fend for an army from Veii, and befeech the help again of Captain Camillus? " Even the one as well as the other, But here in this place is our whole hope, here is all our power "and puissance: in saving it, we preserve our country; in offering it to die we abandon and betray "our country. To yeeld and render our selves, is a foul and shameful thing; true, but such is "the love of our Country, that we ought to preserve it, as well with our utter shame, if need re-" quire, as by our death. Let us undergo then, and abide this shameful indignity what loever, " and obey that fatal necessity, which the very Gods themselves cannot overcome. Go to then, « Consuls, a Gods name, redeem the City with your armor and weapons, which your fore-fa-"thers ransomed with their gold. Then went the Confuls to Pontius for to parle. And when as be began like a conqueror to debate about the capitulations of Covenants, they denied plainly F that any league could be made, without the privity, will and authority of the whole people: nor without the Fecials, and other folemn and usual Ceremonies. So that this Caudine accord was not (as commonly it is believed, and as Claudius also writeth) concluded by form of absolute covenant, but by way of flipulation and promise. For what needed either sureties in a periect agreement and league ; or hostages to be given when the matter is passed by this form of prayer, By whole default it happed that the conditions agreed were not of served, that people Jupiter would so Smite, as the swine there was by the fecial smitten? The Coss. Lieutenants, Treasurers, and Colonels, who undertook assfureties, subscribed and signed; and the names yet are extant of them all: where, if the matter had paffed by way of an absolute league, there should have been subscribed no more but the names of two Fecials only. Moreover, by reason that the conclusion of G this accord was of neteffity deferred, there were required also 600 Horsemen hostages, who should lose their heads, in case the covenants of the agreement were not observed. And thereupon was the time appointed and let down of delivering the faid hollages, and yeelding the army without their armor. Now the coming of the Confuls renewed again the forrow in the camp that hardly they could hold their hands from those, through whose rash conduct they were come to that place of disadvantage: and through whose cowards e they were to depart from thence more shamefully than they came: complaining that they had not so much as a guide to direct them, nor an espial to discover the coasts: but like beats were driven blinded into a trap or 4 pitfal: and one looked upon another; beholding the amor that within a while they were to deliver up, viewing their right hands, which aron flouild be unarmed, their naked bodies expoled to the mercy and devotion of the enemy. They det before their eyes, the gallows prepared by the enemy for them to pals under the fcornes and reproachful taunts of the Victor his proud and difdainful looks, and how they (difarmed) should pass in a long train and go through the armed enemies: then afterwards, the piteous spectacle of the way which they milt go, and the hameful dismarch of their disgraced army: briefly, their foul and dishonourable return through the Cities of their allies unto their country and parents, whither they themselves and their ancestors oftentimes had gone in triumph. They were the only men, which without wound, without dint of r weapon, without battel fought, were discomfitted and vanquished : who might not so much as draw their fword, and never came to joyn or encounter with their enemy; having armonr, having ftrength of lim, having hearts given them in vain. As they brayed out with great discontentment and anguish, these words, thesatal hour of their reproach and shame was come; which by proof and femible experience, was to make all matters more heavy and woful, than they conceived and imagined in their minds aforehand. First and foremost were they commanded all, to go forth without the trench disarmed, and in their single garments: then were the hostages presently delivered, and had to ward: after this, were the Serjeants and Officers willed to depart from the Confuls: whose rich coats of arms, when they were plucked from their thoulders, moved fuch pity and compassion even in them, who a while before with all cursing and banning, judged them worthy to be delivered bound hand and foot into their enemies hands for to be mangled despiteously and cut inpieces; that every man forgetting his own estate, wherein he stood rurned away his eves, as it were from an abhominable spectacle, and could not indure to behold that disgracing and disfiguring of fo great state and Majesty. The first that were put under the gallows, were the Cost, welneer half naked: and according to their degree and place, fo was every one in order put to the shame: and afterward, the legions one after another. The enemies in their armor stood al the while about them, fcorning, mocking, and making a game of them; many had fwords and daggers fet against their hearts, in menacing wife, some were hurt and stabbed so death; namely, such as with stern countenance and grim looks above the rest, for the indignity of these things, offended the conqueror. Thus were they fent with shame enough under the gallows, and (that which was I more grievous than the thing) even in the fight and view of their enemies they were not to foon got out of the forrest, but although they seemed but then as plucked out of dark hel to see the day, yet the very light it ielf was worse than al kind of deaths, when they beheld so illfavoured an annu and unfeemly. And therefore, albeit they might have reached to Capua before night, yet being doubtful of the faithfulnes and protection of their allies, or elfe diffinited for very shame, they cast their poor and filly bodies upon the ground, about the high wayes nor far from Capua. Whereof, when news came to Capsa, the just and due pitty which they took of their allies, overcame the inbred arrogancy and pride of that people by kind, Immediatly they fent unto the Coff, the enfigns and ornaments belonging to their place of authority, the Lictors and Serjeants with their rods they fent armor and Horses, apparel and victual also for the souldiers bountifully and as they came neer w to Capua, the whole Senat and people went out to meet them, and performed all duties of kindness and hospitality, both privat and publick, that could be devised and as meet was and requisite. And yet neither the courteous ulage nor the pleasant countenances and lightsome speeches of their allies, could draw from them any words, no, nor fo much as make them to hold up their heads and eyes, and to look again upon their friends, when they yeelded them al these comforts they could. So as besides their grief and sorrow of heart, a certain bashfulnels and shame forced them to shun all communication and converting with men. The morrow after, when as certain young Gentlemen of the Nobility were returned, who had been tent in convoy from Capua, to accompany them and bring them on their way, as far as their liberties and confins; they were fent for into the Senat-house, and being demanded by the ancients and elders, what news: they reported, that they N. feemed unto them much more heavy and cast down than before, fo filent and in manner dumb, they marched along: that noble mind and courage of the Romans was now multe and mum their hearts clean done and gone together with their armor, not able to greet again, no, nor to give 2 word to those that saluted them, not one of them for sear able to open his mouth, as if still they bare that yoke and gallows upon their necks, under which they went. That the Samnits had indeed not only a brave victory, but also a perpetual over them, and the hand of them for ever; and had now won not Rome, as the Gauls aforetime, but also (which was a more hardy and warlike exploit) had conquered the Romans courage, stoutness, and valour. As these news were reported, and audience given thereto, with fuch affent, that every man lamented now the Roman name, as desperat; and concluded generally it was in the countel of these their faithful confederats, that o they were past recovery; one Offilim Calavim, the son of Ovius, a man right nobly born, renowned for his valiant Acts, and besides, very grave and reverend for his age, spake by report in this manner and faid, That he took the matter far otherwise than they all did: for that stubborn and resolut filence, (qd. he) those eyes fastened to wistly on the earth, those deaf ears to admit al solace and comfort, that shame of theirs to look up and behold the light, were express and certain tokens of them that toffed and rolled from the very root and bottom of their heart; a huge heap and mals of anger & despite, Either (qd.he) I know not the nature of the Romans, or else that fillness & filence will shortly cost the Samnits woful cryes and doleful groans; and the remembrance of this Candina accord, wil be more heavy and dolorous agood deal to the Samnits than to the Romans rfor as for them, they will every man find their hearts and courages again, where foever they shall have one counter; but the Sammits shall ot meet every where with the Caudium streights for their purpole; And now by this time was this shameful overthrow and disgrace known at Rome. Intelligence they had before, how they were belet and enclosed about: but afterwards arrived a messenger with news more heavy and forcowful for that ignominious peace, than for any peril and danger otherwise. At the first noise and bruit that they were besieged, they began to shuster; but after they heard, that they had so shamefully yeelded themselves, all that preparation of aid and succor n was discharged and sent away: and presently without any order from publick authority, 'they gave themselves every one to all manner of mourning and lamentation. The shops all about the market place were shut up. A general vacation began of it self, and pleading in all courts ceased, before Proclamation made: the purple and scarler robes were left off, the golden rings laid away. and the whole City in a manner more forrowful and heavy, than the very army. Neither were they angry and offended with the Captains only, with the authors of the peace, with the cautions and jurcties for the same; but hated also the guiltles souldiers, denying flatly, that they were worthy to be received into City or house. Which heat of stomack and wrathful indignation, the first arrival of the army, utterly allayd; which even to angry persons was pitiful and lamentable. For they returned not as men that elcaped tafe, alive, and unlooked for into their country, C but like captives in habit and countenance; they entred late into the Town, and hid their heads, every man within own house: so as the morrow after, and for certain dayes following, none of them would come into the market place, nor put his head out at dores to look into the fireets. The Confuls likewile for their part, kept in, as privat men, and would exercise no function pertaining to their charge, but only that which thy were forced unto by an act of the Senat; namely, to nominate a Dictator for to be President at the Election of Consuls. So, they elected Q. Fabius Ambuftus for Dictator, and P. Elius Pasus, General of Horse, Who being wrong created. and without the approbation of the Auspices, there were chosen in their room, M. Amylius Pappus for Dictator, and E. Valerius Flacens General of the Horlemen, and yet by them was not the affembly holden for the Election abovefaid. And for afmuch as the people were even weary D again of all that years Magistrats, as unlucky and unfortunate, it grew at length to an Interreggi. So Interregents there were, Q. Fabius Maximus, and M. Valerius Corvinus, who created Confuls, Q. Publiss Philo, and L. Papirius Curfor the second time; with the whole consent, ho doubt, of the City, for that in those dayes there were not two more noble and renowned Captains to be found.

These same day they were created, they entred their Magistracy (for so the LL. of the Conncel had decreed:) and after certain folemn and ordinary acts of the Senat paffed, they went in hand to confuk about the treaty of the Caudine peace. And Publius, whole course it was then to have the foveraignty of rule; "Speak (quoth he) Sp. Posthumius, to the matter propounded, The Oration forage, should suffer any especial comment above other, at the enemies hands, for anger and despite of reverting and breath of that accord. When as now they all after fingular praises of the man, condecended to his opinion; the Tribuns of the Com. L. Living and Q. Melius, attempted for a while to oppose themselves against this proceeding. : saying, "That neither the people could be " acquit and affoiled in confcience, by their delivery, unless every thing were again reflored to " the Samnits, in the same estate, wherein they flood at Candium: nor they themselves (in that they "fublcribed and became boundforche accord of peace, to fave the holt of the people of Rome) "had deferved any punishment: nor yet, last of all, ought they being lacred Migistrats and in-" violable, to bayygelded to the enemies, and exposed to any outrage and violence. But if ye will be rues led by me, let them before they be thus yeelded, here in this common Hal be whipped and scour-"ged for the usury and interest of their punishment, which they would seem to defer and put off " folong. For whereas they alledge and fay, That by the delivery and yeelding of us, the peoples consciences cannot be cleered and assoiled; who is to ignorant in the Fectales and Heralds law, "that knoweth not that these men spake this, for this end rather, that they themselves might not 66 be rendred, than for that the truth requireth to. Neither do I deny my Lords, that bare promiles and (tipulations are unviolable, and to be kept as well as covenants and obligations with those men, among whom both Religion to Godward, and faithfulness to men is in regard and K estimation : but I deny again that without the peoples affent and grant, any thing can be esta-"blished good and effectual, to bind the people thereunto. What! if the Samuits, in the same pride and infolency, wherein they obtruded and forced upon us this stipulation, yea; and wrung et it from us, would also have urged us to utter and speak, the solemn form of words, which they " nie to do that surrender up Cities: would ye (my Masters that are Tribuns) infer and say, that "by vertue thereof the people of Rome is furrendred into their hands? and that this City, with the Emples, Chappels Limits and Waters by flrength thereof, are the Samnits poffession? Well, I let pais to speak of dedition, because the matter in question is touching only a stipulation. What, I pray you if we had promifed and undertook, that the people of Rome should forsake "and abandon this City? or fet fire on it? or not have Magistrats, Senat, or laws any longer? or L to be governed again by Kings? God forbid and deny that, say you. Well, it is not the indignity of things, that eafeth the bond or Stipulation. If there be any one case, wherein the people may "be obliged, then in truth may they be in all as well: neither skilleth it any whit, (whereat hap-" ly some will make a stay, and think it is material) whether Consul, Dictator, or Pretor, enter "into bond and become furety. And even thisit was, that the Samnits themselves judged so to be, and flood upon : thinking it not sufficient, that the Consuls became bound, but they put the Lieutenants, the Treasurers, and the Colonels there, to the same. And now, let no man demand of me, why I entred to into flipulation, being a thing not incident to the Conful his charge and " right, neither was I to undertakeunto them peace, which was not in my power to effect: nor to in your name to promise it, from whom I had no commission and warrant. Certainly my Lords M and Senators, there was nothing at Candium done at all by mans policy and counsel. The im-"mortal Gods bereft both your Generals and the enemies too, of all their fense and understan-64 ding; for neither we, in the conduct and ordering of our service, stood warily enough upon our ec good guard and they again, as they gat the victory full badly, to they loft it as lewdly: whiles "they hardly trufted the firength of those places, by means of which they had gained the vantage "and better hand of us: and while they made such hast, upon what agreement they cared not, to " difarm men that are born martial, and naturally made for wars. For, if they had been in their " right wits, what an hard matter was it for them in the time that they fent for old aged men from their home, to come to Councel, for to have dispatched their Embassadors to Rome? and so to "have dealt and treated with the Senat and people, about a perfect peace and final league indeed? N "It had been but three dayes journey for men not encumbred, but lightly appointed." All that " mean while there might have been truce, until the Embassadors from Rome, had brought them "either certain victory or assured peace. For that had been a covenant and stipulation good in "law, the which we should have agreed unto a buyyerrant of the peoples will and approbation "But ye would never have granted and allowed is ing more should we have entred into any such "flipulation. Neither was it Gods will and providence, that thereshould be any other iffue and "end of things than this: that both they should vainly be deluded and feed themselves as it were, with the fancy of a more joyful dream than their minds could wel conceive and apprehend and er also that the same fortune, which had entangled in inared and brought into danger our army, " should relieve the same, and rid it again out of perilt that as their victory was srivolous and vain, 0 "fo a vainer and more frivolous peace, should make it trustrat and worth nothing and that such a "flipulation and promise should be interposed and come between which might oblige and bind "no person, but the very makers themselves. For what dealing both there been with you my Lords " of the Senat? or with the people of Rome? Who can challenge you? Who can call you into que-"flion? Who can come forth and complain that he is by you deceived? Enemy, or Cicizen? To "enemy ye have passed no promise: Citizen to undertake for you and in your name, ye comA "commanded none. Therefore ye have nothing to do to meddle with us, to whom ye gave "nought in charge: and with the Samnits as little, with whom ye had no treaty at all. To the "Samnits, we are fufficient pledges enough, and aniwerable to perform that which is our own: "for that, I fay, which we are able to make good and yeeld: even our bodies and lives: upon "thefe let them exercise their rage, upon these let them whet their swords and their spightful "malice. And as for the Tribuns of Commons, consult ye together, whether they may be reti-dired presently, or ought to be reserved and put off to an other day: let us in the mean time (O "Vennius," and ye that are the rest!) offer these wretched heads and lives of ours, like captives to "dicharge our bond," and by our punishment and execution, deliver and set free the Roman B "samu."

Both the cause it self, and the Advocatalso, moved the Lords of the Senat: and wrought so much not only with the rest, but also with the Tribuns themselves of Commons that they promiled to be at the Confuls ordering and appointment. Whereupon immediatly they gave up their offices, and were delivered into the Fecials hands with the other, to be led all, to Caudium. There was not io foon an act of the Senat passed hereof, but it seemed that the very light and rayes of the Sun shone upon the City again. Pefthamius was in every man his mouth, him they praised and extolled to the heavens : comparing him with the voluntary offering of P. Decius the Conful, for the safety of the army, and other worthy and noble acts of others: Saying, that by his overture, by his means and travel, the City was delivered from a fervil, dishonourable and un-C honest peace: He (say they) hath offered himself to at the torments, anger, and vengeance of the enemies, and made full latisfaction thereby for the people of Rome. Nothing now but war, war: Alarm, now cryed every man: and, oh, that everthey might feethe day to encounter on: e again with the Samnits, in their armour and with weapon in hand. So, whiles the City was thus inflamed and boiled with hateful ire and indignation, there was an army levied, well near all of Voluntaries. New legions were must red and enrolled again out of the same souldiers, and a puissant army set forth to Caudium. The Fecials marched before, and when they were come to the gate of the City, commanded the Sureties, fuch as had subscribed and signed the accord aforesaid, to be despoiled and fript out of their cloths, and their handsto be pinnioned behind him. And when the Lictor or Serjeant, for very reverence of Majesty in Posthumius his person, bound him D at large and at eale, Why does not thou (quoth he) draw and pull the cord itreighter, that the rendring and delivery of us may be according to law and as it ought to be, and no fault to be found withal? Afterwards, when they were come into the affembly of the Samnits, and before the Tribunal judgment feat of Pomius; A.Cornelius Arvina one of the Fecials or Heralds thus spake: For almuch as these persons, without commandment and commission from the Quirites and people of Rome, have undertaken by ftipulation. That there stall a league and peace be made with you; and in so doing have offended and trespassed against the State, therefore, to the end, that the people of Rome might be freed and affoiled from a deteliable and heinous offence, Here I deliver and yeeld unto you, the self same men. No sooner had he uttered these words, but Posthumius with his knee more the Fecial his high, with all the might he could : and with a loud E voyce said, That he being now a Samnit citizen, and the other an Embassador and an Herald of the people of Rome; had against the Law of Nations injured him and offered him the abuse: whereby the Romans might more juftly make war. Then quoth Pontias, "This delivery nei-"ther will I accept of and admit, neither shall the Samnits hold it good and lawful. But why "dost not thou Sp. Posthumius, if thou believe there be any Gods, either undo and cancel all, or "stand to thy bargain and covenant? For by right either are they all due unto the Samnits, whom "they once had in their power; or elle peace; in lieu of them. But why peak I thus, and chal-" lengethee, who doest yeeld thy self again prisoner to the conqueror as faithfully and loially as "thou canst? The people of Rome I challenge, who, if they repent of the promile and bargain "made at the streights of Candium, let them bring again the Legions into that gullet, wherein Fifthey were environed, enclosed, and compassed. Let no man deceive and delade other. Let all "boundone again, and every thing as it was: let them take again their armour, which by cove-" thank they yeelded up: let them return into their own camp, and have what soever they had the "day before the Parle. Then let them please themselves with war, with valiant and magnanimous "deeds: refuse they then, and spare not all covenant: reject they then all treaty of peace. Let us " have the same fortune, the same opportunity and vantage of the places, which we had before "the mention of peace: and to make war; and trie the iffue. So shall neither the people of "Rome, blame the Confuls Ripulation, nor we find any lack and default in the faithfulness of the people of Rome. And will we never have done, but alwayes find thifts and excuses, and not Wiland to your covenants, when ye are overcome, and have the worfe of your enemies? Ye gave O "fometimes hostages to King Porfena; and when ye had done, afterwards stole them away. For "a fum of gold you bought again your City of the Gauls; and as they were receiving the same "gold, murdered they were by you and hewn in pieces. Peace ye have covenanted with us upon "condition that we should reffore again your legions unto you; that peace you cancel and make " void, and evermore ye let fome colour of tight upon your contelous and fraudulent dealing. Well, "alloweth not the people of Rome of the faving of their Legions, by a dishonorable and shameful "peace? Say it is fo. Let peace go whether it will: but give you again to the Victor your Legions " captivat. Is this your faithful dea lingare these your covenants, & ceremonies of Fecials & He-

" ralds? that thou, according to the agreement and accord, shoulds have that debre of thine, H "even to many citizens lives faved? and I not have the peace (which by letting mine hold go un-" to thee an enemy) I bargained for ? What Justice is this, that thou, O Cornelius, and ye that are "heralds, prescribe to Nations abroad? Nay verily, I neither will accept of those persons whom " ye make a shew to deliver neither can I believe, that they are yeelded in verity and good earness. " Nay, I pass not at all, whether they return again into that City, which is obliged by a covenant "made, attended upon with the wrath and displeasure of all the Gods, whose heavenly power "and deity is thus deuded. Now go and make war, feeing that Sp. Posthumius erewhile thrust "and pushed an Embassador herald with his knee; and so the Gods will believe no doubt, that " Pesthumius is a Samnit citizen, and no Roman; and that by a Samnit, a Roman Embassador hath I been abused: and thereupon you may take a just occasion and good quarrel to make war upon "upon us. Are you not lishamed, and bash you not to broach and set abroad; in the view and "face of the world, such mockeries of Religion? What? old and ancient grave personages, and " fuch as have been Confuls, to feek fuch subtle devices (not fit for very children and babesto "play with) and all to shift off and falsify their promise made by covenant. Go Lictor, loose the "Romans of their bands: and no man to hardy as to flay them, but that they may depart when "they will at their own pleasure. So they, having thus perhaps discharged the publick fidelity, " or at least wife quit themselves undoubtedly of their own, returned from Candium, unhurt, to " the Roman camp.

The Samnits feeing that in lieu of a proud and unreasonable peace, there was a most cruel wark new sprung up again, not only forecast and apprehended in their minds, but well neer saw evidently with their eyes, all that ever entied after. Then, all too late and in vain, God wot, they praised the two-fold counsel of old Pontius: and how they taking the middle way between, were deceived, & had exchanged the certain possession of victory for an uncertain and doubtful peace and having lost the opportunity both of gratifying the Romans, or doing them harm any more, were now to fight & wage war with them, whom they might either have disabled for being hurtful enemies, or made their fast and satured stiends forever. And so without any weakning of their power and forces of either side by battel, their hearts after this Caudine peace were so changed, that Postumius by his voluntary yeelding was more honored among the Romans, than Postum his bloodles victory among the Samnits: and the Romans made this reckoning, it that I the possession was made that reckoning, it that I the possession and was war was to them as middle his reckoning, it that I the possession was made that once made war again and got the upper-

Whiles these things thus passed, the Satricans revolted to the Samnits : and the Colony at Fregella; by the judden and unlooked for arrival of the Samnits (with whom it is certain the Satricans were banded) in the night was surprised and taken. But the mutual fear one of the other, kept them in on both fides that they firred not out until the morning. Then began the fight, which for a certain time was equal and indifferent: yes, for that the Fregellones within fought for their Church and chimney (as they fay) and by ceafon that the multitude, unmeet for arms, flood them in good flead in annoying their enemies from off their houses; they held out and M found them play a long time. But afterwards, a willy and deceitful policy turned all backwards and was their undoing: for they suffred the voyce of the cryer to be heard through the Town, who proclaimed, That who oever laid down weapon, should departalive and safe with bag and baggage. The hope whereof, caused them to flack somewhat of their fight, and therewith they began to cast away their armor in every place. But the resolut fort armed fill, brake away through a postern gate, whose venturousness proved to them more safe, than the inconsiderat lear of the other which made them credulous and too light of belief. For the Sammes compafied them about with fire, and for all they called upon the Gods for their help, and so their enemies for performance of their promife, yet they burned them most pizeously.

Applia, where the Roman Horsemen given for host ages at Caudmin were kept in ward thut Publiwistayed in Samnium to make head against the Caudino legions. Which thing much troubled and diffracted the minds of the Samnits: for neither their hearts would ferve them to go to Linderia, left the enemy should come on their backs; not yet to stay behind, for fear left in the while, Luceria thould be loft. They thought it best therefore, to put all in hazard of a battel, and to try it out with Rublius. Wherenpon, they bring forth their power into the field: with whom when Publiwe was minded to joyn in fight, he thought it not amils, first to make some speech unto his men, and focommanded them to affemble unto an audience; But, as they came running to the Pratosinm, with exceeding great cheerfulnes, fo by reason of their noise that called hard for battel, no exhibitration of the General could be heard: each man his own heart mindful of the former dif- Of graces ferred well enough to encourage and animat them. So they march out to battel, putting forward the standard bearers and post enligns. And because they would lose no time, they first charge with lancing their javelins and shooting darts, and after that in drawing their swords, they threw away their javeling, as if they had had a fignal given them fo co do, and with naked drawn fword, they ran upon their enemies. No cunning was there to be shewed of warlike Captains noskill to be shewed either in setting in array the files and ranks, or placing of the rereward for happines is the couldiers furious angers, with raging violence, marshalled and managed all.

A So, the enemies were not only discomfited and put to the rour; but also because they durst not hinder their flight by retiring to their own camp, they made all the hast they could, disbanded as they were, toward Applia. Howbeit they were rallied together in one company, and so came to Luceria. The Romans, in the same boiling heat of blood that they pierced through the mids of the enemies battel; entred also into their camp: where was more bloudshed and execution than in the battel, and the greater part of the pillage was in their choler marred and clean lost.

The other army commanded by Papirius the Coff, marched along the Sea coaft to Arpi: and all the Country they passed thorows, theweod them friendship and courtesse, more for the outrages and losse sustained by the Sammits, and the hatted they bare them, than for any love to the people of Rome, or good received at their hands. And now the Sammits at that time dwelling upon the Hills in Villages, being mountainers and wild people, and as it is commonly seen, of like disposition to the places which they do inhabit, wasted the plain Champian and Sea coasts, despiting indeed their more civil like and conversation. Which Country, if it had been true to the Sammits, either the Roman army had not been able to come to Arpi, or else the penury and scarcity of all things between Rome and Arpi, would have consumed them, being cut off from all provision of victuals, for even then, being gone from them, and lying encamped before Loveria, as wel they without in the leaguer & those that were within the City besieged, were nipped and bitten with hunger. The Romans were served all from Arpi, but so sledenly and scarcity, that whiles the scorem were occupied in their guards warding, watching, and worship uncessarily the Hersens were were occupied in their guards warding, watching, and working unceflanily; the Horiemen, were C fain to bring corn from Arpi, in little leather baggs: and otherwhiles, if they met the enemy, were forced to cast the corn from off their Horiebacks, to fight more nimbly. They that were within befieged before the other Conful came with his army, had both from the mountains of the Samnits, victuals brought unto them, and futcors also of men let in to them. But the coming of Pablius made all provisions more streight: for, leaving the charge of the feege to his brother Conful, he rode lightly appointed without carriage, all over the Country, and so beat all the quarters, that they were too hot for the enemies to forage and purvey victuals. Then the Samnits, seeing that they within the City befieged, were past all hope to abide the famine any longer, encamped about Luceria, and were forced to gather all their forces together from all patts, and to give Paprius battel. At which very infant, when they were on both 6 deep reaches.

pirius battel. At which very instant, when they were on both sides preparing to sight, the Tarentine Embassadors came between, dicharging and forbidding, both Samnits and Romans to sight professing withal, that whosever they were that refused to give over war, against them they would fight in desence and favor of the others. Papirius having heard that embassage, making semblance, as if he had greatly regarded their speeches, answered that he would confer with his brother Consul: and having sent for him, and bestowed all the mean time in preparation to sight, when he had talked with him as rouching the execution of matters already resolved, he presently gave the signal, and set out the bloudy banner of battel, Now as the Consuls were busy in factificing and performing duties belonging to God and man (as their manner is when they purpose to go to a battel) the Tarentin Embassadors a foresaid, encountred them and expected an answer. To whom Papirius, The Chick-master (qd, he) O ye Tarentins, sendent me word, that the birds feed right, and list well is and hesses that the Society of the state of the singular set of the state of the state of the sendent set.

E right, and all is well; and besides that, the Gods in our factifice seem passing well pleased. And in the name of the Gods, and under their conduct (as ye see) we are going to barrel. Then commanded he to set forward the standards, and led forth his power, mocking the soolish nation so their great vanity, who, not able to manage their own affairs by reason of home seditions and civill discords, thought it meet to be moderators between others, and to prescribe them war or peace. The Samnits on the other side, having slaked all their care and desire of war, for that they desired peace in good earnest, or else thought it expedient for them to make a semblance thereof, for to win unto them the Tarentins; seeing the Romans all of a sudden arranged in battel array and ready to sight, cryed forth aloud, that they rested still in the authority of the Tarentins, and were at their direction: neither would they come forth into the field, norput themselves in Farms out of their fort: choosing rather being thus disposinted, to a sight the charge of for

Farms out of their fort: choosing rather being thus disappointed, to abide the chance of fortune whatsoever, than to seem to have despised the Tarentins, who had interposed themselves as Mediators for peace. Marry (quoth the Cost.) we take that for a good sign and presage of lucky succests: and we would wish no more at Gods hands, but to put into their enemies heads that resolution, not to desend their trench and rampire. So the Cost. when they had parted between them their forces, approached the very camp of their enemies, and set upon them with an hot assult on every side. Thus while some filled and dammed up the trenches, others plucked up the stakes of the rampier, and threw the bank and all down the ditches under their seer: whiles not only their own inbred valour by nature, but also anger and choler provoked and pricked to the quick, their hearts already fretted and cankred at the very root, for the last disgrace received, they

Gentred the camp. Every man for his part gave out and faid, Here are not the faraight gullers of Caudium, here are not the impaffable nor inaccessible passes, and fortests, where as proud fraud had gone beyond their silly errour and want of forecast: but Roman vertue and prowels, which no rampier never so strong, no trench how deep soever, is able to put by and withstand. So they killed all asore them indifferently, as well them that made resistance and stood to it; as those that retired and gave way: armed and diarmed, bond and free born, old and young, as well under age as undergrown, man and beast, one with another: neither had there escaped any living creature drawing breath, but that the Consuls sounded the retreat, and with minatory words commanded the fouldiers, so greedy of murder and bloudthirsly, to go forth of the camp to Whereupon when they were highly discontented and in great indignation, for that they were staid and interrupted in this sweetness of easing their anger, and satisfing their revenge to the full; it was time to deliver this speech unto them, wherein the souldiers were given to underfland, how the Confuls neither were behind any of them in malice and hatred to their enemies, nor would be hereafter: but as they were their chief conductors to the war, so they would be their leaders and shew them the way, to unsatiable appetite of revenge and execution; had not the care and regard of those 600 Horsemen, which were kept as hostages in Luceria, cooled their thirst and staid their stomacks; lest haply the enemies in despair to find pardon and mercy, should run upon them in a blind fit of fury and rage, and put them all to the word; chung rather to tor-ment and kill them first, before they died themselves. The fouldiers greatly commended this I course, and rejoyced that thus their choler was allaid, and their fury bridled, consessing, That they were indeed to abide all what soever, rather than the life of so many of the forwardest and principal young Gentlemen of Rome, should be betraid, or in danger. This audience being dismissed, they drew together to a Councel, whether with all their forces they should assail and press hard upon Luceria, or with one of the armies and chief Leaders, give the attempt to found the Apuligns, a close and secret kind of people thereabout, who ever to that day had stood in doubtful terms

Publius the Conful, who had taken this journey to over-run all Apulia, in that one voyage and expedition, either by force subdued and brought under his obeifance certain States, or upon conditions entred league and fociety with them. Paprius also, who staid at the siege of Luceria, with-K in a short time sped according to his expectation. For having forelaid and beset all the wayes, by which victual was conveyed thither out of Samnium, the Samnits who lay in garifon at Luceria, pinched and tamed with famine, sent Embassadors to the Roman Consul, making offer to release and deliver up into his hands those Horsemen, (the only cause of the present war) in case he would raise and levy the siege. To whom Papyrius made this answer that they should have gone first to Pontius, the son of Herennius, by whose counsel they had put the Romans under the yoke and the gallows, to learn and know of him, what in his opinion they were to abide, who were vanquished and overcome. Howbeit, for asmuch as they had rather, and chose rather to be cenfured indifferently, and to receive equal conditions of their enemies, than of their own felves, he willed the Embassadors to give them to understend in Luceria, that they should leave their ar-L mor, their bag and baggage, their beafts of carriage, and impotent multitude not fit for the wars, within in the wals. And as for the fighting fouldiers, he would put them to pais under the gallows in their fingle shirts, for to revenge the shame first offered them, and not to inslict any new ignominy upon them. Nothing was denied and refused: seven thousand men of war were put under the gallows, a rich and huge pillage raised within Luceria, all their own enfigns and armor regained, which they had loft at Caudium: and that which furmounted all other joyes, they recoyeared again those Gentlemen of arms, whom lying for pledges and fecurity of the peace aforesaid, the Samnits had sent to Luceria to be kept in safe custody. There is not lightly to be found a vi-Story more noble, and of greater consequence to the people of Rome than this, in regard of the sudden change of fortune, in case (as some records bear witness) Pontin also himself the son of He-M rennius, and General of the Samnits, to make satisfaction and quittance for the Consuls disgrace and shame, was put under the yoke, as well as all the rest. But I less marvel that it is not clear, but left uncertain, that the enemies General was rendred, and went under the gallows: this rather I wonder at, that doubted it is, whether Lucius Cornelius Dictator, with L. Papirius Curfor, General of the Horsemen, managed these acts first at Caudium, and then afterwards at Luceria: and being the only revenger of that difgrace of the Romans, triumphed most worthily (I date be bold to fay) of any man before that time, next to Furius Camillus : or whether the chief honour hereof pertain by right to Papirius as Conful. Upon this error followeth another in the nack of it, whether Papirius, furnamed Curfor, for his good service at Luceria, in the next Election, continued in Magistracy, and were made the third time Consul with Q. Amylius Caretanus, the se-N cond time: or whether it were L. Papyrius Mugillanus, and the error grew upon the furname, But it is agreed upon by all writers, that from this time forward all the reliques of the wars, were performed and finished by Consuls. Emplias in one prosperous battel made a final conquest of the Ferentans, and upon composition had the City delivered up unto him, whither they had retired their forces for succor after their defeat in the field, and hostages were imposed upon them. With like good success fought the other Consul with the Satricans, who being Roman citizens, had revolted to the Samuits, after the loss at Candium, and had received into their City a garrison of theirs. For when as the Roman army approached under the walls of Satricum, and that the citizens within (after Embassadors sent to treat by way of humble petition for peace) had received this hard and heavy answer from the Conful, That unless they would kill the garrison of the Sam-O nits, or deliver them into his hands, they should come no more again to him: the Coloners and inhabitants were more frighted and terrified with that speech, than at all the forcible attempts of their army. Whereupon the Embassadors followed their suit hard and continued still, demanding very often of the Conful how he could believe, that they being but few, feeble, and disarmed, should be able to force a garrison so strong and wel appointed, against their wills? being willed to ask counsel of them, by whose means they had received the said garrison into the Town, they de-

A parted their wives: and having hardly obtained leave & licence at his hands to confult with their Senate, and to bring answer, they return home again. Their Senate was divided into two factions. which diffracted and held them in tuben e that they could not foon relolve. The one confiffing of the chief personages and head men who had follicited them to revolt from the people of Romes the other of true hearted and loyal Citizens, Howbeit, both fides strove in the end and endeavored to labour the Conful for reconditiation of peace. The one part thought it sufficient (because the Samnits garrison having not provision enough aforehand to hold out the siege, was to depart the night following) to give notice to the Comul, what hour of the night through what gate the enemies would go forth, and which way they would take: the other, namely, against whole will R they were revolted to the Samnits the very fame night, opened another gate beildes to the Conful, and privily let their enemies armed into the City. So by a twofold complot of treaton, they were surprised unawares and all their throats cut not only the garrison of the Samnits (by realon that the woods all about the high way were laid for them and befet) but a fo at one initiant there was a shout and allarm raised by the enemies within the City, which was full of them and thus in the space of one hour both the Sammits were slain, the Satricans taken, and all they had in the world leited into the hands of the Conful: who after diligent inquifition by torture, Who were the principal authors of this revolt? whomsoever he found guitty, those he scourged and beheaded: and letting there a strong garrison he took from the Satricans all their armour, From thence Paprisus Curfor departed to Rome for to triumph (as they write, that fay, by his leading Luceria was recovered, and the Samnits put under the yoke.) And without question, a man he was worthy of all commendations of a warriour, surpassing not only in fortitude and courage of spirit, but also in force and natural strength of body and namely, for his good sootmanship : whereupon, he got his furname * Curfor. For in running (they fay) he had not his peer but went away wit n * An excelprick and prize before all other in those daies: and were it by reason of his bodily vigour and lent runner. strong constitution, or his much exercise, a stout and mighty eater he was, he drank as liberally to his meat, and could carry it as well. Never had foot or horse under any Captain more rough and harder service, for that himself was of so tough metall and seel to the very back (as they say) that he could abide any pains and travell whatfoever. His horsemen upon a time were so bold, as to request him in lieu of their good service in some exploit, to ease them a little of their ordinary n toil and labour: yes marry will I (quoth he) and that ye shall not complain that ye have no easement at all, I will ease you of this pains, That when ye alight from your horses, ye shall not need any more to firoke their shoulders, back and buttocks. He was a man besides for severity firaight, and of right great command, as well over his allies and confederates as his own Citizens. The Prætor of Preneste, for very fear chanced once to be somewhat behind, and slack in bringing forward the rereward, into the vangard and front of the battel: as he walked before his pavilion he commanded him to be called unto him: when he was come, he willed the fer jeant to bring forth his axe immediately: at which word when the Prenestin stood amazed and well near dead, Disspatch Lictor (quoth he) stock me up and grub this root that hindreth them that walk this way: and when he law him aftonied and his heart in his heels for fear of death, he fet a good round fine E upon his head, and so let him go. Doubtless in all that age (than which there was never any more fertile and fruitfull for vertue and valour) there was no one man, upon whom the state of Rome rested and relied more: Insomuch as men had destined, and in their minds appointed him to have matched and made head with Alexander the great, if after the conquest of Afia, he should have bent his power hither, and warred in Emope.

Albeit it may well appear that I have nothing less fought, ever fince I began this work, than A digression to digress and decline more than was needful, from the order and course of mine history, and by to a discourse extravagant garnishing and mingling my writings with variety of matters, both to feek for the of companison readers pleasant starts and diverticles to repose themselves, and for my self some ease and recreation between Alignment of the manufacture of the on of my spirits: yet the mention of so mighty a King and renowned Captain, maketh me to and the Re-Ethink upon, and to utter abroad the secret conceits and discourses, which often I have cast and mane, toffed in mymind : and which induce me now to fearch and examin willingly, what event would have hapned and befaln to the Romans, in case they had waged war with Alexander, First and formost, the things that feem to bear Iway and prevail in war; be these (to wit) fumber of fortdiers, valour, and courage withall, wir, infliciency and dexterity of their chief leaders, and fallly, fortune, which as in all other humane and worldly affairs beareth a great firoke, fo in war most of all. Which points, if a man confider either severally by themselves, or jointly altogether, do prove that the Roman Empire and government had flood as well against him as other princes and nations invincible. And first, to begin with comparing of the Captains themselves: I do not deny, but that Alexander was a noble and fingular warrior: and this maketh more for his fame and te-G nown that he was a fole commander of himfelf that he was a young man and fied in the growth of his prosperous affairs, before he had felt and tasted of adverse fortune. For to let pass other otherglorious Princes and brave captains, (the great mirrours and examples of humane changes and varieties of this world) what was is that exposed Cyrus, whom the Greeks commend and mag-

and those not all, nor in every age, wherein they flourished; but even them only with whom being either Confuls or Dictator, Alexander should have warred, if had be come: namely, M. V. loring nificabove all other, as also of late time, Pomper the great, to disfavor & the tuthing wheel offortune, but only this, that they lived long? Let me but rehearfe and reckon up the Roman captains;

Corvinus, C. Martius Rutilius, C. Sulpitius, T. Manlius Torquatus, Q. Publius Philo, L. l'apirius Cur-H for, Q. Fabius Maximus : the two Decis, L. Volumnius, M. Curius: Befides other brave men and valiant personages that followed after in case he had fought the Carthaginian were first (for if he had lived he meant to have warred there and then passed over into Italy, when he had been well stept in years. In every one of these there were the same good parts, the like towardness of nature as much forwardness of courage and spirit, as in Alexander, yea, and as good Military discipline, which even from the foundation of the City, passing from hand to hand, grew at length to the form and perfection of an Art, framed & compiled of continual rules and precepts, and confirmed by experiments. For so, after one course the Kings conducted their wars : even so, next unto them the banishers of the Kings, (to wit, the Junii and Valerii) so, consequently the Fabii, the Quintii, I and Cornelis: fo did Furius Camellus, whom those two Romans in their youth (Manlius Torquatus and Valerius Corvinus) with whom Alexander should have encountred, saw an aged man in the latter end of his daies, And whereas Alexander ventured his own proper person in battel, and per-formed all Military duties with other souldiers, (which was not the least part of his praise & glory) would Manlins Torquaius have given him one inch of ground, think ye, if he had met with him in skirmish equally matched ? or Valerius Corvinus either, both of them brave & stout souldiers before they were leaders and captains? Or would the Decii have given him place, who with devoted bodies to death, came among the thickest of their enemies into present danger? Would Papirius Curfor have given him way, a man of that incomparable strength of body, & invincible courage of heart? And(not to name every one particularly) would that Senat & Council have been over- K wrought with the stratagems & policies of that one young man? which, who loever he was that faid, it confissed and was composed altogether of Kings, was the only man that conceived & comprehended the true image and Idea of the Roman Senat, Mary, here was all the doubt (forfooth) left that he knew how to chuse out a convenient plot of ground to pitch a Camp in more wisely & cunningly than any one of those before named to make provision for victual to foresee & beware of ambushes, to pick out & take a meet time for to fight a battel, to set his battaillons in array, and to strengthen the same with sufficient succours & supplies from the reregard, Surely, he would have faid himself, that he had not now to deal with Darins, which Monarch carrying with time a train of dainty women, and tender Eunuchs, weakned and made effeminate with wearing purple and gold with all his rich furniture for shew and oftentation of his wealthy and superfluous for-I tune, Alexander without any bloudshed, with doing nought else, but knowing well how to contemn such toies and vanities conquered as a prey and booty rather than an enemy and warrior. He would have thought verily that thescituation and nature of Italy far differed from that of India; through which he marched at his ease with his drunken Army teasting and banquetting all the way; but specially, when he should have beheld the woody forrests and unpassable straights of Apulia, the high hils and mountains of Lucania, and the fresh marks and tokens of the loss that hapned in his own name and house, namely, where not long before his Lincle Alexander late King of Epirme milerably perished. Our talk all this while is of Alexander, not drowned yet with the overflow of prosperity; wherein no man had ever less rule of himself than he, Whom if we confider, as he was arraied in the habit and attire of his new fortune, and (if I may fo fay) of a new M nature, whereinto after his conquests and victories he was transfigured; surely he would have come into Italy more like a Darius than an Alexander, and brought a bastard army with him nothing at all resembling but quite forgetting their native country of Macedonie, degenerated already, and growing out of kind, into the manners and fashions of the Persians. It grieveth me, and I am ashamed, in so great a Monarch as he was, to report the proud changing and variety every while of his apparel, his excessive vain-glory and defire of being courted and crouched unto (as he was)in flattering manner, by men lying upon the earth groveling and profirat at his feet. Such abiect baseness should have been hardly endured of Macedonians conquered and subdued; much less than being conquerours as they were. Abashed I am to recount the foul and horrible torments & executions, the murders of his well deferving friends, even in the midft of his cups and N dainty viands: last of all, his vanity his over-weening, and forging to himself a divine race and pedigree from the gods. But what if his drunkenness and unmeasurable love of wine, were every day more than other? what if his fell anger and exceeding heat of choler increased daily? (for I report nothing, but that which all writers agree upon) reckon we not these infirmities for great blemishes, and wondrous hindrances, to the vertues and perfections of a warrior & general commander? But here is all the danger and fear (which some are wont to give out & alledge even the vainest persons of all other Greeks, who favour & magnifie the glory of the very Parthians in comparison of the Roman name) that the people of Rome had never been able to abide the very majefty and name of Alexander the great, (And I think verily, that even themselves that talk so much of him never heard the truth, fo much as by the brute and fame) and that against whom in Athens, O a City mightily decayed by war with the Macedonians, and even then, when as they might fee before their face the ruins of Thebes in manner smoking full in their eyes, the Orators durst freely make publike investives (which appeareth by the very records of their Orations now extant) against him: I say, not one of so many States and noble personages of Rome durst have opened his mouth and given one word again frankly and boldly. How much soever the grandent and greatness of this man may be conceived and imagined in the mind, all that shall be but one only manarising, growing, and come to his height with the felicity of little more than ten years.

A Which happiness of his, they that extol in this respect, that the people of Rome, although in no war they were subdued, yet in many battels had the foile and loft the day; whereas Alexander never fought field but he won the victory; little understand they, that compare the exploits of one person, and him a young man, with the the deeds and acts of a State, which had now warred eight hundred years. And can we marvell, it when on the one part there may be reckoned more ages than years on the other, that in fo long a time, fortune should vary more, than in the space of thirteen years? But why compare you not man with man, Captain with Captain, and lay their fortunes together? How many Roman Captains and Generals, in this case am I able to name. who never lost field? Ye may turn every leaf and page of the yearly annals of Magistrates, of n day-books and, journals of those Consuls and Dictators, whose valour and selicity the people of Rome had never caute to repent of and be discontented for, so much as one day. And that which maketh them more wonderful, and to be admired above Alexander or any other King in the world, some of them bare the Dictatorship but ten or twenty daies; and none the Consulship longer than a year. Their levies and musters now and then were letted and impeached by the Tribunes of the Commons. The due and best time for war otherwhiles overslipped them, and yet they went forth. Before their term expired, they were often called home for to be prefidents of the Magistrates Election. In the very midst and busiest time of their affairs, the year very often turned about. The inconfiderate rashness one while, and the peevish crookedness another while of a Collegue and companion in government was hindrance and harm both. They succeeded fundry times after the lois and overthrow of their predecessors, and received the army either of raw untrained fouldiers, or fuch as were in ill discipline trained up: whereas Kings and Monarchs contrariwife, not only freed and exempt from all inch obflacles and inconveniences, but also Lords and Masters, and of absolute command over their enterprises, over times and seasons fit for execution, give direction to others, draw all after them to their advice and counsel, and are themselves directed and over-mied by none, Say now, that Alexander were invincible, and dealt with these Captains as invincible as himself, he should likewise have hazarded as great pawns and favours of fortune as any of them; nay rather, he should have adventured and incurred more jeopardy; in that the Macedonians had but Alexander alone, a man not only subject but also exposing himself to many perillous chances : but many Romans there had been equal to Alexander, eitherfor glory D or greatness of their worthy deeds: who every one should have lived and died according to the fatal course of his own several destiny, without the hazard of the whole and main chance. It remaineth now that forces be compared with forces, and armies to armies, either in number, or in quality of fouldiers, or multitude of Allies, from whom they had their aids. There were effeemed by computation in the Taxing years, and Surveies taken by the Cenfors of that age, two hundred and fifty thousand polls Citizens of Rome. And therefore in all the revolts and rebellions of their allies the Latines, they were able to levy and entoll ten legions compleat of Roman Citizens well near and none elfe. And for many years oftentimes there were four and five armies employed at once, which maintained wars in Tufcan, in Hetruria, in Umbria, take also the Gauls with you their enemies likewise Lucania in Samnium. Besides all these, Alexander should have found all Latium r with the Sabins, Volicians, and Equians; all Campania, part of Umbria and Hetruria, with the Picentes the Marsians, Pelignians, Vestins, and Apulians, and all the coast adjoyning thereto of the Greeks, along the nether Tyrrhen fea, from the Thurians to Naples and Cumes, and from thence, the Samnits, as far as to Antium and Hostia. All these he should have met with, either mighty and puissant allies and friends to the Romans, or if they were enemies, vanquished and subdued by their arms. He should have passed the seas himself, having of o'd Macedonian bands, not above thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, and those, most of them Thessalians; for this was all his power. And in case he had joyned thereto, the Persians, Indians, and other such nations, he should have drawn along after him, more let and encumbrance, that help and succour by them. Take this over and besides, The Romans had fresh supplies alwaies ready and near at hand, at p home in the City: whereas Alexander his army (as afterwards it hapned to Annibal warring in a strange country) would have waxed old and decayed. They had for their armour and weapons, a shield or buckler, and a spear in manner of a pike. The Romans had a target of larger capacity to cover the whole body, and a javelin, being a weapon much better and more forcible than the pike, either to ftrike and push withall nearhand, or to be lanced a far off. The souldiers, I confess, both of the one fide and the other, stood their ground furely, kept their place and array still within their severall ranks. The Macedonian huge Phalanx moved not, was stedfast and alwaies after one fort: but the Romans battallon more diffinet, and confifting of many. parts easie both to divide and display, or to joyn and reunite upon any occasion. To speak now of painfull work and travell, what fouldier is comparable to the Poman? Who better able G to endure all forts of labour? Alexander by the loss but of one battell had been clean done, and hir war at an end forever. But the Romans, whose hearts, neither the shamefull difface at Candiam, nor the wofull deleat at Canna, could amate and dant; what power would have discouraged? What battell in the world would have broken their backs? Certainly, Alexander although he had properity and good success in his first beginnings and enterprises, would oftentimes here have missed his Persians and Indians, and defire with all his heart to have had dealing with them again, and other cowardly and dastard Nations of Asia: nay, he would have said, that he had warred before but with women, as Alexander, King of Epirm (by report) gave out, when he was wounded to death, conferring the easie occurrents of war which this young Prince H his nephew, met withall in Afia, with the difficulties of his own that he found here in Italy, And verily, when I call to mind and remember the conflicts and fights at fea, in the first Punick war, for the space of twenty four years, with the Carthaginians, I suppose the wholeage of Alexander would hardly have brought about and finished that one war, and against one of those two States. And peradventure, when both Carthaginians and Romans had been combined, either according to the ancient leagues, or for equall fear of a common enemy, and those two Cities most puissant both for men and munition, had taken arms at once against him, he would have been overwhelmed with the Punick and Roman war together, Moreover, the Romans have made good proof of the Macedonians as enemies, if not when they had Alexander to be their Captain, nor I whiles the Empire of Macedonie was at the best and stood upright unfoiled: yet tried them they have, and made head against them under the conduct of Antiochus, Philip, and Perfes: and it never cost them the lois and overthrow of their ownpart, no, nor so much as any appearance of danger at all. I would not be thought to speak a proud word, but be it said without arrogancy, and fetting all our civill wars afide; never were we diffressed, either by horse or foot, never in open field and battel ranged, never on even and plain ground, never in unequal places of difadvantage, were we endangered. The fouldier in heavy and compleat harnefs, I confels, may fear the Cavalry in the plains: may fear shot of arrows, cumbersome forrests and woods, straight gullets, and unpassable wilds, without waies forward or backward : but let there be a thousand armies greater and flronger than the Macedonians or Alexanders, so long as we hold together, and con- K tinue ftill in this love of peace and care of civill concord, wherein we live at this prefent, we are able and ever shall be to discomfit and put them all to flight.

After this, were M. Follins Flaccina, and L. Plantins Venox Confuls. The same year there came from fundry Nations of the Samnits Embassadors, to treat for the renewing of the league, and moved the Senat, most humbly kneeling prostrate upon the ground: but being put off and referred to the people, their prayers availed not to fuch effect: for as touching a league, they had a flar nay. And after they had for certain daies together importuned them one by one apart, with cap and congee : at length after much fuit, they obtained truce for two years. And out of Apulia the Theanenses and Canufins wearied with rodes and spoil made in their Territories, after they had put in hostages to Lucius Plantius the Consul, yielded themselves to his protection. The same L year first began Provosts to be created at Capua, to govern under certain laws given unto them by L. Furins the Pretor: after that themselves had made suit for the one and the other, as a remedy for their state, greatly decaied through civill discord. And at Rome were two more Tribes added to the rest, Ufentina, and Falerina. When Apulia began once to shrink and go backward, the Theatins, being also Apulians, presented themselves unto the new Consuls, C. Junius Bubulcus, and Q. Emplius Barbula, and fued to enter into a league with the Romans. And fince they were the men that led the way first, and by their example and perswasion induced all Applia to be in peace with the Romans, and had confidently undertaken, as fureties and pledges to bring it to pass, they obtained their request. Yet was not the league indifferent and formal, with equal conditions, but so, as they should be insubjection to the people of Rome. After that Apulia was M conquered (for Junius had won also Tarentum, a strong town and a rich) they marched forward against the Lucans. Then upon the sudden coming of Emylius the other Consul, Nerulum was by force taken. And after that it was noised abroad amongst the allies of the people of Rome, that the state and weal publike of Capua were established by Roman discipline and government; the Antiats also, who made moan and complained, that they lived without positive set laws and Magistrates, obtained of the Senate certain Advocats and Commissioners, to ordain Statutes likewisefor that Colony. So, that not only the Romanarms, but also their law and jurisdiction extended far and near, and was of great request, C. Junius Bubulous, and Q. Emplius Barbula Confuls, in the end of the year, delivered their Legions not to the Coff. by them created, Sp. Nautins, and M. Popilius, but configned them to L. Amylius the Dictator. Who with his General of N horse, L. Fulvius, began to lay siege to Satrucula, whereby he gave the Samnits occasion to rebell. Which brought upon the Romans a double fear two waies. For of the one fide the Samnits having affembled a mighty army, to deliver their allies from the fiege, pitched their Camp not far from the Romans leaguer: on the other fide, the Satricans fet open their gates suddenly, and with a great tumult brake into the wards and corps do guard of their enemies. And lo both parts, relying rather upon hope of succour and help ellewhere, than trusting upon their own strength, within a while began to charge the Romans in full battell, with banner displaied, and distressed them. And although the Dictator was assailed both waies, yet was he sure and fafe on either fide, because he had got a plot of ground, not easie to be compassed, and made head both against the one and the other, advancing his enfigns accordingly. Howbeit, O he charged more horly upon them that fallied forth, and without much ado beat them again within the wals. Then turned he the whole battell upon the Samnits. Where there was hard hold, and more to do. The victory, though long first, was neither doubtful nor variable. The Samnits being chased and driven into their Camp, having in the night put out all their fires, diflodged and departed privily away: and being past all hope of defending Satricula, they besieged Plilia, a town confederate to the Romans, to require their enemy with the like displeafure. The revolution of the year being gone about, the war continued under the conduct of Q.Fabius

A Q. Fabius Dictator: and the new Confuls, like as the former remained flill at Rome. And Fabius came before Satricula to receive the Army of Amplius, bringing with him a new supply to make up the broken bands: for the Samnits made no stay at Pliftia, but having levied and sent for fresh fouldiers from home, prefuming upon their great numbers, encamped in the very place where they ay afore: where by braving the Romans, and challenging them with many skirmifhes, they would have forced them to raise the siege. But the Dictator so much more earnestly bent his forces against the wals of the enemies, thinking it the best piece of service to assail the Town, as being of fuch importance to the relt of the war, which depended thereon: and was more carele is therefore of the Samnits, and only opposed against them certain guards both day and night, along R the trench and rampire, to keep them from making any affault upon the Camp, But the Samnits on the other fide, so much the more fiercely skirmished on horseback about the fortifications, and never gave them reft. Insomuch, as when the enemy now was at the point to enter the gates of the Camp, the General of the Horie, Q. Emylius Caretanus, without advice and direction of the Dictator riding forth in agreat noise with all his Cornets of Horie, repelled the enemy. But even in that light manner of skirmish, and no set battel of any long continuance, Fortune lo plaid her part, and shewed what she could do, that oneither side there be ell a notable loss, with the glorious death of both the Captains. For the General of the Samnits first taking it to heart, to see Emplius to fiercely ride and give the charge, and him elf to be difarrated and driven out of his place, with much intreating and exhorting his horsemen, renewed the fight. Against whom, as he C advanced himself, bravely to be seen amongst his men and sought most valiantly, the Roman General of the horse, with spear in rest, so galloped his horse, that with one push he unhorsed him and left him for dead: and yet for all this was not the whole troop befides (as commonly it is seen) at the fall of their Captain fo much amazed, as provoked rather to fight. For they that were about him charged Amylius hard as he rashly rode without heed, and engaged himself too far within the thickest of the squadrons of his enemies, and lanced their javelins at him: but they gave the special honour to the brother of the Samnits Captain to be revenged for his death. He, full of anger and forrow, plucked Emplius from his horse, and slew him in the place, even in the midft of his victory; and for that he fell among the troops of his enemies, he had like to have left his dead corps among the Samnits. But prefently the Romans alighn ted on foot, and the Samnits were forced to do the same: and thus being arranged inddenly in great haste into battallons, there began a cruell fight on foot about the bodies of the Captains. Wherein the Romans went clear away with the better, and having recovered the corps of Emplies, in great joy, intermingled with forrow, they returned winners into their Camp. The Samnits thus having lost their Captain, and sried their frength what they could do in fight on horie-back, left Satricula, which they supposed could not possibly be defended, and fo returned again to the fiege of Plistia. After few daies, Sarricula was surrendred by compofition to the Romans, and the Samnits by affault won Pliftia. Then changed they the feat town of the war. For out of Samnium and Apulia, the Legions were removed to Sord. This Sord. was revolted to the Sampits, and had flain all the inhabitants therein that were Romans, E Against which place, when the Romans were come first by great journies to revenge the loss of their Countrymen, and to recover the Colony, their espials and scours whom they had fent out dispersed along the high waies, brought word, that the Legions of the Samnits sollowed, yea, and one after another gave advertisement, that they were not far off. Hereupon they went forth to meet with the enemy, and near to a place called Laurale, there was fought a doubtfull and dangerous battel: for no flaughter it was, nor flight of either part, but the very night that parted them, and they knew not whether they had the better or the worse. In some Chronicles I find, that the Romans lost the day, and that there died in this battell Q. Emplus Generall of the horse. C. Fabius chosen in the room of Emplius, came with a new and fresh army from Rome, and having dispatched messengers before to the Dictator to know his advice, where p he should stay and rest, and what time, and which on side he should set upon the enemy: after he was well informed and inffrusted in all points what to do, he put himself close in ambush. The Dictator himself, who had for certain daies after the last skirmish, kept his souldiers within trench, more like one besieged, than besieging; all on a sudden, put forth the signal and token of battell: and thinking nothing more effectual to animate and kindle the courages of hardy men, than to know of no other help or hope, nor to trust upon any man but in themselves, he concealed from his fouldiers the coming of the General of Horle and his fresh forces; and as if there had been no other way but one, even to break forth and fally with violence: "We being The Oration "(quoth he) my fouldiers, pent here and taken tardy in their straights have no other issue but of @ Fabius "that which by victory we shall make open Our hold wherein we lie is fortified sure enough but Dictator to his G"the same for scarcity of all things notiome, irkiome, and hurtfull to us: for all parts hereabour Souldiers, " are revolted from whence we should have convoy of victuals: and were it that the people were "disposed to help us yet the advenues & passages are hard, and the place of our abode in commo-

At this speech of the Dictator, which shewed no other semblance but of extream necessity, the fouldiers took heart and were hot fet to march straight to the enemy. And the very fight of their tents burning behind them (albeit those only which flood next were set on fire, for so the Dictator had given commandment) was no small provocation and prick unto them. And therefore they gave a charge like mad men, and at the fifst push and brunt they brake the array of the enemies: and withall, in good time, the General of the horse, when he saw a far off the tents on fire I (for that was the figual agreed between them) came hastily upon the back of the enemies and aflailed them. So the Samnits being environed round about, made every man what shift he could to get forth and escape, and so fled. But the main multitude that were shuffled together all on a round heap, for fear, being an hinderance one to another in the prefs, was flain in the midft and cut in pieces, the enemies camp won, and ranfacked: with the pillage whereof the fouldiers were laden and the Dictator brought them back unto their own Camp: who were not so joyous for the victory, as for that they found (besides a little part thereof disfigured by fire) all the rest safe and found beyond their expectation.

From thence they returned to Sora, where the new Consuls M. Petilius and Caius Sulpitius took the Army at the hands of Fabius the Dictator: who dicharged many of the Old fouldiers, K and brought certain new cofforts for supply in their stead. But when by reason of the disficult and unaccessible sight of the Town, they knew not well which way, and by what means to make affault, and leeing that the winning of it would either ask long time, or be exposed to manifold and present dangers: a certain runaway-Traitor of Sora who was closely ftoln out of the Town, got to the Roman Sentinels, and required forthwith to be brought to the Confuls: who being presented before them, promised to betray the Town: and being questioned withall, how and by what means he would perform that winch he undertook, feemed unto them to alledge fome reasons to good purpose, and prevailed so far with them, that he caused the Roman Camp, which lay in a manner close under the wals, to be removed fix miles off the Town, saying, that thereby, the wards by day, and the watch by night would be neglected, and less careful and dili- L gent to keep the City. Himself the nightfollowing, after he had willed certain cohorts of footmen to lye in ambush within the woods near the Town, took with him ten elect and chosen fouldiers; and through fleep places, and fuch as were not well paffable, conducted them into the Castle, having brought thither moreshot and darts to throw than to serve so small a number of men; befides, there was good flore of flones at hand, which lay there, either feattering by chance (as commonly in such craggy and rocky ground) or else heaped together by the townsmen of purpole, for the better detence of the place. Where, after he had bestowed the Romans, and shewed them a narrow and seep path-way out of the town into the Castle, From getting up here (quoth he) there needs no more but three men only well armed to keep back the greatest multitude that is: ye are in number ten, and more than that, Romans; and of Romans the M most hardy and valiant: the place will stead you, I know, the darkness of the night will be for your purpose, the night, Isay, which by reason of uncertainties, maketh all things seem much more than they are to men affrighted and amazed already. I will for my part fet all in a hurly burly, look you in the mean time that you duly keep the fortress. This said he runs down with as great a noise and shouting as he could, crying, Alarm, help, help Citizens, the Castle is taken by the enemy, come away to defence. These words he resounded ever as he rapped at the gates of the principal Citizens and Noblemen: these words he redoubled aloud to all that he mer, and to as many as ran forth affrighted into the streets. This fearful alarm received from one man, was fet aroad by many more allower the City. The Magistrates quaking for fear, fent certain to the Castle in cipial to discover the truth: and advertised by them that the Castle N was imprized indeed by armed men, and full of armor (for they made the number, and every thing elfe, more than it was) were clean put out of all hope to recover their Fortreis. So every where they fell to running away: the gates were broken open by them that were not well awake, and those most part unarmed. At one of thegates, those companies of the Romans aforesaid, who lay in ambush, and were raised with the noise and clamour, brake in, and killed all that in this fright ran headlong in their way. Thus was Sora won against the Confuls should come in the morning betimes by break of day: and look whole fortune it was to scape out of the massacre made in the night, and to flie away those they took to mercy upon submission: whereof two hundred twenty five, even those who by the general voice of all were pointed at, and reputed above the rest the principal actors in that horrid massacre abovesaid, of the Roman Coloners, inhabi-O tants, and the authors of therevolt they had away with them to Rome, bound hand and foot. The other multitude they left at Sorafafe and unhurt, and planted there a garrison. All they that were brought to Rome were in the market-place (courged with rods, and beheaded, with the exceeding joy and contentment of all the Commons, whom it concerned most, that the multitude which should be sent into fundry Colonies might in every place live in safety and security of their

A Territories of the Aufonians; for the coming of the Samulus after the battel of Lamulas the were all our full of injurrections and commotions, and many confpiracies there were in all places about Campania: neither was Capua it felf without blame and faultlels, Nay this matter paffedas far as to Rome, where information was made against some of the Nobles, and warning given to enquire into them. But the whole nation of the Aufonians by reason that the Cities were betraved like as Sora, was reduced under obedience to the people of Rome. Aufonia, Mintuina and Vefling were the Cities, out of which twelve of the chief young Gentlemenhaving conspired and A conspiracy fina were the Cities, out of which twelve of the tine young centrementaring complete and fworn together to berray their own Cities, prefented themselves unto the Consuls, giving them mans, to understand, "That their countrymen wished long ago for the coming of the Samnits, and so

B" foon as they heard of the battel before Lantula, made account that the Romans were utterly " vanquished, and helped the Samnies both with men and munition. But now, tay they, that the "Samnits were chaled from thence, they lived unrelowee indoubtfull terms of peace, and thuc on not their gates in dread upon the Romans, for fear of bringing war upon themselves, yet obsti-" natly bent to that them if their Army approached toward them. In this wavering and doubt-"ful floating of their minds, they might at unawares be juddenly surprised. By this perswasion of theirs they encamped nearer, and at one and the felf-same time were fouldiers sent about those three towns before named, fome in armor clotely to lie in ambush in convenient places near the wals : others in fide gowns with twords under them, who a little before day, fo foon as the gates were fet open should enter into those Cities. By whom the matter was so handled, that at one C instant they began to kill the warders at the gates; and gave a fignal to those armed souldiers who lay in ambush, for to rise at once and come to succour. Thus were the gates seized and possessed. and three towns in one hour by the same stratagem surprized. But because this exploit was performed in the absence of the Captains, there was no stay in execution and slaughter, but beyond all measure, and without all mercy, no sex nor age was spared; and so the whole nation of the Aufones, before they were detected for certain of revolt, was destroyed and estinguished, as if they had warred mortally and been at deadly feud.

The same year Luceria came into the hands of the Samnits, by reason that the City had betrayed and delivered the Roman garrison to them; but the traitors went not long unpunished for it. The Roman Army chanced to be not far from thence, and at the first assault, the City standing as Dit did on a plain was won. The Lucerins and Samnits both were put to the word every one: and to far forth proceeded their furious rage, that when the Senat fate in council at Rome, about fending men to inhabit Luceria, many were of mind, that the City it felf should be rased to the ground and destroyed: for besides the cursed and execrable hatred they bare against them being twice conquered and revolted: the diffance also of the place so remote, caused them to millike greatly, and abhor the confining, as it were, of their Citizens, fofar from home, to live amongst fuch a kind of people focruel and dangerous. Howbeit, their opinion took place and prevailed; who gave advice, that Coloners and inhabitants should thither be sent, and to the number of 2500 were there planted. The lame year when as the Romans found all unloyal unto them, and nothing but falshood p on all fides; at Capua also certain secret conspiracies of the Nobles and best of the City were detested and revealed. Touching which, the Senats advice was asked, and the matter not neglected by them, but Commissions were appointed and thought good it was that a Dictator should be nominated for to fit upon the same commissions and inquisitions. And C. Manius was created, who named M. Fellius General of the Horie. Great was the terror of that Magistrate, and thereupon either for fear, or guiltiness of conscience, the two Calavii, Ovius and Novius, who were the chief of that complot, before information was given against them by name to the Dictator died: & questionless by their own hands shortned their daies, and so avoided the triall of justice and punishment accordingly. After that, when the Inquisition wanted subject matter once about the Capuans, the Inquisitors (by interpretation of words in the Commission) proceeded to Rome, laying, It that the Senat had good warrant to make enquiry and fraight fearth, not by name and precisely, who at Capua only; but generally, who in any place what soever had used conventicles, and conspired against the Common-wealth: and all secret meetings, say they, and packings together, for to get Dignities and Offices, were directly against the State and Common-wealth: 10 that the Commission extended larger both for person and real action. Yea, and the Dictator himself nothing gainfaid, but that the vertue of his Commission was directed without limitation. Hereupon were certain Gentlemen of the Nobility brought into question: and not with standing they called upon the Tribunes for to affilt them, with interpoling their negative, yet there was not one of them would fuccour and relieve them, the prefentment was taken against them, and they indited. Then the Nobility, I mean not them alone who were in trouble, but generally the whole G Gentry of the City, at once, pleaded, That they were not the natural and true Noblemen infeed, who were to be touched and charged with this crime: who if it were not for finisher and indirect courses, had easie and open succeis unto all honourable places and promotions; but certain new upstarts and Gentlemen of the first head: faying, That it was the very case of the Distator himself, and his General of Horse, who were rather parties guilty, and offenders them elves, than sufficient Inquisitors, and competent Judges: and that should they well know and understand, when they were once out of their place and office. This made Maniss to bestir himself, who mindful rather of his good name and reputation, than respective of his high place and absolute government, went up into the common place of audience before all the people, and ipake H to this effect: "My Mafters and friends all, Citizens of Rome, well affured I am, that privy ye are "to the whole carriage and course of my former life; and besides that, even this very honour " and dignity which you have bestowed upon me, is able to testifie and approve mine innocencie. "For, to fit upon these inquisitions, there was not to be chosen now for Dictator (as oftentimes " heretofore, according to the dangerous occasions and necessity of the time) a man reputed "the best and most noblest warrior of, all other; but such a one, as throughout his wholelife " hath most of all missisked and condemned ambitious conventicles. Howbeit, foralmuch as certain persons of noble lininge, (for what cause, it is more meet for you to deem and judge, than for me being a Magistrate, to speak without book, as they say, and upon no sureground) first have en-I deavoured with all their might and main to overthrow the process of the inquisition it fell; and afterwards, seeing they were not able themselves to bring that about (notwithstanding they were Patritii) have fled to the holds of their very advertaries, even the protection of the Tribunes and their negative, rather than to justifie themselves and stand to the triall of their cause: and at last having there also a repulse (thinking all means safer than to approve their innocencie) have saln upon us, and bashed not (privat men as they are) to accuse and touch the person of him that is Distator: to the end therefore, that both God and man and all the world may know, that as they have affilied to compass that which they are not able to bring to pass, namely, to avoid the rendring an account of their life and demeanor; fo, I am ready (to fet forward their accusations) to offer my felf unto mine adversaries; and giving them means to call me to mine answer, here K I refign up my Distarorship. And I beseech you O Consuls, if so be this charge be laid on you by the Senat, to proceed in examination against me first, and this Gentleman the General of Horse M. Fellius: that it may appear, how we, through our own innocency alone, and not by the countenance and priviledge of our dignity and high calling, are protected and fafe from their flanders and intended crimes. Herewith he gave over his place of Dictator: and after him incontinently, M. Fellim yielded up his room likewise of General over the florse. These persons were the first, who being charged and put to their trial judicially before the Consuls, (for to them by order from the Senat, was the commission directed) notwithstanding all the depositions and testimonies of the Parnii, were in every point found unguilty, and acquit. P. Philo also, albeit he had so many times attained to the supream dignities of state, after he had atchieved so many wor- L thy deeds, as well in peace as war, yet a man maliced or envied rather of the Nobility, was put to plead for himself, and finally absolved. But this inquiry into such men of name and quality, lasted no longer in force, (as it is usually seen) than whiles it was fresh, and in the first heat theref From them it beganto fall to perions of less reckoning and baser account, untill such time, as by the same conventicles and sactions, against which it was devised, it sell to the ground, and was troden underfoot.

The bruit of these things, and more than that the hope of the Campains revolt, whereto certain had conspired and sworn (as ye have heard) recalled the Samnits back again to Caudium, who were turned and bent wholly into Apulia: that from thence, being so near at hand unto Capua, they might (it haply any infurrection and trouble presented the overture and opportunity) seize M upon it and take it perforce from the Romans. Thither came the Confuls with a strong and mighty army: and at the first they staied and lingred about the passes and straights, having on the one fide and the other an ill way of passage unto the enemies. Afterwards the Samnits fetching a short compass about, came down with their army through the open places into the plains, I mean, the champain country and fields about Capua. And that was the first time that the enemies had a fight one of the others Camp. Whereapon by light skirmishes, on horseback oftner than on foot, they tried masteries on either side: neither were the Romans one jot discontented with the issue and event thereof, nor repented of the delay whereby they drew the waralength, Contrariwife, the Samnit Captains perceived their forces to wear daily by small losses, and their courage to cool and decay evidently by that lingring war. Wherenpon, they came abroad N into the field and divided their Cavalry into wings: with a special charge, to have a more careful eye backward toward their camp(for lear of any impression and assault that way) than to the main battel: which would be guarded fafe enough by the Infantry. The Coss, marshalled themselves in this manner Sulpirius led the right point of the battel, and Petilius the left : the right fide (whereas the Samnits also were arranged in thinner ranks and files, of purpole to compals and environ the enemies, or not to be compafied and enclosed themselves) shewed it self more abroad and open. They on the left hand, befides that they flood thicker and more close, were by occasion of a judden policy of Petilius the Col, farther frengthped: For those cohorts and bands which were referved apart in the rereward, for help at any need; and kept fresh against all occurrents and hazards of long fight, he advanced prefently to the forefront in the vangurd, and with all his forces at O once charged the enemy at the first encounter & forced him to retreat. When the footmen of the Summits were thereby troubled and disarraied, the hortemen followed close and entred into the skirmish. But as they rode cross and overthwart between the two hosts, the Roman horsemen pricked and galloped their hories to flank them; and difordred and troubled the enfigns, cornets, squadrons and troops of foot and horses pell-mell together, until he had caused the whole battel of that fide, to turn their backs. In this left point not Perilius alone, but Sulpitius also joyned with him, and was present in person to exhort and encourage the souldiers: for he had transported and

A distracted himself from his own men, who as yet were not come to joyn battel at the cry & shout that arose from the left fide: and seeing on that part undoubted victory, he went towards his own charge accompanied with 12co men: Where he found a change of fortune, namely, the Romans to have retreated and lost ground, and the enemy as victor, advancing forward his enfigns upon them fore diffusid and daunted Howbeit, the Conful his coming made a prefent alteration: for both at the fight of their Captain were the fouldiers hearts refreshed and comforted; and for to aid them, there came a greater supply indeed, than in shew of number, of tall and justy men. So when they heard first, and saw ioon after, the victory got of the other part, they renewed the fight. After this on all fides the Romans had the better hand, and the Samnits giving over fight, B were either flain or taken prisoners: faving only those, who fled to Maleventum a town now named Beneventum. It is left in record that there were upon 20000 Samnits either left killed in the place or brought away captive.

to lay free unto Bovianum: and there wintred before the Town, untill fuch time as C. Perilius (cholen Dictator together with M. Fellins his General of the Horse, by the new Consuls L. Papyrius Curfor the fifth time, and C. Jun, Bubulous the second time) received the Army at their hands, Who hearing, that the Castle of Fregella was by the Samnits taken, left Bovianum, and went forward to Fregella; which he recovered again without drawing his tword; for that the enemies had quit the place, and were fled by night: and when he had placed a flrong garrison there he returned from thence into Campania, of special purpole to regain Nola by force of arms. Thither were retired within the wals, a little before the Dictator his coming, both all the wholemultitude of the Samnits, and the ruftical peafants about Nola. The Dictator having viewed the icituation of the Town, to the end he might have the more open access to the wals, let all the houses on fire that were in the subburbs along the counterscarpe (and there they flood thick and were well inhabited.) And not long after, whether it were by Petiling Dictator (Iknow not) or C. Tuning Conful (for it is reported as well of the one as the other) Note was forced and won. They that would draw unto the Conful the honour of winning Nola, add moreover and fay. That he won also Atina and Calatia: and that Petilius upon a pestilence that began, was made Dictator, for the fetting or fasting of a spike or great nail. Two Colonies that year were conducted to Su-Deffa and Pontia, Sueffa belonged to the Aurunci. The Volicians inhabited the Island Pontia fituat over against their own shore within a kenning. And a decree passed from the Senat, that to Cassinum alfo, a third Colony there should be sent inhabitants. M. Valerius and P. Decius, the Consuls that next succeeded, ordained three Triumvirs, for that purpose, and sent four thousand to people

The war with the Samnits was in a manner now dispatched and brought to an end: but before that the Nobles and Senators of Rome had left the care thereof a brute was blown of the Tuscans war. And there was in those daies another nation (setting the Gauls rumults aside) whose forces and hostility they more feared; for that their country was so near a neighbour and so populous withall. Therefore, whiles one of the Confuls was occupied in dispatching the reliques of the E war in Samnium, P. Decius who staid at Rome grievously fick, by authority of the Senat, named Dictator C. Junius Bubulcus. He according as the important affairs required, caused all the younger fort to take the military oath, and prest them for souldiers. Armor, and what soever requisite befides, with great diligence he prepared. And albeit he were thus firmifhed and well apointed yet was he nothing bold and forward to begin war, willing (no doubt) to be quiet and fland upon his guard, unless the Tuicans shewed themselves first in arms. The same purpose had the Tuicans alto both in preparing for war, and in making stay to begin war. So, of neither side they departed

· out of their own limits. In that year was there a famous Cenforship of App. * Claudius, and C. Plautius. But the name . Surnamed of Appins became more memorable of the twain, and of happier renown unto posterity, for that Cacus, that is, F he paved with stone the causey or * Port-way (bearing his name) and conveyed a channel of * wa- Blifon or Blind. ter into the City of Rome. Which works he finished alone for that his Collegue for shame of an Out of the infamous and odious choice of certain Senators which he made gave over the office. But Appiriver Anio, and ms having the flour flomack, engraffed in his name and house from the beginning bare the Centor- was called, thin alone. By the motion and means of the same Appins, the Potitis, to whole samily properly Aqua claudies belonged the Prieftly service, at the altar of Heroules called Maxima, had taught certain publike fervants (for that the function might be committed over to them as delegats) the folemn rites and ceremonies of that facred ministry. Hereupon is reported a wonder to be spoken, and that which might strike a scruple of conscience, and make men afraid ever after, to alter any thing in religion from the former state and first institution. For whereas at the same time there were twelve hou-Gles of the Potitii, and in them about thirty that were above fourteen years of age; within one year it is faid, that they died all, with their whole iffue and off-fpring, Moreover, that not only the name of the Poririi became thus extinct, but that Appius also the Centor, within certain years (such was theire of the gods, mindfull of revenge) fell (tark blind, Therefore the Confuls that followed in the next year, C Junius Bubulcus the third time, and Q. Emylius Barbala the fecond time in the very entrance of their office framed a complaint unto the people: That by the leud and corrupt Election of some new Senators that honourable state and order was deformed, and namely, how fome were over-flipt, who were of more worth than those that were taken in : And saying plainly,

That they would not observe and have in any regard such a choice, which without respect of the good and bad was made for favour and affection to some, and at the pleasure of the Centors; and immediatly they cited the Senat by name in that order and form, as had been used before the Cenfors, App. Claudius and C. Planting.

* A Legion confifted now of 4000 foot ment : howfor ver at other times of 2000. 5000,yea,and 6000 and the Colonels fewer or more in 4 legion, according to the quantity therof. There belonged besides to every legion ordinarily 300 horfe.

the Tribunes

And in that year were two places of charge and command, first given by the people, both pertaining to warfare: the one, that fixteen Colonels for four * Legions, should from that time forward by the people be created, which before were in a manner the gifts and favours conferred by the Distators and Consuls; and sew or none of the people had any hand or voice therein. This Act and Ordinance was propounded by L. Petilius and C. Martius, Tribunes of the Commons. The other was, That the same people should have the appointment and ordaining of two Duum-1 virs at lea, for the rigging, repairing, and trimming of the Navy. The maker of this Act was M. Decius, another Tribune of the Commons.

I would let pais one thing that hapmed this year, as of small weight and importance, and not worth the speaking, but that it seemed a matter pertinent to religion. The minstrels that plaied upon the flute and hautboies, for that they were prohibited and debarred by the last Censors, to have their good chear any more in the Temple of Jupiter, according to an old custome and tradition, took fouff thereat, and in a pelting chafe all in one company went their waies to Tybur: fo. as there was not one of them in the City left to fing and pipe before the pomp of facrifices, and on their feastival daies. The Senat made some conscience hereof, and were troubled in their mind. Whereuponthey dispatched certain messengers to Tybur, to travel with the townsmen, and en- K deavour all they could, that these good fellows might be restored and sent home again to the Romans. The Tyburtins undertook the matter, and promifed right courteoully to do their beft: and or Colonels afirst they sent for these musicians into their Town-Hall, and perswaded with them to return again nothing to do, to Rome: but when they could not be brought to that, for any thing they could do, then they wrought another policy and feat with them, that forced and fitted well the humour of such kind of people and of their coat. Upon a feltival holyday, under a colour of making merry with minfirelie and munck about them, some invited one, and some another, to give them a fit of mirth accordingly. But they plied them so with wine (which all the fort of this profession love but too well) that they drank untill they winked, and winked so long, till they fell fast asleep. And being found afleep, the Tyburtins brought them gently to their beds in certain waggons, and thus be- I. flowed, conveyed them to Rome. Neither perceived they ought, senseless drunken forts they, before that their wagons were left in the market place of Rome. Nay, before they had flept out and concocted their wine that steamed up into their heads, and clouded there, the day-light cameupon them, and then they awoke. The people came running together from all parts to them, and after they had either got at their hands, or charged them to stay, and make no more such frolicks, it was granted unto them, that three daies every year, being disguised and dressed in a mask for the purpose, they might range and walk about the City, with singing, and sounding their instruments, after this licentious manner and jollity, which now adaies is yearly used, and their priviledge of eating in the temple was reflored to them again, namely, to fuch as fung and plaied in time of their divine fervice and facrifices: and all was well. This ridiculous pageant hapned amidft the care M and preparation of two great and dangerous wars.

The Consuls parted their Provinces between them : To Junius fell by lot the Samnits, to Emylius the new war in Hetruria. In Samnium, Cluvia, a fortress and hold of the Romans being impregnable by an affault, was a long time befieged; and forced by extream famine, was delivered up to the Samnits. After they were once Mafters of thefort, they took thegarrifon fouldiers, and notwithstanding they yeelded themselves, yet they whipped and taretheir flesh most beastly, and in the end, without all mercy killed them. Junius exceeding wroth at this crueky, thinking nothing more needful to be donefirst, than the winning again of Clavia; laid all other matters afide, and the same day that he assailed the wals, took it by force, and slew all he could find above fourteen years of age. In this train of victory the Army was brought against Bevianum. This was N the chief place of the Pentrians in Samnium, the wealthiest City, the best provided, and most furnished of all other with men and munition. The souldiers very eager and sharp set for hope of a rich pillage, won the Town. But for that they were nothing to angry and hot of revenge as before, they dealt not so cruelly with the enemies: but they got together and carried away more spoil and saccage from thence than they ever had well near out of all Samnium; and as liberally was it bestowed every whit upon the fouldiers. And foralmuch as no pitched battel in plain field, no Camp fo well fortified, no Cities and Forts, howfoever fenced, were able to withstand the pulssant Romans in force of open arms: all the Princes in Samnium studied and applied their wits to find means of fleight and subtill policy; it haply, as they wasted and forraged the Territories after a loose and licentious manner, the Army disbanded once, might be entrapped and enclosed O within some ambush. It fell out so, that certain sugitive peasants of the Country, and Captives, fome by chance, and other of purpose, coming in their way, made relation of tidings to the Confuls, well agreeing all in one tale, and the same sounding of a truth indeed a namely, that a great fort of sheep and other cattel were driven together into a by-forrest out of the way: and so induced them to lead thither the Legions lightly armed, and to fit their hands with a fat booty. Now the Samnits had privily forelaid all the high waies with a mighty army, and after that they faw the Romans to have entred & engaged themselves within the chase or forcest aforesaid, all of a get glory to himself by any enterprise, but only a booty for his souldiers: and that no fault else "could be imputed unto him but an overmuch defire and affection of his to enrich his fouldiers "by the spoil of the enemy. From which blame and shame both, nothing could free and acquit "him elfe, but the manhood and prowefs of his fouldiers: exhorting them with one accord but "tottay themselves and endeavour all together to let upon their enemy, defeated and vanquished "in battel, driven out of Camp and field, bereaved of his Towns and throng holds, and come now "to attempt his last and utmost hope of privy and theevish trains of forlaying, trusting upon the " vantage of the ground, and not pure force of arms. But what place is there now unaccessible or " unpregnable to the valiant Romans? Herewithall he named the Castle of Fregella and Sora, and "what place of disvantage and hard accels soever, they had won by force. With these words the C fouldiers encouraged and enflamed, forgetting all difficulties and dangers, matched apace and advanced forward up to the army of the enemies that now approached them, and were over their heads. Where the Romans found some difficulty all the while they climed up the cliff or ridge of the hill against them. But after that the formost entigns were mounted up and had gained the plain in the top, and perceived they were embattelled upon an even and equall ground, prefently the terror turned upon those that lay in wait for them, & being disbanded, scattered, and driven to fling away their weapons, they fled and trudged as fast as they could to recover again those starting and lurking holes, wherein before they had hid themselves. But even those difficult places which they had fought of purpose for their enemy, and their own deceit and guile, encumbred themfelves. For very few of them could find the way out, and escape by flight, Insomuch as to the number of 20000 were flain. And then the Romans after this victory ran up and down at their plea-

A fudden they rose up and with a great cry and shout ran upon them to charge them when they least thought of any such thing. At the first this so strangeand unexpected occurrence made them afraid, while they took them to their weapons, and laid their fardels and baggage together on a heap in the midft. But after that every man was eated of his load, and had put on his armor, they railied on all fides to their entions; and without the commandment or direction of any man, they of themselves put the battel in array, each one knowing his ranke and place according to the accultomed order of the ancient Military discipline. The Conful perceiving that he was brought to a most doubtful and dangerous battel, alight from his horse; and protested before Tapiter and Junius the Mars, and the other gods whom he cailed all to witness: "That he came not into that place to fouldiers.

Whiles these things thus went in Samnium, all the people of Hetruria by this time, but only the Aretins, were up in arms, and entred into a right great war; beginning first with the siege and affault of Sutrium: which City being allied to the Romans, was (as a man would fay) the very Barriers of all Herruria. Thither came the other Conful Emplius with an army to refeue and deliver their allies, and to raile the fiege. Against the Romans coming, the Sutrins curteously brought victuals for the Camp, lying before the City. The Euscans spent the first day in consulting whether they should make a short war of it, by hot assaults, or temporise and protract the time by r lingting fiege. The morrow after, when as the Captains liked rather of expedition and hafty courfes than of more tage and tafe proceedings, at the fun rifing they fet out a flag of defiance and the fignal of battel, and armed they go forth of their Camp into the open field to fight, Which after it was told the Conful, prefently he commanded a watch-word to begiven, that the fouldiers should take their breakfast: and after they had refreshed and strengthned their bodies with food, go straight to arm themselves: which was obeyed accordingly. The Consul seeing them well appointed in readiness, commanded the entigns to advance forward out of the rampier, and not far from the enemy marshalled his battels. For a good while they stood on both sides, wistly looking, and waiting that the shout and charge should begin from the adverse part. But it was past noon before there was one dart flung or javelin lanced either from the one fide or the other. But r then, because they should not go away without doing somewhat, the Tuscans began to set up a cry, the trumpets found the charge, and the standards came forward. Neither were the Romans any jot behind to begin battell: Thus they ran to it, and encountred with exceeding animofity and fury; the enemies more in number, the Romans better in hardine's and vertue. The fight was doubtful, and dangerous, and cost the life of many a man on both sides, and namely, those that were most forward and valiant: neither began they to shrink on any parc, before that the second battaillon of the Romans, fresh and lusty; advanced to the forefront of the vangard, into the place of their wearied fellows. The Tuicans, for that their vangard was not supplied and reenforced by any new inccours, both before and all about their enfigns were beaten down and flain every man. Never in any one battel had there been less running away, or more bloudshed, if the night had G not protested the Tuicans: fo resolute were they all to die in the place: insomuch as the winners gave over play before the losers. After the sun set, the retreat was sounded and by night both parts returned into the Camp. After this, no exploit was performed before Sutrium that year, worth remembrance : both for that, the foreward of the enemies army, was wholly in that one battell defeated and destroyed; and they had none left but the Subfidiary fouldiers of the rereward, and thole hardly able and sufficient to guard and defend the Camp: and also, the Romans were so hurt and sore wounded, that there were more of them died after the battell of their hurts than were flain in the very skirmish outright. ed and entred upon this war at Surium. And for his collegue he had C. Martius Ruthlus: and H like as Fabius brought a new supply from Rome to furnish out the broken bands, so there came fresh forces also unto the Tuscans, levied at home. For many years there had been no jars and debates between the Magistrates of the Nobility and the Tribunes of the Commons: but now there began a variance and contention out of that family and house, which even then was fatall, (as it were) and born to do mischiefto the Tribunes and Commons both. Appius Claudius the Cenfor, after eighteen months expired (which by the law Emilia was the full term of bearing that Magistracy) notwithstanding that C. Planius his Collegue had given up his office; could by no means possible beforced himself to go out and give over the place. Then role up one P. Sempronius, a Tribune of the Commons, who took in hand I this matter as touching the demission of the Cenforship, within the time prefixed by the law: an action doubtleis, not more popular than just and rightfull, nor less acceptable to the better fort. than pleasing to the very Commons and base people. He having frequently rehearsed and reiterated the law Emilia, extolled with praises up to the sky, the author and maker thereof, M.. mercus Emylius a Dictator; who had reduced the Centorship, an office aforetime of five years continuance (a puissance and authority, which by the length thereof savoured of Lordship) within the compals of a year and fix months. "Come on, quoth he, Appius (Laudius, answer and fay, "what you would have done in case you had been Censor, when C. Furius, and M. Giganius were "Cenfors? App us answered and faid, that this demand and question of the Tribune did not greatly touch or concern his cause. For put the case, that the law Amylia had obliged those Cen- K fors, during whose Magistracy the Act was made, (for that after those Cersors created, the people had granted that law, and look what they last allowed and ordained the same was good, lawfull, and ratified) yet neither he nor any of them, who after that law enacted were created Cenfors, could be bound by vertue of that law. Whiles Appias thus cavilled, and no man there prefent foothed him up, or gave applause and affent unto him: "Behold Quirites, quoth Sempronius, "again, the progeny and race of that Appins, who being created Decemvir for one year, elected "himself the second year: and in the third, being chosen neither by himself, nor by any other in " quality of a private person, held the soveraign dignity and government, with all the regall marks "and enfigns thereof: and thus continuing still in rule and dominion, would never give over. "before that his usurped governments of his ill-gotten, badly born, and naughtily kept and re- L "tained, were his finall fall and utter overthrow. This is the same family and house, (my Masters "and friends, Citizens of Rome) by whole violence, by whole wrongs and oppression, ye were "driven like poor banished persons to forgo your own deer native country, and to seize and "hold the Mount S. cr; the very fame, against which ye procured and purchased to your selves "the support and help of Tribunes; the same, for which with two armies ye were fain to possess " vour selves of the Aventine hill; the same that alwaies withstood the Statutes devised against "Usury; the same that ever impugned the laws for division of wast lands among the people; the "fame brake for the time, and interrupted the matriages betweenthe Nobles and Commons; " the same kept out the Commons so long from bearing any dignities of the Chair, and of State: "finally, this name is much more (pightfully and mortally bent against your freedom, than that M " of the Tarquins. And is it so indeed, O App. Claudius? Would you have us believe, that be-"ing now an hundred years fince Mamerous Emylius was Dictator, there have been fo many "Cenfors most noble and valiant personages, that none of them all ever read the twelve Tables? "and none of them knew that to belaw which the people last granted and allowed? Yes Iwis, "they all wish that well enough: and thereupon yielded they, and obeyed rather the law Emilia "than the old and ancient Statute, (whereby the first Centors were created in the Common-" wealth) even because the people approved it last: and by reason that there are two ordinances " repugnant and contrary one to the other, there the new alwaies repealeth and abrogateth the "old. And is this your faying, O Appius? That the people are not bound to the law Emiliator ra-"ther that they are tied unto it, but your good self alone is free and exempt therefrom? Was the N " law Emplia able to bridle and curb those violent Censors C. Furins, & M. Emplius "the worthiest and most excellent personage of his time, both at home in peace, and abroad in "war? This law took hold of all the Cenfors, one after another in order, for the space of anhun-"dred years after; and bindeth now C. In that " Lustram or five years space was the City of Rome taken by the Gauls, wherein L. P. prius " Curfor, because he might not go out of his Censorship, took a Collegue unto him, M. Cornelius "Maluginensis, in the place of C. Julius the Censor late deceased. And yet see how much more "fober and moderate was his ambitious humour in that behalf, than this of yours, O Appins, "For L. All "Cenfors from that time forward, upon the death of their fellow Cenfor gave up the office. But "as for you, notwithstanding that the date of your Censorship be fully out, and your compani-"on in government departed out of the place; neither law nor shame, is able to rule and re-"frain. You suppose that vertue consisteth in pride, in audacious boldness, in contempt both of "God and man. For mine own part truly, O Ap. Claudius, for the reverence and majefty of this "honourable place, which you have born, I would not willingly enter into any such hard cour-"fes, as to touch your person by violence of hand; no, nor so much as to offend your name with "any foul or unkind language. But as these words that have already passed, your own prevish and "perverse frowardness, your opinionative contumacy, and insolent pride, having wrung and for-E " ced from me : so unleis you will obey the law Emplea, by your leave, I will be so bold as com-"mand you to ward and prison, And since our forefathers and ancestors have so provided and or-"dained, that in the Eledion of Cenfors, ifeither of the twain come short of sufficient voices re-" quifite forto choose him the other cannot be admitted and declared Gensor; and so they must " proceed again to a new election, and the former Scrutinies are of no effect : shall I suffer you to "exercise the Censorship alone, who may not lawfully be created alone? These and such like remonstrances after he had alledged, he commanded the Censor to be attached and committed. In these proceedings of his, fix of his fellow Tribunes adhered unto him, and three only affilted Appins; who called instantly upon them for their protection and lawfull fuccour: and so with excesding ill will, and highest discontentment of allstates and degrees, he went clear away, and bare F the Centorthip alone. These matters thus passed at Rome, and Sutrium was besieged still by the Tuscans: and asthe

Conf. Fabius was leading about at the foot of the hils, certain forces to fuccour his allies. & to affail the fortifications of the enemies what way he could, they with an army in battel array men with him. Whose great multitude when he might discover upon the plains underneath, because he would help out the small number of his men by some advantage of the ground, he wheeled a little about up toward the hill tops (which were rough and craggy places fired all over with Rones) and from thence he turned his banners full upon the face of the enemies. The Tuscans fogetting all things, and thinking upon nothing but their multitude, whereof only they prefumed; gave battell to hastily and in such greediness, that casting away their shots and darts from them, to G the end they might the sooner come to hand-strokes, they drew their swords, as they marched against the enemy. The Romans on the contrary sidelaid load with shot, and applied them one while with darts, another while with stones which the place plenteously afforded them. Which, as they thumped and clattered, and fluck upon their shields and morions, although they hurt them not much, yet troubled them not a little: neither could the enemies eafily come within them to fight neer and close, nor any darts or javelins had they to fling and launce afar off, and thereby to annoy their enemy. And whiles they food fill exposed as Buts, to receive all that came, and had nothing now to cover and protect them sufficiently; whiles some of them al-H fo gave ground and retreated, and the whole battel was wavering and uniteady, the Roman Haffaei and Principes, came forward with a new shout, and charged them afresh. This violent assault could not the Tuscans bear, but turning their ensigns, fled amain in disarray toward their camp. But when as the Roman horsemen who were rid over through the plains and had gotten before. met them afront in the rout, they left their way unto the Camp, & turned toward the mountains: from whence with their whole company in a manner dilarmed and fore wounded, they recovered the forrest Ciminia. The Romans having slain many thousands of the Tuscans, gained thirty eight enfigns of the field, and won also their tents with rich pillage; began to consult about purfining the enemy. The wood Ciminia was at that time more unpassable and to be feared, than were I of late daies the German forrests: for never to that day had it been travelled and frequented to much as by merchants. And fearcely any one but the Captain himself durst venture to enter into it: for, all the rest had not forgot as yet the unhappy luck they had at Candium. Then the Consul his brother, one that was there, (M. Fabius, as some say, as others, Caso, and as other some C. Claudius, his brother only by the mothers fide) promifed that he would go as a scout inspiall, to descry the wood, and within a while bring certain news. He had in his tender years been brought up at Care, among the ancient friends of his house and family, where afterwards he was taught the Tuscan learning and knowledge, and thereby was perfect in their tongue and language. And I find some authors of credit that writ, how in those daies the Romans young children went to school for to learn to parl Tufcan, as now they do to speak Greek. But it standeth more like a truth, that K there was some special matter in this man, who with so bold semblance and dissimulation, durst intrude and infinuate himself amonest the enemies. It is said, that one only servitor accompanied him, one who had been brought up and nursed together with him, and thereupon not ignorant of the same language. And all the way as they went they did nothing else, but superficially and after a generall fort, learn the nature and fite of the quarters which they were to enter into, and the names withall, of the chief rulers and principal personages of that country and nation: to the end that in their speech and talk they might not salter and trip, and be taken tardy in any apparent thing, which might bewray and discover them. They went clad in pastoral weeds like herdmen, armed like country Kernes or Pealants each of them with a faulthion and two javelins. But neither the familiar use and commerce of the tongue, nor the fashion of apparel which they L were, or weapons that they carried, faved them so much as this one thing, That no man would ever beleeve, that any forreiner and firanger durft enter upon those thick Ciminian forrests. Well forward they went (by report) as far as to the Camertins in Umbria. There the Roman ventured to bewray who they were: and when he was brought into their Senat, hetreated with them in the Confuls name, about a league and amity. Whereupon, after he had been courteoully entertained and friendly intreated he had his dispatch, and was willed to relate unto the Romans, That there should be ready for their army sufficient victuals for one whole month, if they would come into those parts: Alio, that the youth of the Camertins in Umbria should be at their command, prest in arms at all times. These tidings being reported to the Consultafter that he had sent before his carriages at the first watch of the night, and commanded the legions to go after, himself staid M fill with the horsemen: and the morrow morning by day-light he began to skirmish with the scorps de guard of his enemies, which were quartered without the forrest, and when he had long enough kept them play and amused them at his pleasure, he retired into his Camp; from whence the went forth at another gate, and before night overtaketh the main army. The morrow after, at the point of day-break, he was got up to the creft of the hill Ciminius: from whence after he had beheld and vewed the goodly prospect of the rich grounds and fields of Hetruria, he sendeth out his fouldiers abroad to forrage and fetch in prizes, and by that time they had got, and were dri-'vine a fat booty certain tumultuary bands of the ruftical Peafants of Hetruria, gathered together iin great hast, and of a sudden, by the States of that country met with the Romans; but so out of sorder were they, that being come to refcue a prey, they had like to have been a prey themselves, A N number of them were flain or put to flight, and the Romans, having wasted and made spoil all owerthe country, enriched with flore of all things, returned victorious into their Camp. Thither were arrived (as it fellout) five messengers or pursevants with the Tribune of the Commons to warn and command Fabius in the name of the Senat, not to pass through the forrest Ciminist. But these messengers being glad that they came too late for to hinder and interrupt their enterprifes, returned home again to Rome with news of the victory.

By this expedition and journey made by the Cof. the war rather encreased and spread farther, than was dispatched &brought to an end. For all that tract lying along the bottom & foot of the mountain Ciminius, felt the smart of this rode: and provoked to anger & defire of revenge, not only the State of Hetruria, but also the borders and marches of Umbria. Whereupon there came to 0 !Surrium, a greater power than ever afore : for not only they removed their Campforward out of the woods but also for the eager defire of fight withal speed, they came abroad into the plain field. Afterwards, they stood first embattelled in a plot, by them firly chosen, leaving over against them a space of ground for the enemies to set themselves in order of battel : but perceiving the enemies to fall off & loath to fight, they approached the very trench and rampiers; but finding there, that the guards were retired within their hold all at once they began to cry with one voice to their captains for to give order, that the rest of their allowance of victuals for that day should be brought a them thither out of the camp; for they would fray in their armor and harnness, as they were, and either in the night, or elfe in the morning betimes by day-light, give the affault upon their enemies camp. The Roman army was no more quiet then they, yet at their Generals commandment kept in. Now it was welneer the * tenth hour of the day; When as the Conful willed his fouldiers to * Four a clock take their refection, and warned them to be ready in armes at what hour foever by day or by night after-noon. he should give them the fignal of battell. And in the mean time maketh a short speech unto them: praising highly, and setting out of the Samnits wars, debasing the Tuscans, saying, that there was no comparison between either enemy to enemy, or number for number ; over and besides he said that he had another feat and secret devise in store for them, which they should know when time ferved; in the mean while they must keep filence of necessity, and hold their peace. By these dark B freeches and hidden mysteries, he made femblance, as though he had some privy intelligence, be that one part of the enemies would be tray the rest when time came; this did he, to the end, that the heart of his fouldiers (which haply were difmaied and discouraged at their great multipudes) might be comforted and refreshed: and for that the enemies lay abroad in field without any hold and fort, it was more likely and probable, which he pretended. The fouldiers having taken their repast, they laid their bodies to repose and sleep, and somewhat before the reliefe of the *fourth * Between two watch, they were railed without noile, and armed themselves. Then at the sound of trumper, a little before day (which in summer nights a regiment or is the time of the deepest and soundest sleep) the whole army, when the rampite was laid along band of soo and levell, issued forth at once, and charged theenemies on all sides, lying here and there scattered sootmen comon the ground. Some before they were flirring, others half afleep and half awake in their couches : but the greatest part, making bast in that sudden fright to take arms, were slain and cut in read of Duta peeces. Few had time to put themselves in armour, and they having no ensigns, no colours to follow, and no captains to direct them, were by the Romans foon discomfitted, put to flight, and put- coborts, of 400 fued in chale. Some made halt to the camp, other to the woods; fundry waies one from another. But and no moie; the woods were the fafelt place of refuge. But wherefoever it was fought, the Romans had the day. Whereupon there came Embafiadors from Perufia, * Cortena, and * Aretium, where were in maner the chief and princi. * Corte pall Cities at that time of all Tulcane, treating and foing to the Romans for peace, and a league: Cotone.

In they obtained truce only for thirty years. During these affairs in Hetruria, the other Conful, C. Martins Rutilius, wan from the Samnits Conful his pavilion; the rest of the pillage, was the fouldiers share. Slain and taken prisoners that

D day there were of the enemies to the number of 60000. This io noble a battel (fome writers ay) was the town * Allifas. Many other villages and castles were either neterly demolished and destrojed Alphie E by way of extream holtility, or yeelded fafe and whole unto their subjection. At the same time the Roman navy also, under the Conduct of P. Cornelius, whom the Senat ordained Admiral of the ica-coaft, ferfail for Campain, and being arived at * Pompeii, the mariners and fea-tervitors went * Magnarello a land to walt and forage the teritories about * Nuseria: and after they had made spoil, and pilled * Notra, by fnatches the parts lying neerest unto the lea, from whence they might fafely again return to their fhips; they adventured farther for sweetnesse of gain and boory (as usually it falleth our) and so gave the alarm to the enemies for to rife. As they stragled all over the fields, no man made head against them, at what time, as they might have been soon slain every one; but as they were returning with a difordered march, and flood not upon their guards, a troop of the peafants of the country overtook them, not far from the Ships, and eafed them of their spoil and pillage, and flew tome of them : the reft of the multitude, as many as escaped the tword, were chaled to

The journey of Q. Fabius beyond the forrest Ciminia, as it caused great fear in Rome, so it gave occasion of as joyful news in Samnium. For the rumor ran, that the Romans army was shut up and befieged. And hereupon they called to remembrance, and alledged the like example of a loffd and shameful disgrace at Claudians; reporting and giving forth, that theis Romans being a nation greedy alwaies of incroaching farther, and winning more ground, were through the fame raffine fle now run headlong into the blind forrests impassable, and invironed not so much with the power and force of enemies, as the dangerous difficulties of those passages. In inch fort as amid this joy of theirs, they envied also that fortune had turned the glorious honour of the conquelt over the G Romans, from the Samnits, to the Tufcans. And therefore being well appointed with men and almour, they ran out from all parts, to tread down and contound C. Martins the Confol for ever : minding from thence, in cale Martine would not abide a battell, to go into Hetruria through the Marfi and Sabins, But the Conful met with them by the way; where was fought a shape and cruell battell with doubtful event, and much effusion of oloud on both fides. And as uncertain as it was, whether part loft more bloud, yet the rumour went, that the Romans had the

worfe, by reason of the losse of certain knights and gentlemen of Rome, and Colonels, and one w Ligutenant; and that which made most, for that the Conful himself was hurt. Hereupon the brute (as commonly is (een) got more feathers still as it flew, and made every thing greater : so as the Leof the Senat in Rome, were in great fear and perplexity, and agreed to create a Dictator. Neither was there any doubt at all, butthat Papirius Curfor should be the man, who in those daies was reputed the only warrior above all others. But neither could they be affured of lending a meffenger fate into Samnium (confidering all the country was up in arms) nor that the Conful was for certain alive. And as for the other Conful Fabins, upon an old fecret and privat gradge, he maliced Papirius: which quarell, left it might hinder the fervice of the Commonweal, the Sense thought good to fend unto him certain Embaffadors (as it were)even fuch as had been Confuls . who of their own authority, as well as by vertue of publick commission from the State, should ad. monish and counsel him to remit and forget all old displeasures and rancours, for his countries sake. When these personages were come to Fabius the Cos, and had delivered unto him the decree of the Senat, and used withall such speech and reasons of their own, as suted well to the errand they had in charge : the Coficatting his eies down toward the ground, departed from the Embaffadors without giving ever a word, and left them doubtfull what he would do, But the night following, in the dead time (as the maner is) he nominated L. Papirises for Dictator. And when thele messengers or Embassadors gave him great thanks for mastering and ruling his affections to exceeding well, he held his resolution still of silence, and without any answer given, or mention made of himfelf, dilmiffed them; that it might appear, how upon an high mind and haughty stomack. he bridled and kept in that grief of heart and spiteful anger of his, Papirius named C. Junius Bu-v bulens commander of the horse. And whiles he proposed an act concerning the regiment and command of his army, before the people affembled by the Curia or wards, there hapned a matter of ominous prefage, which caused that businesse to be put off untill the next day afor that the ward Fancia, which by lot had the prerogative now to give the first voices, was noted already for infamous and unhappy, in regard that two calamities which happened in both years, wherein the lame Caria likewife began the fuffrages first; namely, the taking of the City of Rome, and the Caudine peace, Macer Licinius making that ward ominous and unlucky, for a third loffe and calamity received at Cremera. But the next morrow, the Dictator, after he had taken new Auspices, went through with the act, and obteined his commission, and set forward with the legions lately mustered and enrolled upon the fearfull alarm given, that the Roman army was passed the wood Cyminia, untill he arrived at Longula; where, after he had received of the Conful Martins, the old bands of fouldiers, he brought his forces into the field to give battell. The enemies for their part seemed not to refuse fight : ho wheir, as they stood armed and aranged, and neither the one fide nor the other would begin to charge, the night came upon them, and forced them to retire. Then they abode encamped neer together in reft and quiet for certain dayes, neither distructing their own pullsance, nor yet distaining and despiting their enemies. In this mean time there was doings and war in Estraria: for both there was a battell fought with the army of the Umbrians a howbeit, the enemies were rather discomfitted and put to flight than slain. for that they were not able to hold out and maintain fight long with such courage and animofity as they began: and also neer the lake and Mear *Vadimon, the Tuicans had levied a new army, according to a facted law, wherby one man had chosen another (who as sworn brethren were to M *Lego di veterto live and die together) where they fought a field, not only with greater number, but also with more courage than ever at any time before : and with such heat of anger and malice one against the other they encountred, that of neither fide they thought of discharging shot and ilancing darts, but began at the very first with their swords to go to handstrokes : and the conflict being right fiercelybegun, increased still, and waxed hotter in the very skirmish, and continued for a good while to doubtfull, that the Romans thought they dealt not with Tulcans to often by them deferted and vanquilhed, but with some new nation more warlike than they. No shew of flight on neither fide; down go the formost, and lay dead before their Standards; and lest that the ensiens should be left naked and bare, and without the defendants, the second range and ward of the bar-taillon came in place to supply the first and so still new succours and fresh were fet even as far as N from the rereward behind, deftined for the last belp and utmost refuge. And to that extremity of travel and perill they proceeded, that the Roman horimen abandoning their hories alighted on foot, and were fain to go to the footmen in the forefront of the vanguard, over armor, and over dead bodies, lying all spread upon the ground; which new troop and battaillon rifen and sprung (as it were) a fresh, to reenforce and strengthen their distressed fellowes, disordred the squadrous and enfigns of the Tufcans. The other legionary fouldiers, wearied (as they were) followed hard and teconded their violence and forceable charge, and at length brake through the ranks of their enemies. Then the Tulcans as stiffe as they stood afore, began to have the worse, and certain bands gave way and retreated : and when they once turned back, they fell plainly to take their beels and run away. This was the first day, that overthrew and laid along the puil-O fance of the Tutcans, who abounded to long in wealth and fortunate professive. Their whole flour > and firength which they had, was in this battell flain, and at the fame time their camp won and ranfacked. With like hazard and glorious successe of the end, was the war managed with the Samnits foon after; who belides all other preparations and ordinary furniture of war, gave order that

A their army should glitter and shine againe with a new kind of garnishing their harnesse and armors. For having divided their forces in two armies, the one had laid their shields with gold, the other with filver. The form and fashion whereof was this, that upper part wherewith the breft. and shoulders are covered, was broader, and the head of it of even height ; but the nether end growing downward to the bottom was more pointed wedgewife, for to weld it more nimbly; Their brealt and ftomack was tenced with spunges, the left leg armed with a good greeve, their morions with high crefts made a thew of tall stature. The fouldiers aforefaid with guilded shields wore coats of fundry colours ; the other with filvered, white linnen : and thele had the leading of the right wing, or point of the battell; but they of the left. The Romans had notice and knowledge already what preparation there was of brave and goodly armor: and their Captains had ~ B taught them afore, that a fouldier ought to be dreadful and terrible, not dight and decked in his damasked gold and filver, but trufting in the sharp edge of iron and steel, and a good heart and ~ courage withall: and as for that other furniture, it was rather a good booty than armor of proof; fair and reiblendent, before men come to the fharp, but foul and unfeemly amongst bloody wounds. The true ornament and beauty of a louldier, is valour and hardineffe; as for all those braveries, they went commonly with victory: and to conclude, that a rich enemy would ferve well for a good prize to the conqueror, were he never to poor and needy. With these speeches after that Carfor had animated his fouldiers, he leadeth them into the field, himfelf he put in the right wing; the left he committeen to the conduct of the Generall of horte. So foon as they charged one another and buckled together, a great conflict and hardy had they with the enemy, and no leffe emulaction there was between the Dictator and him; fterving much whether of them twain should begin the victory. But as hap was, first Junius disordered the enemy, and from the left point which he commanded, he charged right lustily the right wing of the enemies : saving ever and anon, That he offered and facrificed unto the Devill and infernall spirits, those souldiers of theirs, consecrated already unto them after the maner of the Sa units, and decked accordingly in white livery, and bright filvered armour, futing in colour thereunto: and withall advanced forward his standards, brake their araies, and made the battell to shrinkevidently and give ground. Which when the Dictator perceived, How how, quoth he, shall the victory begin at the left wing, and shall the right, wherein the Dictator fighteth in person, come behind and follow the battelofanother, and not cary away with it the greatest part of the victory ? Herewith he letteth on his n fouldiers, yet gave the horiemen no place in manhood to the footmen, or the fervice of the Lieutenants was inferiour to the Captains themselves and chief commanders: M.V. derius on the right point, P. Deciss on the left, both Confular men, put themselves forward, and rode out to the horimen aranged in the wings, exhorted them to take part with them in honor, and charged acroffe upon the fides and flanks of the enemies. Whiles this new terror upon the former, had on every fide entred the battel of the enemies; and the Roman legions, to terrifie them the more, had redoubled a fresh shout, & charged them with greatfury, then began the Samnits to flie amain. Now were the fields overforead with the bodies of flain men, and firewed thick with armor, crewhile fo brave and glorious : and at the first, the Samnits in great affright recovered their tents; but being there, were not able to much as to keepthem, for they were won and rifled before night, and fire E fetuponthem. The Dictator by a decree of the Senat triumphed . and the faid armor which was taken from the enemy, made the goodlieft pageant of all other, in the somp of triumph : which carried to flately a shew and magnificent, that the guilded shields were divided amongst the warders of the company of Bankers and Goldsmiths, to the beautifying of their Hal and Marker place. And hereof began first the custome of the Ediles, to adorn and set out the common place of the City in their folemn proceffions, when the facred images of the gods and holy reliques were carried about for pomp in filver chariots. And the Romans verily for their part put this goodly trim armor of their enemies to this use, namely, to honor their gods withall. But the Campains upon a pride and inveterate hatred that they bare against the Samnits, used to arm their sword players and fencers at the shatp (which was a solemn sight and pastime they had at their great scales) p with this same attire, and termed them in mockery, by the name of Samnits, The same year Fabins the Consul tought with the rest of the Tuicans at * Perusia (which City * Perusia; also had broken the covenant of truce) where neither doubtfully nor hardly he obtained victory. And the very town it telf he had forced & won (for in the fame train of his conquest he approached the wals) but that their Embassadours came forth and yeelded the City. When he had placed a good garrifon at Perufic and fent before him to Roins unto the Senat, the Embastadours of Histra ia, who treated for peace; be being but Conful, made his triumphant entry into the City for a more magnificent victory, then the Dictatour. And that for a good part of the honor of fabduing the Samnits, was aferibed to the Lieutenants P. Decini, and M. Valerim, therefore at the pext Election, the people with general affeits declared the one Conful, and the other Pretout. Fa-

G bine for taning Hetraria to bravely and valiantly, continued Confull fill, and had for his Colleague P. Dec m. Valersus was created Prefor the fourth time. The Confuls parted between them the provinces, Herraria fell to Decim, Samnium to Fabius. Who taking his voiage to Nucerea, laid fiege to the City of the Allifats, and won it by affault; and not withflanding they made fair for peace, here jected and despised them, for that when it was offered, they would not accept With the Sampits be fought a battell; but without any great conflict, the enemies were Bbg vanquished. Neither had the remembrance of that field been left in record, but that the Marsians H first took arms and warred with the Romans. After the Marsians were revolted, the *Pelignians did the temblable, and speed alike. Decim also the other Conful had good success in his wars. He drave the Tarquinians for fear, to find the army corn, and to see for a truce of forty years. Certain castles and holds of the Volscinians, he forceably wan: some of them heutterly raied, for that they should not be any receptacle or harbour for the enemies. And with warring round about every where, he became to terrible, that the whole Tuseane nation made suct to the Conful for peace and confederacy. It they could not obtain that true for a year was granted. In regard wheros, for that year they satisfied the whole pay for the army, and a double livery for every souldier was exacted and taken of them. This was the pension and since that their truce cost them.

But now when all was quiet among the Tulcans, the fudden revolting of the Umbrians, a nation free, and faved hitherto from the calamities of war, but only that the Roman army passing through their territories troubled all anew: for they having raifed the strength and slower of their youth and follicited also a great part of the Tuscans to rebell, levied sogreata power that making no accompt of Decius, whom they left behind them in Hetraria, they gave out proud words of themselves, and spake basely of the Romans, vaunting and boasting that they would march right forth to affault Rome. Which deligne of theirs, to foon as it was reported to Decime the Cos, he made speed, and by long journies departed out of Hetruria toward the City, and in the Country of the Papinians, encamped himfelf; lithning ever after the enemies, what they meant to do. Neither at Rome was the Umbrians war neglected and fet light by: for their very threats and menaces k scared them, as who already had seen by experience, by the foil they had at the Gauls hands. how unfure a City they inhabited and not unpregnable. Therupon messengers were dispatched to the Col. Fabius, That if he had any breathing time, and rest from the Samnits war, he should with al speed lead his army into Ambria. The Col. obeyed, and by great journies went forward to * Mevania, where at that time the forces of the Umbrians lay. This fudden and unexpected coming of the Cos, whom they thought verily occupied in Samnium far enough off from Umbria, so terrified the Umbrians, that some gave advise to retire back to their walled towns, others to relinquish the war altogether. One Canton or tract of their country (which they themselves call Materina not only kept the rest in arms, but also set them on to fight immediatly, so as they charged upon F4. bisse, as he was trenching and fortifying. Whom when the Col. faw rushing upon his rampiers in L fuch heaps, he called his men from their work, and as the ground & time would give leave, he marshalled them in order of battel: and after he had encouraged his fouldiers with a true report & difcourse of many glorious and honourable journies atchieved as well in Thuseia as also in Samnium he willed them to dispatch this smal refidue of the Tulcan war, that hung by and remained behind. and to be revenged of that accurred and impions speech, whereby they threatned to assail the City of Rome. These words of his were heard by the souldiers with such alacrity and cheerfulness of heart, that before their Generall had made an end of his speech, they set up a shout of themselves and interrupted him : and thus before commandment and fignall given by found of trampets and cornets, they ran amain upon the enemies, and charged them as if they had not been men, and those also armed. For (a wonderful thing to be spoken) at the very first they began to pluck the M banners and streamers out of the bearers hands, after that, the ensign-bearers themselves were led to the Confuls, and the fouldiers armed as they were, transported out of one battailon into another, and where there was any fentiling, they fought not to much with fword, as buckler : and what with their boffes and iron pikes, and what with jullling, fhouldering, and ftriking the enemies about the arme-pits, they were overthrown and felled. In which skirmith, more men were taken then flain : and no other cry was heard throughout the field, but down with weapon, down with weapon. So that in the very conflict, the principal authors of the war rendred themfelves : and the morrow after, and other daies following, the reft of the people of Umbrial likewife veelded. The Orriculans by flipmation only and pledges given, were received in amity. And Fabiw having thus got the victory in that war, which fell to another mans lot and charge, led back his N army again into his own province. And in regard of his prosperous and happy exploits, like as the people the year past continued his Consulfnip : so the Senat against the year following, when Ap. Claudius, and L. Volumeins were Coll.prorogued his marrial rule ftill, mangre the heart of Appins, who was greatly against it. In some Chronicles I find, that Appine, whiles he was Censor sued to be Cnoful, and that his Election was croffed and flaied by L. Fareup, a Tribune of Com. untill he had refigned up the Cenforthip, Being created Cof, and the war with the Salentins (declared new enemies) allotted unto his Collegue, he remained at Rome; that by civil policy, and managing home-affairs, he might augment his own state and authority, lince that the honour of war-letvice refted in the hands and conduct of another. Volumnian had no cause to repent of his charge and province for many fortunat battels he fought, and tome towns of the enemies by force he won. O He was a bountiful giver of the spoil a way unto his souldiers : and this bounty in it felf alone acceptable, he helped much with great courtefie and gentleneffe, by which vertues and artificiall means, he made the fouldiers both venturous in perils and hardy in traveil, Q. Fabius on the other part, in quality of pro-Conful, gave battell to the Samnits neet the City Alifa, where the day was nothing doubtful. The enemies were discomfited and beaten into their camp: neither had they been able to have kept the field, but that there was but a life.

& tle day left behind : and yet before night, they were befet round about in their hold, vea, and watched with good guards all night long, that none should make escape. The morrow morning ere it was well day light, they began to yeeld themselves, and to capitulate, that as many Sampits as there were among them, should be sent forth in their single garments, and they all went under the gallows. As for their confederats and allies, there was no fuch proviso nor composition made; but they all, to the number of feven thouland, were fold as flaves, and wore a garland. As many as advowed themselves to be Hernicks, were kept apart by themselves to be forth coming. All those Fabius lent to Rome to the Senat, and untill such time as enquiry was made, whether in a publick mufter they were preffed fouldiers or voluntarily ferved under the Samnits against the Romans, they were committed to be kept in ward among fundry nations of the Latins: during R which time, the new Confuls, Publicus Cornelius Arvina, and Quincius Martius Tremulus for thole were now created) had in charge to propole that matter anew unto the Senat. The Hernicks took that ill. Whereupon the Anagnins held a Diet or General Councel in the round Cirque. which they call Maritimus, of all the Cities of that Nation, except the Alatrinats, Ferentinats, and the Verulans. Where the whole State of Hernicks proclamed war against the people of Rome. In Sammum allo, for that Fabius was departed thence, there arole new troubles and rebellions. Calatia and Sora were forced, and the Roman garrilons that there lay, were put to the fword, and upon the bodies of as many as they took alive, they exercised much torture and cruelty. Whereupon Publius Cornelius the Conful was thither fent. And to Martins were the new enemies appointed (for by this time decreed it was, That war should be made upon the C Anagoins and the other Hernicks.) At the first the enemies had so seised all the convenient paffes and waies between both the Confals camps, that there could not 'readily paffe a lacker or currier between, in so much, as for certaindaies both Confuls abode doubtfull how the world went, and uncertain one of the others state. The fear whereof, spred to Rome, fo stell the younger lort [from leventeen years of age to leven and forty] ware to lerve: and against all fudden occasions, and occurrents whatsoever, two full and compleat armies were levied and enrolled. But the Hernick war was nothing correspondent eitherto the present menaces, or to the ancient glory and reputation of that nation for having done no worthy adventures, and within few dates loft their camp thrice, they covenanted for to have thirty dates truce a during which time, they might fend Embaffadours to the Senat of Rome : and in confideration hereof, they D promited to lay down two months pay, and to find corn for the army, and allow every fouldier one coat. But from the Senat they were put off and referred to Martins: unto whom by order from the Senat, a large commission was granted to dispose of the Hernicks as he he thought good . and to be took the whole nation as yeelded to his devotion. The other Conful in Samnium being in forces more pullant then the enemy, was not withflanding encumbred much with the difficulty of the ground. All the passages had the enemie stopped, and possessed himself of the forrests and woods which were thorow faires, that no way victuals might be conveied unto him. Neither could the Consul, for all that daily he displaied banner in field, train them forth to fight : fo as it was well teen, that neither the Samnits could abide prefent battell, nor the Romans long delay of war. But the arrival of Martins who upon the subduing of the Hernicks, made hast to aid his E Colleague, canted the enemy to defer no longer the triallof the field. For, they, who thought themselves not good enough to match so much as the one army, knew fol wel that if they suffered twoConfuls armies to join together, there had been no hope left. They therefore fet upon Martia was he marched without order of battel. Hereupon in al halt their truffes and fardels were brought together and laid in the middle; and as the time would permit, he fet his fouldiers in array. At the first encounter, the shout was hard into the camp of the other Contal. After wards the dust deferred afar off, gave an alarm, and made a trouble and tumult there. Then the Confull prefently commanded to arm : and haltily bringing his fouldiers forth into the field, entred upon the battell of the enemics in the flank, whiles they were builed in another skirmifb. He cried aloud to his men, that it were exceeding great shame, to suffer the other army to carry away doube victory, and not themselves win the honour of that war, which was their proper charge. Thus, wherefoever he charged, he brake in and made entrance, and having pierced and made a great lane through the midft of the enemies battel, he paffed on towards their camp; which finding void of detendants, he took and fet afire. Which when the fouldiers of Martius law burns ing before their faces, and the enemy likewife, as they looked behind : then began the Same nits on all hands to flie : but killed they were every where down right : all places full of murder - and flaughter: to in no part could they find means to escape and fave themselves. Now when there were thirty thouland of the enemies flain, the Contuls founded the retreat, and gathered both their armies together, with great congratulation one to the other: by which time, behold, there were deteried a far off, certain new bands of enemies, enrolled for a supply; and they gave occasion G of a new and fresh slaughter. Against whom without commandment of Conful, or any signali received from their lead ers, the Romans advanced luftily, crying aloud, that there Samnits were to be welcomed with an ill hanfell, and this their first training should cost them deer. The Confuls let the legions alone in this their furious hear, as who knew well enough, that there new comers feeing the old beaten fouldiers to altonied already and flying a way, would foon have enough of it, and not once adventure fight. And they were not deceived in their opinion ; for the whole forces of the Samnies as well old and new, fled apace unto the next mountains and thither the

Romans also make as great speed. But no safe place could those vanquished enemies sinds for even H from the very hit tops which they held, they were beaten down, so that with one voice they all craved peace. Then after the Consuls had imposed upon them corn for three months, and a years pay, and for every fouldier a livery besides, they were permitted to send Embassadours to the Senat, to treat and capitulat thereof. During which time, Cornalius was left in Sammium, and Martim returned into the City, with triumph over the Hernicks. Moreover a decree passed, that his statue riding on hortback should remain in the common place of assemblies, which was erected accordingly even before the Temple of Castor. To three States of the Hernicks, to wit, the Alatrinars, the Verulans and Ferentinats, their own laws, and ancient liberties were restored again, because they made choice thereof, rather than to be enfranchised Citizens of Romes and permitted they were to marry amongs the Romans, which liberty they only of the Hernickes for a good I while enjoied. The Anagonias, and those that had born arms against the Romans were incorporat free denizens of Rome, but without the priviledge of giving voices and suffrages: debarred they were of holding any Councels and making marriage; with them, yea, and denied at all to elect any magistracy, but only the function and ministry of divine service and facrifices.

The same year the Chappell of dame Salus was by C. Janius Bubulcus now Cenfor, set out at a price to be built, which he in his Consulhiph had owned, in the Sammits war. By his direction and appointment, together witch his colleague M. Valerius Maximus, were the great high waies and causeys made, of all sides of the City, through the fields, at the common charge and expenses. The same year also, was the league renewed now the theird time with the Carthaginians: and k their Embassadous who came for that purpose, were controudly entertained, and rewarded liberally with rich gifts. In that year there was a Dictator P. Cornel. Scipe, with P. Decim General of the horse: and these were Presidents at the Election of Consuls, for to that purpose they were created because neither of the two Consuls could be spared from the wars. Consuls were created L. Polibumius and T. Minnius, But Psse 196 styths that these Consuls immediatly succeeded Q. Pabius and P. Decim: leaving out those two years, wherein he hath written that Claudius with Volumius, and Cornelius with Marius were Consuls, Whether he forgot himself in digelting his Annals and yearly records, or of set purpose overhipt two couple of Consuls, thinking that they were not in truth Consuls. I won to.

The same year the Samnits made rodes into the territories of Stella, within the liberties and ap-L purtenances of the Campains, and therfore both Confuls were fent into Samnium: who when they were parted into divers wayes, for Posthumius took his journey to Tifernum, and Minutius to Bovianum: first there was battell fought at Tefernum, under the leading of Posthumuns. Some make. no doubt, but write, that the Samnits were discomfitted, and put to the worse, and thirty thoufand of them taken prisoners : others fay, that the conflict was equal, and that they departed on even hand a also that Post burning making semblance of fear, journyed by night, & closely retired unto the hils adjoyning, & the enemies followed after them, two miles, and from thence encamped. and fortified also themselves in strong places of advantage. The Conful, because he would be thought to have lought and choic a fafe place, and plentifully stored with all necessaries (as it was no lesse indeed) where he might keep a standing camp; after he had fortified the same, and fur-M nished it with all kind of provision leaving behind him a strong garrison for defence; at the relief of the third watch, leadeth the neerest way, his legions not encumbred with cariage, to his Colleague, who also himself lay in camp over against another army. There, by the perswasion & advice of Posthumius, Minnius gave battell; and when as the conflict continued doubtfull untill it was far on the day a then Post kamius with his fresh legions, on a sudden charged the battaillons of the enemies, now already overroyled; thus partly for wearineffe, and partly for wounds, they being disabled for to flee away, were out of all measure flain every one, and xxi, banners were taken: and io from thence they went forward to the camp of Posithumins. Where these two victorious armies finding the enemy discouraged and amazed at the tidings of this overthrow, set upon them, discomfitted, and put them to flight; and wan from them xxvi. enfignes: where the General of the N Samnits Statins Cellins, with many a man belides, was taken priloner, and both their camps won-Bovianum also, which the morrow after began to be affaulted, was shortly after forced and finally with great glory of no noble acts atchieved, both Confuls triumphed some write that the Conful Minutin: being grievoully hurt, wasbrought back into the camp, and there dyed and that M. Fulving was substituted Contul in his room ; and that it was he, who being fent unto the army of Minutins, wan Bovianum. The fame year Sora, Arpinum, and Confessia were recovered from the Samnits : and the great image of Hercules was in the Capitol fet up and dedicated.

When as P. Sulpitins Aversia, and P. Sempronius Sophus were Coss. the Samnits desiring either to see an end of war, or clie to delay it, tent Embassadors to Rome pretending peace. To whom as they pleaded and intreated most humbly, this answer was given; That if the Samnits ald not O see to other created for peace, when they intended and prepared war they might after certain enterviews, and conferences passed between, obtain their time; a but since that evermore untill that views, and conferences to wind; now they would trust to their deeds, and nothing eller P. Sampronius the Contol, shall shortly be in Samnium with an army: who would not be abused, "Suppronius the Contol, shall shortly be in Samnium with an army: who would not be abused, "but soon see, whether their minds be enclined to war or peace; and as he found and saw every thing, so would be bring word and make relation and therfore their Embassadors were to astered unon the Conful when he departed out of Samnium. The fame year after that the Romans army had passed peaceably to and fro, and visited all Samaiam, having victuals by the country courteonly allowed, the ancient league was granted again to the Samnits. From thence turned the Romans their forces against the Equian, their old enemies; but for many years making semblance of quietness, where as indeed their peace was little to be trusted : for that the Hernick nation was fafe and on foot, they with them, had used oftentimes under hand to send aid unto the Sampits: and also after the subduing of the Hernicks, the whole nation in a maner without dissembling, and averring all they did by publick counfell and authority, had fallen away unto the enemie : and after that the Romans had made league with the Samnits, and their heralds came to make claim for their goods took from them by way of hostility, they said, It was but a tempting of them, to tee, R whether upon fear of war they would fuffer themselves to become Romans. Which, say they, how greatly it were to be wish'd, the Hernicks was able to teach them: for they, as many of them as had liberty to do what they would, cholerather to live under their own laws, then to be entranchifed citizens of Rome; but others, who had not the fame scope to choose to their liking, they were constrained to accept of the Burgeoisse of their City, by way of a punishment. Upon these speeches and arguments commonly toffed in their affemblies and Councels, the people of Rome decreed war against the Æquians: to which both the Confuis went, and encamped foar miles from their encmies camp. The Æquians (who in their own behalf, and for any quarell of theirs, had many years fat ftill and made no war) like as if their army had been levied of a judden and in halt, withour certain Captains appointed, and without any Generall to command, were affizid. Some thought e good to go forth into the field, others to defend themselves, and keep within their camp : most of them were moved to think aforehand upon the walting of their country afterwards, and consequently the destruction of their cities left but with slender garrilons. Therefore after that, and mongst many opinions, this only had audience, namely, to abandon the care of publick weal and every man to regard his own privat state, and at the first watch to depart divers waies one from the other, and quit the camp, and convey away all their bag and baggage, and to defend their Cities within the wals : they all with one accord accepted thereof, and imbraced it. No w when the enemies were thus scattered abroad about the country, the Romans by day-light, with banner displaied went forth into the field : and when they saw no man come abroad to meet them, they marched in warlike order apace towards the enemies camp. But when as they could perfective n there, neither warders before the gats, nor any man upon the trench & rampiers, nor fo much as the usual noise of a leaguer; being moved with this unaccultomed filence, for fear of forelaying and treachery, they flood fill : but being got over the rampier, and finding the tents void and empty, they fet forward to puriue the enemy by his trace. But when they found their foot-tracks, leading to all parts of the Country alike : as being flipt here and there, fundry and divers waies; at the first they wandred out of the way, and miffed of them; but afterwards knowing by their espials the purpole and intent of their enemies, they went round about and befieged every City, and in threefcore daies wan forty towns all by affault : most part whereof were razed even with the ground, and confumed into afthes, and the nation of the Equians utterly in a manner destroyed. Over the Equians there was triumph; Whole calamity and defolation was to fearfull an example, to the Marrucios, Marsi, Peligni, and Ferentins, that they sent Orators to Rome to treat for peace and amity: and to all those nations at their request, a league was granted. The same year, C. Flavius a Notary or Register by profession, whose father Cneus was no better than of a flave made free, a man, thus descended of baie and low parentage, howbeit otherwises crafty and eloquent withall, earose to be an Ædile Carale. I find in some records, that when he gave attendance in his calling to the Adiles, and faw that his own Tribe were willing to give him their voices and cleft him Ædile, but his name not accepted of among other competitours, for that he got his living by his pen, he cast aside his books and papers, and sware an oath, that he would no longer be a Notary and use pencraft. But Macer Licinius avoucheth, that a good while before, that he gave over his writing, namely, after he had been Tribune, and born two Triumvirships, the one for the night misrules, the other for the placing and transporting of a Colony. But they all agree upon this, that he became very ftour, and in great contumacy opposed himself and made head against the Nobles that contemned his base birth. The civil law which before time was laid up in great fecret by the Priefts, and Prelats in their Arches, he published abroad : and set up a table in the great common place, in manner of a Calender, wherein all men might know worke-daies from holy-dayes; when it was lawfull to plead, and when not. Also in despite, and to the great heart-burning of the Patritii, he dedicated the temple of the goddeffe Concord upon the Court of Vulcan : and by the generali content of the people, Cornelius Barbains the high Priest was compelled to endite and pronounce the certain form of words therto belonging; not with flanding he contested and denied, G that by the customes of their forefathers any could dedicate a Temple, unlesse he were either Conful or Generall of an army. And therefore by the authority of the Senat, a law was preferred to the people, That no man might dedicate a Temple or Altar, without permission and confent of the Conful, or the more part of the Tribuns of Commons. I will report in this place a thing, of it felf not worthy of remembrance, but only for a proof and example of the liberty of the Commons against the pride and insolencie of the Nobles. This Flavius, com-

gentleman of the Parritians that fat by his bed fide, had no reverence done unto him, nor any one H to much as role up at entrance into the chamber: whereupon, he commanded his ivory chair of Scare to be brought unto him, and fer him felf upon it; and so he outfaced his adversaries, that were fo vexed to the heart with envy of his dignity, This Flavius was nominated & chosen Edile. by the base faction of the commoners, banding together in the place of assemblies : who first took heart by the Centorship of Appins Claudius the first that ever distained and polluted the Senat, by bringing in the Sons of Libertins: and when he faw that no man accounted that Election of Senators good and lawfull, and perceived withall, that in the Court he had not that backing of Citizens which he fought for ; he intermingled in every Tribe certain of the most base perions of the Commons: and to he corrupted both the common place and Mars field alfo. In fo much as the Election of Flavius was reputed to unworthy an indignity, that most of the gentlemen of Rome laid away their gold rings and rich trapping of their horses which were the ornaments and entigns of their calling. And from the time forward the City was divided into two parts. One fide was maintained and upheld by the true hearted people, such as favoured and loved good things: the other by the faction of riffe-raffe and foum of the City; untill the time that Q. Fabius and P. Decins were created Centors. Fabins to bring the City unto an uniform accord, and to withstand this inconvenience, that the Elections of Magistrats should not be carried away by the fixong hand of the vileft and most abject persons, made a separation of all that base rabble, and cast them into four Tribes and called them * Vrbana. Which action of his (men say) was accepted with to great contentment and thankfulneffe, that upon the good temperature of degrees, he purno lands in the chafed the turname of Maximus, which in to many victories he had not acquired and obtained. K By him also (by report) it was ordained and inflituted, that on the Ides of Iuly, the horsemen named Ruffi. rode, as it were, in a folemn muster, and shewing their greathorses to the Cenfor.

wo Colonies were planted in Sora and Alba. The marfians of Carfeola, were reduced under obedience. The fellowship of the Augurs was augmented to the number of nine, whereas before they were wont to be but four. The law or edict as touching the appealing to the people was now the third time proposed by Valerius the Consul. Two Tribes more were added to the reft, Aniensis and Terentina. Wer was denounced against the Samnits, and fortunatly fought with them.
What time as there was a battell given to the Tuscans, Umbrians, Samnits and Gauls, under the M conduct of P. Decius, and Quintus Fabius, and the Roman army was in great extremity of danger, P. Decius following the example of his father, devowed and exposed himselfe to die voluntarily. for to fave the hoft : and by his death obtained the victory of that journy, to his countrimen and fellow Citizens, Papirius Curfor put to flight an army of the Samnits, who were bound by a folemn oath not to depart out of the battel without victory, to the end, that with more magnanimity and resolution, they should enter into the field. The Cenfe was held, and the number taken of the Citizens, with the folemn purging and Lustration of the City. And affested there were 262322 pols.

Hen L. Genutius and Ser. Cornelius were Confuls, there was rest in a manner from all wars abroad; in such sort, as they had leisure to place certains -Colonies at Sora and Alba: And for Alba there were enrolled 6000 inhabitants, to affornt the Equians. As for Sora, it had sometimes belonged to the Volicians territory; but the Samuits usurped the possession of it, and thither four thousand were fent to inhabit. The same year, the Arpinats and Trebulans were infranchifed denizens at Rome. The Frufinats were fined with the loffe of one third part of their lands : for they were evidently detected to have follicited the Hernicks to rebellione and after that the Contols Commission from the Senze, had made due inquisition, the principall heads of that conspiracy, were scourged and beheaded, yet because there should not pass a year clean with ut war, a journy was made (luch a one as it was)into Umbria; upon news, that there nied to idue forth day by day, certain men in arms out of a cave, and to make rodes into the country about. Into this cave or peak, the Romans entred with their enlignes dilplayed: where by reason that it was a blind corner, they received many a wound, and specially by throwing of

A flones; untill fuch time as they found the other mouth of the cave (for it was a thorow-fate.) So they piled a deal of wood together at both ends, and let it on fire: with the imoke and vapour whereof, there were about 2000 armed men driven our of their hole, who rushing at last into the flame defirous to escape were imothered and burnt to ashes.

When as M. Livius Denter, and C. Amylius, were Confuls, the Aquians began to war again for they hardly could abide and endure, that a Colony should be planted upon their borders, as a frontier-fortress to bridle them, and assaied by all kind of force to win the same : but they were luftily repulled by the Inhabitants only within the town. Howbeit, such a fear they made at Rome, because it was not thought credible, that the Equians alone of themselves, so distressed as they R were, would be so hardy as to take arms, that in regard of that trouble, a Dictator was named to wit. C. Tunius Babulcus, with T. Titinius General of the horse. Who at the first conflict subdued the Equians, and upon the eighth day of his government returned into the City in triumph: and now the Distator, dedicated the Temple of Salus, which he had vowed being Conful, and had puroutto workmen for to be builded, while he was Cenfor.

The same year a fleet of Greeks, under the conduct of Cleonymus a Lacedamonian, arrived upon the coast of Italy, and won Thuria, a City of the Salentins. Against this enemy was the Conful Emplins fent, who in one battel discomfitted him, and drove him abourd. Thus Thuria was rendred again to the former Inhabitants, and the Salentine Country obtained peace and quietness. I find im some Records, that it was Jun. Bubulcus the Dictator who was sent to the Salentins: C and that Cleonymus before he was to encounter with the Romans, departed out of Italy. From thence he fetched a compais, and doubled the point of Brundusium, and failed with a fore-wind through the midit of Venice gulph: for that on the left hand the Havenless and harbourless coasts of Italy, and on the right, the Illyrians, Liburnians, and Istrians, sierce nations, and for the most part, reputed infamous, for roving and robbing by the sea-side, put him in exceeding fear, So he arrived at length upon the river of Venice, lying far within the shore, and there he landed a few to discover the Coasts: but hearing that the strand that lay out against them was not broad and spacious, and when they were past over it, there were behind them the plashes (as it were) overflowed with the lea-tides, and that not far off might be seen the champian fields near hand, and hils beyond; and discovering by this means the mouth of a very deep river, into which he faw. In that the ships might be brought about as into a sure harbour (now that rivers name was Medisacus) thither he commanded, that the Armada should put in, and to make fail up against the stream. The heaviest vessels, the chanel of the river would not bear: but the souldiers were transported in lighter barks and small pinaces, and so fell at length with the levell and the plain Country frequented with much people, by reason that three sea towns of the Patavins, inhabited that Territory. Being once landed, and having left a flender guard for their ships, they take Towns by affault, burnt houses, plunder and drive awayprizes both of men and cattell: and when they had once tasted of the sweetness of booty and pillage, they went far from their ships. The allarmi hereof was given at Patavium (now the Patavins were alwaies in arms, because of the Gauls their borderers,) Wherupon they divided their fighting youth into two regiments: the one was led in-E to those quarters whereas the report went, that the Greeks forraged here and there all abroad:

the other, because they would not meet with the robbers and rovers, was conducted another way to the harbour, where the ships rid (about fourteen miles from the Town. And after they had flain the warders, they charged upon the small barks. Whereupon the marriners were atraidand were forced to retire their vessels to the other bank-side. Likewise upon the main they sped as well in fight against the stragling rovers: for when as the Greeks fled back to recover the harbour, the Venetians encountred them alront, and made head against them. So the enemies were environed in the midft, and most of them slain: some that were taken prisoners, bewrayed what their fleet was, and that King Cleonymus was three miles off. There, when they had bestowed the priloners sure enough in ward within the next village; some man with souldiers

F their river-veffels, made fitly and framed with flat bottoms, for to pass over the meers and shallow washes; othersembark armed men in the small gallions taken from the enemies; and made way apace to give an affault upon the main fleet, and befet those ships which rid at anchor, and durst not weigh and remove, searing not the enemy, so much as the unknown coasts. These, 1 fay, they environed, and charged upon them: and when they made hafte to gain the deep and open sea, without any resistance at all, they were pursued and chased unto the mouth of the river. Thus when they had taken the enemies ships, and fired others, namely, such as for fear and haste were driven upon the shelves, and run a-ground, the they returned with victory. Cleanmus hardly faved the fifth part of his fleet. And thus having had no good luck in attempting to land in any coast of the Adriatick sea, he departed. The stems of the ships, with their beak-G heads, and brazen pikes, together with the spoils of the Lacedamonians, were set up in the old

Temple of Juno, and there be many at this day alive, which have seen them. The memoriall of this fea-fight, is celebrated yearly (upon the very tame day that it was fought) at Patavium, with a folemn skirmish and combate of ships represented upon the river, within the midst of the

The same year was a League made at Rome with the Vestins, who came to sue for peace and amity. But from that time, there arose many and divers searfull occurrents. For news came, that Hetraria rebelled, which proubles took their beginning by occasion of the civill diffension u and discord of the Arctins: who began to expell by force of arms, the house and family of the Licinii (mighty and puillant above the reft) for very envy and repine of their wealth and riches. Over and besides, the Marsians stood out, and by arms maintained their title to that past of their territory; into which there had been a Colony of Carleolans brought, to the number of four thouland men, enrolled there to inhabit, Against which flirs and tumults, Marcus Valerius Maximus was created Distator, who made choice of M. Emplius Paulus to be the Commander of the Horse. Which I rather believe to be true, than that Q. Fabius, a man of those years and that worth, after so many honourable dignities, should be under V. lerius, But I would not deny, that the errour might grow by reason of the surname of Maximus. The I Dictator having taken the field with his Army, in one battell discomfitted the Marsians: and after he had driven them into their walled and fenced Towns, Miloniana, Plestina, and Fresilia; within few daies, he wonthem also over their heads: and having fined the Marsians with the loss of some part of their Territory, he received them into their ancient League again. Then all the forces were emploied against the Tuscans: and whiles the Distator was departed to Rome to take his Auspices anew, the General of Horse, being gone out a forraging, was by a secret ambush entrapped. And having lost certain ensigns, he was forced into the Camp, after a foul slaughter and shameful slight of his men. Which seasfull cowardice is not like to have been in Fabing, not only, because if ever he deserved his surname of Maximus by any commendable parts, it was especially for his prowels in war; but also, for that in remembrance of Papyrus K his cruelty toward him, he never could have been brought to fight, without the commandment or permission of the Dictator. This discomfiture and loss being reported at Rome, caufed a greater terrour than there was cause. For no less than if the Army had been utterly de-Seated, there was published and proclaimed a stay and cessation of all law-matters, warders beflowed at the gates, order taken for flanding watches in every fireet, and armour and dares carried up to the wals. And after that all the younger fort were sworn and prefit o serve the Dichator was tent again to the Army. Where, he found all more quiet than he looked for through the carefull dilligence of the Generall of Horse. The Campwas removed to a place of more strength and safety, the bands and companies which had lost their ensigns, lest on the bare earth without the rampiers, destitute of tents and covert; and the army eager and desirous of L fight, to do away and rate out the former ignoming and shame. Presently therefore he raised his Camp, and removed forward into the country of Rafella. Thither followed the enemies also hard at heeis. Who albeit upon their late good speed, they were in right great hope and affiance. to be ftrong enough even in open fight and plain field; yet they affail the enemy also by the same fleights and trains which they had already fortunately tried. There fortuned to be in the country thereabout, not far from the Romans Camp, certain houses half pulled down and ruinate, belonging to a village which was burned when the country was over-run: where, after they had bestowed closely certain men in arms, they drave their beasts and cattel in the very fight of the Roman corps de guerd, commanded by G. Fulvius, a Lieutenant: at which bait, when as there firred no man from the Roman wards, one of the Heardmen advanced even under the M very trench and fortifications of the Romans, and called aloud to the rest (that seemed for fear to drive but flowly from the ruins of the village aforelaid) asking why they staied behind. feeing they might fafely march, and passforward still (as it were) through the middle of the Roman Camp? These words certain Carits interpreted to the Lieutenant Fulvius, Whereat, every band or company of fouldiers took great indignation, but durit not flir a foot without a warrant. Then he commanded those that were skilfull in the tongue to mark whether their language founded neerer to the speech of pealants or to Citizens: Who brought word, that both their voice, and also the habit and fresh hue of their bodies, was more elegant and civill than for comtry shepherds, Go your waies then (quoth he) unto them and bid them beware and discover their ambush, which in vain they seem to hide: for that the Romans were cunning in all things, and N advertised of their defigns, and could no more now be overtaken with wiles, than overcome by arms. When there words were once heard and carried to those that lay in wait, presently they fact up out of their lurking holes, and brought forth their enfigns all abroad into the open field. The lieutenant supposing they were a greater troop than might be dealt withall and matched by his corps de guard, with all speed sert for aid to the Dictator: and in the mean while himself received and bare off the brunt and forcible charge of his enemies. This message was no sooner brought, but the Dictator commanded the standards to be advanced, and the souldiers to arm and sollow: but every thing was done sooner almost than it could be commanded forthwith they caught up the enfigns and took weapon in hand: and scarcely could they be held in, but that they would run amain. For not only the spiteful anger of the late received loss pricked them on, but also o the shouts of their sellows, which they might hear more loud, and to be redoubled thicker according as the skirmish grew hotter and hotter. The greater haste therefore they made, whiles one putteth forward another, and crieth to the port-enfigns to go faster and mend their pace, But the more haste the Dictator seeth them to make, the more earnest was he to keep them back in their march, and to hold them in; willing them to go fair and foftly. Contratiwise the Tuscane, who rose up at the beginning of the battel, were there ready with their whole forces to give the charge. Whereupon there came mellenger after mellenger to the Dictator, bringing word that all the

A legions of the Tuicans were entred into the fight, and that his men already were not able to the fift anylonger. Nay himself alio, from the higher ground, might see in what danger the corps de build was. But prefuming and refting upon this conceit, that the Lieutenant was able yet to maintain fight, confidering that he was not far off himfelsto help and fave him out of peril; he was decrous that the enemies might be wearied and cired afmuch as was possible, and that his own forces fresh and in heart, should set upon them overtoiled ... And albeit they went softly forward, yet by this rime had the Horsemen but a very small ground to take their sun with full career. Formost marched the enfigns of his legions, that the enemy should not fear any covert and privy stratagem; but leave good spaces and distances between the files of their footmen, through which the Horses B might have room and liberty enough to gallop with eafer. Then all the battaillon of the Infantry fet up a cry and shout when they charged, and withal, the Cavalry, with reins at large entred within the ranks of the enemies, who being not marshalled and fet in order against such a blustringstorm of Horsemen, were with a sudden fear astonied. Whereupon, the troop of Fulvius which erewhile was in manner environed and compassed about, and had help and rescue almost too late, now all in general breathed themselves at ease, and were put to nothing. For these that came fresh and lusty undertook the whole weight of the conflict: which was neither long nor doubtful. The enemies were put to flight, and in difaray made hast to recover their camp, And when as the Romans advanted against them with banner displayed, they quit their place and retreated, gathering themselves round into heaps in the farthest part of the camp; and as they C would have fled out, they fluck fast in the narrow gaps and passages of the gates: a great part of them leapt upon the banck, to climb the rampier, if haply either from the higher ground they might defend themselves, or get over any where and escape. By chance in one place where the banck was not well rammed, the rampier was furcharged with the weight of fo many standing upon it, and so tumbled down into the trench. Whereupon, they set up a cry all together, That the Gods had made them way to escape, and by that means indeed they saved themselves; but more of them unarmed than armed. In this battel, were the forces of the Tulcans once again utterly abated : in io much as after they had capitulated and promifed a years pay, and corn for two months, the Dictator permitted them to fend Embassadors to Rome for a treaty of peace. Peace was denied, but truce for two years granted: and the Dictator with triumph returned into the D City. I find in some writers; that Hetruria was by the Distator quieted, without any norable battel, only by composing the variance and debate of the Arctins, and reconciling the family of the Licinii with the Commons. M. Valerius upon his Dictatorship became Consul. Some have believed that he was created without his own fuir, year and while he was absent, and that the said Election was held by the Interregent. But howsoever it was, out of all question, he bare the Consulthip with Apideius Panfa. Whiles M. Valerius and Q. Apaleius were Coff, all was well quieted abroad for the Tufcans of one fide, partly upon their ill fuccels in war and partly by reason of their truce, were forced to be stil and in repose. The Samnits also on the other side, being well tamed with the overthrows so many years together, repented not yet and were not weary of their new league. At Rome like-E wife the Commons were quiet, and found themselves much eased, and discharged of a great number of base and poor people, which were withdrawn and sent away into Colonies. But because their rest should not be every where entire and perfect, there arose a quarel between the chief and principal men of the City, as well the Nobles as Commons, and that by the figgeffion and infligation of Q, and Cn, Ogulari, Tribuns of the Com. Who having fought occasion and matter every way to accuse and blame the Nobility unto the Commons; when they saw all means affayed in vain, at length entred into an action, whereby they kindled and fet on fire not only the meaneff. but even the chief heads of the Commons, such as had been Consuls, and triumphed: who wanted no promotions and honors, but only Sacerdotal dignities and Prelacies, which as yet were not indifferently common to both States. They proposed therefore a Law, That whereas at that time Fthere were but 4. Augurs, and as many Prelats or Bishops, and for asmuch as they thought it good, that the number of Priests should be increased, there might be chosen to the rest, 4. Bishops, and 5. Augurs, all out of the body of the Commons. But how this Colledge or Fellowship of Augurs, was reduced to the number of four, but by the death of two, I can not find : fince this is certain, that among the Augurs the number must be odd: namely that the three ancient tribes, Rhamnenfes, Titienfes, and Luceres, should have each one their Augur: or if they needed more, they should with equal number increase those Priests: like as they were augmented and multiplied, when as five being put to four, made up the number of nine; that is to fay, for every tribe three. Howbeir, because they were chosen out of the Commons. who should supply, and make up the number; the Nobles took it as grievously to the heart, as when they saw the Consulthip parted equally in G common: but they made semblance as though this indignity perteined to the Gods more than to them: who would themselves see, that their holy service and sacred mysteries should not be polluted. And as for them, this only they could do, namely, pray and with, that no calamity thereby should light upon the common-weal. But less earnest were they in opposing themselves and making reliftance, for that they were used already in all such broils and contentions to have the worse and they saw besides, that their adversaries shot not at that (which in time past they could scarce hope for) namely, the greatest honours and dignities: but that they had already obteined all, for which they had (trived to long in to doubtful terms of hope, to wit, manifold Confulats, Cenforthips, and Triumphs. Howbere, the contention and dispute in debating and arguing to H and fro the law proposed, was mainteined (as men fay) between Ap. Claudius especially, and P. Decins Mus : and after they had conteffed and discoursed in their Orations pro & contra, the fame reasons in manner, touching the rights and liberties pretended by the Nobles and Commons, which fometimes had been alleaged, both for, and against the law Licinia, at what time as P. Dring Mus as it was fet on foot for the Commons to be Confuls & Decins (as it is faid) represented in open audience the very retemblance and shew of his father, in such manner, as many of them who were then present at the assembly , had seen him: to wir, girded and apparelled in Gabine robe. standing over his javelin, in which gesture, habit, and fashion, he offered himself to voluntary death, for to fave the people and legions of the Romans; "Seemed (quoth he) P. Decius, that I "then was Cof, as pure and religious in the fight of the immortal Gods, as if T. Manlius his col-" league had been likewije devowed and offered? and might not the same P. Decins have rightly "been cholen, to execute the publick divineservice and facrifices of the people of Rome? or is this "all the fear and doubt, that the Gods would give less ear to his prayers, than to Ap. Claudius? or "doth Ap. Claudius with more devotion serve God privately, and worship the Gods more reciligiously, than himself? Who was there ever that repented or misliked of the vows, which so "many Confuls and Dictators of the Com, either at their first fetting forth to their armies, or in time of war and battel, pronounced for the Common-wealth? Reckon and count the chief "Captains, year by year, fince the first time that the Commons began to have the leading and "conduct of the wars: number all the triumphs ever fince: it will appear that the Commons arek "no whit abashed, and have no cause to complain of their own nobility. And this I know for " certain, that if any new sudden war should arise, the Senat and people of Rome would repose "no more hope and confidence in the ancient Patritis, than in the Com. for to be the Captains "and Commanders. This being so, quoth he, what God or man can think it an indignity, to "adorn those persons also with the titles and ornaments of Bishops and Augurs, whom we have "honoured with chair of Ivory, with the long robe bordered with purple, with the coat of arms " embroided and branched with the palm tree, with the gown or mantle of purple, wrought with es divers colours, with the chaplets and coronets of triumph, and with the victorious branch and "garland of lawrel; whole houses ye have beautified above the rest, with setting up the spoils of "enemies? Or who can thinck much, if he be feen with a facring cup, or holy-water pot, and with L "acroifier staff, and his head vailed, either to kill a sacrifice, or to take Augury by slight of birds "from the castle hill; who hath been adorned and decked with the ensigns and ornaments of the "great God Jupiter, and hath ridden in a gilded chariot through the City into the Capitol? Or in "whose Title, inscription and stile over his image, men shall with content, read Consulthip, Cener forship and Triumph; will not the same abide to see and read that yehave added thereunto ei-"ther Augurship, or Pontifical dignity? I verily for my part hope (without the displeasure, and with reverence of the Gods be it ipoken) that we by the beneficence of the people of Rome are "fuch, as for our quality and worthiness, may and will yeeld no less credit and honor to our "Priest-hoods than we shall receive thereby : and who defire, in regard of the honor and service "of God, more than for our own lakes and proper interest, to have the means, That whom went " serve and reverence in private, those we may also worship and honor publickly. But why have "I hitherto so pleaded the cause, as if the Patritii were entirely alone intituled and invested in the " prerogative of Sacerdotal Dignities; and as though we were not already possessed of one right "honorable and principal Priest-hood? We see that the Decemvirs for celebration of sacrifices, " and for interpretation of Sibylla her Prophesies, and other the satal destinies of this people, the "Prelats also and Ministers of Apollo his facrifice, and other Holy Ceremonies, are of the Com-"mons. Neither was there any injury done unto the Parrituat that time, when for to gratify the "Commons, the number of the Duumvirs was increased; those I mean, who should oversee (28" " (inperintendents) the offering of facrifices. And now at this present they have no greater cause to "complain, if the Tribun, a flour and brave man, hath added five places more of Augurs, and four N " of Bishops, unto which commoners may be nominated: not to dispossess you of your rooms, " or to displace you, O Appius, but that men of the commons might affift you in the function and er ministery of divine servi e and Church matters: like as they do their part, and perform good ser-"vice inhuman and civilaffairs. And be not ashamed, O Appins, to have him for your colleague in "the Priest-hood, whom you might beform to have in Consular or Centorship, your companion es and fellow; unto whom being Dictator, you might be Collonel of Horse; as well as he to youin « your Dictatorship. Those ancient Nobles in old time (our progenitors) admitted into their num-"ber and order, a Sabine stranger, the very head and top of your nobility, one Ap. Clausur, or Ap. " Claudius (choic you whether.) You must not think much then, to accept us into the number of " Priests. We bring with us many honorable titles, even all the same that make you so proud, and 0 to bear your head aloft. L. Sextius was the first Commoner, created Consul; and C. Licinius Stolo "the first Collonel of Horse, C. Rutilius was the first Dictator and Censor, and Q. Publius Philo the "fieft Prætor. We have heard this fong evermore founding in our ears, That to you alone pertai-" neth the taking of Auspicia: that you only are of noble descent and gentility: that ye and none "but we, by right and duty ought to manage the affairs, and the foveraign government, both at "home and abroad; and yet alwayes hitherto the commons in their places and charges, have done 44 and fped as well as the Patritii, and henceforth ever shall (I doubt not.) What? heard ye never

Cen.

A c'ir spoken, that the Patritii were at first made and created, and not descended from Heaven; but fuch as were able to name their father and grandfire; that is to lay, even free men just, and "no more? What? I my lelf can nominate already mine own father to have been a Conful, and " shortly shall my son be able to alledge his grandire. There is nothing else. O Q irites, in the "matter whereupon westand, but that we may obtein all which hath been denied us. For the "Nobles defire only to maintain a fide and to contend, and care not greatly what iffue their "contentions come unto. As for me, I do advise, and this would I have. That (to the good pro-" fir, and happy estate of you all, and the weal publick) this law may pass under your affirmative "voyce [Utirogaftis.] Then presently the people commanded the Tribes to be called to a firsti-B ny: and soon it appeared, that the law would without all doubt be accepted: but that day was loft, by the opposition and negative of fome Tribuns. Howbeit, the morrow after, they were afraid to crois it; and then with exceeding content of all hands, it passed cleer. So there were created Prelats or Bishops; first; P. Decius Mus himself (that so pleaded for the law) with P. Sempronius Sophus, C. Martius Rutilius, and M. Livins Denter. Likewile five Angurs of the Commons, to wit. C. Genutius, P. Elius Parus, M. Minutius Festus, C. Martius, and I. Publius. So there were eight Prelats in number, and nine Augurs.

The same year, M. Valerius the Conini, procured the law of appealing to the people, more furely to be established and confirmed. This was now the third time after the deposition of the Kings, that this one Act was revived; and alwayes by the same honse or family of the Valerii. The C caule of renning the same so often, was no other I suppose, than this; for that the mightiness of some sew great men of the Patritii, was more powerful than the liberty and freedom of the Commons. Only the Law Portia, seemeth to have been enacted for to save the back and sides of Citizens from whipping, because that it awarded and set a grievous punishment upon him, that either had beaten or killed a Citizen of Rome. The Law Valeria, which forbad, to hourge or behead any man who oever, that made his appeal, had this annexed only, that if any one had trefpaffed and proceeded farther, it should be decreed, Leandly and naughtily done. Such was the modelty and reverence of men in those dayes, that this one addition [in my conceit verily] was supposed to be a sufficient bond to strengthen the Law. But now adayes, would a man scarcely threaten his servant or slave in that manner.

D The same Consul made war, without any worthy or memorable exploit, against the Æquians that rebelled; who (fetting afide their flout and proud flomacks) had nothing left of their ancient fortune and estate. The other Coss. Apuleius, besieged the Town * Nequinum in Umbria. The * The same place was difficult and hard to get up, and on the one fide fleep down right (whereas now flan- that Namie, deth Narnia) fo that it was impregnable, either by affault, or countermures and sconces what soever. Whereupon, the new Confuls, M. Fulvius Patus, and T. Manlius Torquatus, entred upon this enterprise, left undone and unfinished by the former. Now when all the Centuries nominated with one voyce Q, Fabius for the Consulship of that year, even without his own suit and seeking; Macer Licinius and Tubero do write, that he himself laboured to have that charge put off, and releaved unto a year of more war: alledging, that for the present he would serve the Com-E mon-weal in better stead, by bearing some civil office in the City: and so neither dissembling what he rather defired, nor yet feeking for it, he was made Ædile of the Chair, with L. Papirius Curfor. But, to fet this down for a certain truth I dare not; because that Pifo, a more ancient Writer of Chronicles, faith, that the Ædiles Curule of that year, were C. Domitins, Cn. F. Calvinus, Sp. Carvilius, and Q. Fabius Maximus. That furname, I suppose verily, gave occasion of the error in the Ædiles. Whereupon enfued a tale (forting to that error) mixed and compounded of the Elections of Ædiles and Confuls together. The same year was held a solemn survey and purging of the City by facrifice, called Lustrum, by P. Sempronius Sophus, and P. Sulpitius Averrio, and two Tribes more were added to the rest, Aniensis, and Tarentina. And thus much co verning the affairs at Rome. But now to return to Nequinum; after much time spent in long and lingring siege before the Town two of the inhabitants, whose houses joyned close to the wall, undermined the ground, and by a secret way came as far as the corps de guard of the Romans. From whence they were brought before the Conful, and promised him to let in and receive what garrison and troop of armed men he would, within the City. This offer was thought neither to be neglected and refused, nor yet rathly to be credited. So with the one of these twain (for the other was kept behind as an hostage) two other spies were sent by the same mine to discover the train. By whose relation, when it appeared sufficiently, that all was safe and without danger: by the leading and guiding of the traitor aforesaid, 300 armed men by night entred the City, & seized that gate which was next unto them: at which, being broken open, the Conful and the Roman army without relistance, made entry, and

G surprised the City. In this fort Nequinum was reduced to the obedience of the people of Rome. A Colony was thisher fent to Frontier against the Umbrians, called of the *Rivers name which *Nar, now Na runneth under it * Narnia. And the army with a rich prize was brought again to Rome.

The same year the Tuscans, contrary to the tenure of the truce, made preparation for war. But whiles they were bufily occupied otherwise, it fortuned, that a puissint army of Gauls invaded their merches, and for a while altered their defignments. Afterwards, by the means of mony whereof they were full and bare themselves mighty. they sought to make the Gauls, of enemies to become their friends, and follicited them to band together, and so jointly to maintain war with the Romars. Their iociety and friendship the barbarous people refused not; only, to they flood upon the fum what they should have for their hire. Which being agreed upon and received, and all things else in a readiness for to go into the field; when the Tuscans willed them to follow after, they flatly denied, that they had received any confideration for to make war upon the Romans: but whatfoever they had taken, it was because they should not wast the Tuscan Land, and by way of hostility and force of arms, do any violence upon the inhabitants: howbeir, if the Tuleans were so minded to employ them, they would be willing to serve, but for no other reward and recompence, than to be admitted into part of their territory; that at the length they might have some certain place of abode, to settle themselves in. Many Diets and consultations hereabout were held by the States of Tuscan, but nothing resolved and concluded: not so much ? for that they feared to part with some of their Lands, as because they were in great dread every one and abhorred, to have dwelling by them such neighbours, descended from so savagea race and cruel Nation. Thus were the Gauls let go and difmiffed, having away with them a huge mass of mony, which they got without any travel or peril of theirs.

The bruit of the Gauls tumult and infurrection, together with the Tuscans war, caused no little fear at Rome. Whereupon, more haft was made to conclude a league with the * Picene people. T. Manlius the Conful had the charge of the Tuscan war allotted unto him. Who scarcely was entred into the confines of the enemies, but as he was training and exercifing amongst the Hor emen, he ran his Horle with full carier, and fuddenly as he turned about, was call off, and prefently lay for dead : and so the Conful, three dayes after his fall, ended his life. Which the Tuscans r taking hold of, as a good ominous token and prefage, got heart and were very jolly; faying, that the Gods had in favour of them, begunthis war. This was heavy news at Rome, both for the loss of so brave a personage, and for the time, wherein so unhappily it fell out: so as, the affembly held (by the advice of the chief Peers) forto substitute a Consul in his place that was deceased, frighted the Senators from chung a Dictator. All their tentences, and all the centuries gave with M. Valerius to be Conful: who was the man, whom the Senat was about to have pricked for Dictator. Then forthwith, they ordained him to go into Tuicany to the army. Whose coming suppressed and kept under the Tuscans; so as not a man dust once go our of their trenches and hold Even their very fear was as good as a fiege unto them: for that the new Conful neither by wasting the fields, nor firing their houses in such fort, as every where, not only the small villages, but also I the good and wel-peopled Towns were feen to smoke and burn again, could draw them forth to

This war continued longer than men thought: but behold, there arose a bruit of another; (which, confidering the mutual loffes of both fides, was for good causes greatly to be seared) upon intelligence given from the Picenes their new allies, namely, that the Samnits were about to take arms and rebel, and had follicited them also to do the same. The Picentes were highly thanked for this, and a great part of the Senators care was diverted now from Tufcany to the Samnics. The dearth besides of corn and victuals troubled the City: and driven they had been to extream famine, if Fabius Maximus (as they have written, who are of opinion that he was Ædile that year) by provident purveighing and diligent conveighing of corn, had not been as careful and M industrious, in the dispensing of victual now at home, as many times before in war affairs. The same year there was an Interreign, but upon what occasion, it is not known. The Interregents were App, Claudius and after him P. Sulpitius, who held an Election of Confuls, and created L. Cornclius Scipio, and Cn. Fulvius.

In the beginning of this year, there came Orators from the Lucans to these new Consuls, for to make complaint, That the Samnits, who by no conditions and means could induce them for to band and take arms with them, were entred into their confines, and made wast of the "country, and by very force provoked them to war, faying, That the Lucans had long ago over-"fhot and passed themselves that way: but now they were so sully resolute, that they could "find in their hearts sooner to abide and endure all kind of calamity whatsoever, than ever after N "to offend and displease the Roman name. They belought the Senat therefore, to receive the "Lucans into their protection, and at o to keep and defend them from the violence and injury of "the Samnits. And for themselves, albeit entering into war already with the Samnits, they were of necessity bliged to be fast and true unto the Romans: yet for better security they were ready to put in sufficient hostages. The Senat was not long consulting hereabout: but all with one content were of opinion, to make league with the Lucans, and to fummon the Samnits to make amends and restitution. The Lucans, befides a courteous and gracious answer, were accepted into the league. Then were there Fecial Heralds dispatched to the Samnits, to give them warning for to depart the territory of the Roman allies, and to withdraw their forces out of the confines of the Lucans. But the Samnits fent out certain meffengers to meet them upon the way, and o to denounce unto them, that if they presented themselves in any Councel within Samnium, they should not depart again with lafeguard of their persons. When these news were heard at Rome. both the Senat advited, and the people allowed, to make war upon the Samnits. The Confuls parted their Provinces and charges between themselves. To Scipio fell Hetruria, and the Samnits to Fulvius and to they take their journey divers wayes, each one to the war allotted unto him. Scipio looked for no other, but a lingering war at the enemies hands, and like to the defensive service of the sormer year: but behold, they with an army well appointed and

A arranged, encountred him and gave him battel neer to * Volaterre; where they fought the better . Voliters part of the day, with much blood hed on both fides: and whiles they were doubtful which way the victory went, the night came between. But the morning after bewrayed both who were winners, and who were lolers. For the Tulcans in the fill and dead time of the flight disloged The Roman Conful coming forth into the field, and leeing by the enemies departure, the victory confessed; went forward to the camp: which he found empty of men, but full of rich pillage, (for they had fearfully and in great hast abandoned their tents) and was master thereof. From thence he retired his forces into the territory of the Falircans; and after he had left at Falerii, all his bag and baggage with a meetly garrifon there; lightly appointed, he marched forward, and with a Brunning Camp wasted the marches and territories of his enemies. He put all to fire and sword: drave away booties from all parts: and left not the ground only, wast and defart, but fet fire also upon Cattles and borrough Towns. Only he forbare to affault the great and strong Cities; into which fear had driven the Tuscans for refuge. Cn. Fulvius the Coniul on the other part fought a noble battel in Samnium, neer * Bovianum, and the victory was no whit doubtful. After which * Boiano. he affailed Bovianum, and not long after Aufidena: and both Cities he wan by force. The fame year was there a Colony brought to "Carfeloi within the territory of the Aguiculi. And Fulvi- Acceloi us the Conful triumphed over the Sampits. When as now the time of the Confuls Election drew neer; there was a rumour railed, that the

Tuscans and Samnits were levying and enrolling of great and mighty forces: that openly in all their C Assemblies and Diets, the Princes of the Tuscans were checked and reproved, for that they had not waged the Gauls to war, whatfoever it had cost them: that the Magistrates of the Samnits were blamed, for exposing that army as it were a prey unto the Romans, which had been provided a gainst their enemies the Lucans. For now seeing that the enemies both with their own power, and also with the help of their allies, were come to war; they should not be able to march them, having their forces thus redoubled. Now albeit there were other famous and renowned persons flood to be Confuls, yet this new fear and affright turned all men to be come favourits of Q. Fabius Maximus: who at the first made no juit, and afterwards, seeing the inclination of their affections, refused also to be Consul. "Demanding, what they meant to trouble and molest him, so "aged a man as he was, and one, who as as he had gone through all labours and travels of this D. world is to he had passed also the rewards, and recompenses of his travels: alledging, that neither fifength of body, nor vigor of spirit could alwayes continue the same, and last for ever : and "befides, he feared fortune her felf, left haply the might be thought of any of the Gods too pro-" pirious and favourable unto him, and more permanenethan the ordinary train and course of this world would permit. Therefore, like as himfelf had grown up after the glory of his elders, ee and succeeded them, so he saw and beheld with joy of heart, others also rising up after him, and "to succeed him in the like glory: and as there wanted not at Rome high promotions and advanceements for hardy and valiant men, fo there failed not brave men of worth for to receive those "honors and dignities. But by this refutal of his to modelt to just and reasonable he whetted and kindled more and more their earnest affections and favours cowards him, which he thinking to E dull and quench, with the reverent regard and awe of the laws, commanded a statute to be read, wherein it was not lawin for one and the lame man within ten years to be created Conful twice. But searchy for the notic that the people made, could this law be heard read: and the Tribins of the Com, laid, that this flould be no let; for they would prefer a bill unto the people, that he might be discharged and dispensed with a storm the Statutes in that behalf, Howbeit hestood stiffy fill in his refulal; demanding of them to what purpole and end were the laws made, if by the very makess thereof, they might be thus deladed and made of no force? For so (qd, he) laws ruled not, but were over-ruled. But nevertheleless the people went to a feruiny and began to give their voyces; and as every Century was called into the rails, they named and choic Fubius Confull withvoyces and as every county was an early specified with the specified and confert of the out flicking at the matter. Then at last, specified with the specified and confert of the whole City. God lay Amen (quoth he) O Quiries, to that you do and are about. But for affinith as you will have your wil and dilpose of me at your pleasure; do me this favour yet, that I may have the chung of my Colleague. The feech you make Conful with me; PiDeliu, a man ap-"proved title me already, with whom, I have forced well in the fellowship of another office: a man I fay, an werable otherwife to the greatness of his mane; and worthy of his fathers verme, of from whom he is descended. This fayour which he requested feemed unto them just and reasonable. So all the Centuries behind, created Q. Fabius and R. Decimifor Confirts. The lame year the Adiles served process upon very many Cuizens a for holding and posfelling of more Lands, than by Law was limited: and none in a manner, was able to acquirihing fell heteor. Which was a great bridle and refleat to abeit unmeasurable systice: As the Grew Cooking and P. Deeius Mas the third time, con-Samints, and the other the Tuicans; and conjuded what forces might ferre and the other the Tuicans; and conjuded what forces might ferre and be fufficient for this or that Province and exploit; and to whether war either of them were the more meet and aufficient Leader : Gertain Emballadors, from Survium, Nepes, and Falerii, advertifed them. That the States of Julcanie, were now consulting in their Diets, about a Treaty of peace?

which was an occasion, that they turned all their preparations and forces into Samnium. The

Confuls being gone forth, to the end they might have the readier provision of grain and

Victuals, and the enemy be more to feek, which way they would affail them, led their Legions to into Samnium; Fabius, through the territory of Sorajand Decius by the way of the Sidicins, When they were come into the confines of their enemies, both of themspred themselves all abroad and fell to forrage and ipoil the country : yet fo, as they fent out their eipials farther than they waited Whereupon, they were well aware of their enemies, as they lay in ambush well appointed, within a close and secret valley neer Tifernum; what way as they thought to take the vantage of the higher ground, and to fer upon the Romans fo food as they were once ntred in. Fabius having removed his carriages into a fureplace, and fet there a competent guard for defence, fore-told his fouldiers that there was a battel towards: and in a four-fquare battaillon marched directly to the fortaid Embalcado, where the enemies lurked and lay in wait. The Samnits then, despairing and I out of all hope to do any great exploit, by fudden tumult, confidering their trains were discovered; and seeing they must once at the length come to the tryal in open field, were themselves also more willing to put all upon a fet battel. Thereupon they descended into the plain and even ground, and committed themselves to the fortune of fight, with more courage of heart than hope of victory. But were it, that they had affembled together the whole flour and manhood out of all the Nations of the Samnits, or that the hazard of the main chance made them more hardy and take the better heart: furely even in plain field, they held the Romans play and put them to great fear. Fabius feeing the enemies no way to retreat and give ground, commanded M. Flavius and M. Valerius, two Colonels, with whom he had fet forward and advanced into the forefront, to go to the Horsemen, and to exhort them, If ever they remembred and called to mind, that the K Common-wealth had been helped by the valour of the Gentlemen on horseback, they should that day endeavour to make invincible and eternal the glory of that degree and order of Cavalry. For feeing that the enemies flood unmoveable against the Infantry, there was no other hope but in the force of Horsemen: and here withal he called upon those two young Gentlemen, and plyed both the one and the other with like courtely, one while praising them, another while loding them with fair and large promises. But when as the assay of that force likewise, prevailed not. thinking where strength would take no place, there crast was to be tryed and practiled, he caused Scipio his Lieutenant, to withdraw out of the conflict; the javeliniers of the first legion, and as closely as he could to fetch about with them, toward the next hills : and then, to march up the hill some way from the fight of the enemies; and after he had gained the top, all of a sudden to L thew himself behind, and charge upon the enemies backs? whiles their faces were turned another way. Now the Horsemen, by the direction of those two Colonels, being ridden of a sudden before the standards troubled their own fellows almost asmuch as the enemies. For against these troops and cornets of Horse that thus violently put forward, the Samnits battel stood unmoyeable, and on no part could either be forced to retreat, or to break their array. The Horsemen when they faw this attempt to take no effect, retired themselves behind the enfigns, and departed out of the battel. Hereupon took the enemies more heart unto them i neither had the vanguard of the Romans been able to abide to long a conflict, and the violence of the enemies full encreasing. upon their own confidence, but that the fevond ranges in the middle ward, by the Conful his commandment, came forward into the front of the vanguard. Where they with their fresh frength, M flayed the Samnits, being now ready to enter forceably upon them? and to gain the ground: andwithal, at the time appointed, the enfigns shewed the filelyes from the hills, and came down unawares to the enemies; and letting up a fhout not only daunted the hearts of the Sampits but ale so encouraged the Romans.] For both Fabius cryed aloud; that his Colleague Decini approached, and every fouldier for his part, what he might, with joyful and cheerful hearts, iterated, that the other Conful was come, and the legions were at hand. Which error and millaking as it turned to the good of the Romans, fo it caused the Samnies to flie, and to be surprized with a fright, fearing and doubting nothing so much, as that being now overtoiled and wearied, they should be overcharged allowith fresh and lusty forces, And for that in their running every way, they were scattered afunder there was less staughter than for the preparation of so great a victory. For 3400 N only were flain, and of prifoners were taken, welneer three hundred and thirty: and three and twenty bonners and entigns won and carried away. The Apulians had joyned with the Sampits. before the battel. but that P. Decins the Conful encamped against them at Maleventum, and having drawn them forth to fight, difcomfitted them. Where also there were more that fled, than died upon the (word : for not above 2000 Apulians were flain. And Decise making no reckoning of that enemy, conducted his legions into Sammiam. Where, two Confular holls, having over two the country in divers parts within five months space laid all wast and desolate. Five and forty places there were in Summum where Decius had encamped and eighty fix, wherein the other Conful had pitched. In which, they left behind them not only the marks of flakes, rampires, and dirches. but also many other more notable figns and tokens of the country wasted all about, O and atterly spoiled by them. Pabius besides, won the City Cimetra. Where there were taken priloners two thousand and four hundred armed fouldiers, and flain there were in fight upon

From thence he went to Rome against the Election of new Consuls, and made all the hast he could to disparch that business. And when as all the Centuries first called forth to give their inffrages, named Q. Fabius for the Conful; then Appius Claudius a Confular man, and one of the Competitors, a grim fir, and ambitious by nature, laboured no more for his own honour and ad-

A vancement, than to recover again unto the Patritis, both the rooms of the Confulfhip, and employeda's well his own devoir, as also all the means and affiltance of the Patritii and Nobility, to have hmiself chosen Consul with Q. Fabius. As for Fabius, at the first, spake and alledged in his own be half, the same reasons in manner which he had nied the former year, and rejused to be Consul. The whole body of the Nobility stood about his seat, praying instantly, and entreating him to pluck the Consulthip out of the mire and base degree of these Commons, and to restore the ancient Ma jefty both to the Magistracy it self, and alloto the Parini and their houses and families. Fabina after filence made, framed a middle and moderate kind of speech, whereby he appeased and allayed their hot affection, promiting and afforing them, that he would willingly ac-B cept the names of two of the Nobility, if the might fee, that they would create any other Conful but himself: for at this present Election, he would in no wise admit himself, to be eligible and nominated Conful, and give so bad a precedent to prejudice all course of law, for the time to come. So L. Volumnius, out of the body of the Commons, was created Contul with App. Claudius, who likewise in the former Consulship had been matched Colleagues together. The Nobility used to object unto Fabins, and reproached him, that he avoided App. Claudius to be his companion in government, who for eloquence and other civil parts was no doubt a fingular and excellent man. When the Election was ended, the old Confuls were commanded to war in Samnium, having their Government continued, and their commission renued for six months. And so in the year following likewise, when L. Volumnius and Appius Claudius were Connls, P. Decius, C who being Conful, had been left behind his Collegue in Samnium, ceased not now in quality and name of Proconful, to wast the country; until at length, when the Samnits would in no place abide battel, they were by him chased out of their own borders and limits. And thus driven out of the field, and excluded out of their own country, they went into Hetrures. Where, supposing that with so huge a multitude of armed men, they should do that more effectually with intreaty and prayers, mingled with threats among which by so many Embassinges they had so oft attempted in vain; they called for a Diet and general Councel of the States and Princes of Hetruria, "Which being affembled, they declared and shewed, for how many years space they had main-"tained war with the Romans in the right of their freedom; that they had allayed all means, if "haply they might have been able by their own puissance alone, to sustain and support the weight D " of so huge and important a war: that they had besides made proof of the aids of other neigh-"bour nations, but to little effect; that they had fought for peace of the people of Rome, when "they were not able to wage war any longer: and because peace was more grievons unto them "with that subjection, than war with their liberty, they had rebelled and made war again: and "now their only hope they had, remained in the Tuscans: knowing well enough, that for men-"munition, and mony, they were the mightieft nation of all Italy; as having to their neighbours "the Gauls, a people born and bred up in armor and war: by natural disposition fierce and ctuel, " but especially in any quarrel against the people of Rome : of whom they do (and not untruly reseport) that they were by them vanquilhed and constrained to ransome themselves for gold. Now, if the Tulcans were of that heart and courage, as Porfesa sometimes, and other their no-E " ble progenitors were : there were no doubt, but that they might diffeize the Romans, and dif-" potlets them of all the ground on this fide Tybris, and make them fight for the defence and pre-" fervation of their lives, and not for the intofferable feignory and dominion of Italy. They faid "moreover, that there was now come unto them an army of Samnits, well appointed and fursemished with armone, and flored with pay and mony, who would follow them forthwith, even "to the affault of the City of Rome, if they would lead them. Whilesthey were thus braving, and glorioully boalting themselves , and preparing of war in Tulcame, the Romans wer et their own dores, lay fore upon them, and stung them at the heart, For P. Decrae having learned by the cipials, that the Samhits army was gone torth, and had taken their voyage, affembled a Comtel and faid, What mean we thus to range over the fields, war-pring from village to village? And not rather affail the walled Powns and Brong Cities? There is moarmy now, that defendeth Sammium) gone they are out of their confines, and wrought their own exilerand banishment. When they all had allowed of this motion, he led forth his power to affanle the firong City Mirgania. And to horly were the fouldiers let, both for the love shey bare to their Captain; and also for Hone of winning a rither pillage thereby, than by driming booties out of the olinity, that in one day by mere force of arms they won the Town. Where two thouland and one hundred Samolts, fighting meh, Either fell upon the edge of the sword, or were taken prisoners, with a great and rich booty befides. But for fear that it should suchage and ensumber the army with heavy carriages. Decime caused his souldiers to be called sor gether unto an andience; and thus rortiem he faid. "And writte stand concerned indeed, with G Kthis victory only, and this prey? Or will ye build your hope Hill, answerable to your prowels " and valour? All the Cities of the Samnits, all the substance and riches that lieth and remainsult "in their Civies are yours for affinch as ye have in so many barrels vanquished their legions, and st last driven them out of their own country. Sell these prizes, and with hope of gain draw "after you chapmen and merchants to follow the army. I will from time to time fall help you to st wares and commodities for to fell. Let it go from hence fliggint to the City Remules, where syour toil thall not be fo great, but the spoil far greater. So, when they had made fale of their

to Romulea they go. Where likewise, without mure and platform, without warlike engines of p battery, fo foon as they advanced their enfigns, and approached the walls, they could by no violence be driven from thence, but fet up ladders in all haft, at the next place that every man could find, and to scaled up the walls. Thus the Town was won and ransacked. To the number of 2300 were flain, and 6000 taken prisoners. The fouldiers having got an exceeding booty, were forced to fell it, and make all away, as before: and from thence without any reft at all given unto them were they led to Ferentinum, yet they marched thither with exceeding courage and cheerfulnes. Howbeit there they found more difficult and perilous service: for the walls were with all forcible means defended, and the place it felf was both by mans hand, and natural fituation, furely fenced: but yet the fouldiers now being fleshed, and enured to spoil, overcame all difficulties. Three I thousand men about the walls were flain: and the saccage sell to the souldiers share. The greatest part of the honor in affaulting and winning of these Cities, is ascribed in some Chronicles to Fabiu Maximus. For they write, that Murgania was by Decius won, but Ferentinum and Romulea, by the conduct of Fabius. But some attribute the glory hereof unto the new Consuls. And there are, that give the glory not to both, but to the one of them, to wit, P. Volumnius, unto whom befell the Province of Samnium.

Whiles these affairs thus went in Samnium (by whose leading and managing it skils not) in the mean time a mighty war was a preparing in Hetruria; and that, of many nations banded together: the principal author whereof was Gellins Egnatius a Samnit. The Tulcans, in manner all. had taken arms and levied their forces, and the neer fociety, caused also the people of Umbria ad - K joyning to take their part : befides, Gauls also were waged for mony to aid: all which multitude affembled together, and met in the Samnits camp. The news of which sudden and unexpected tumult, being brought to Rome; for somuch as P. Volumnius the Cos. with the second and third legions, and with 1 5000 confederats was gone already into Samnium; it was thought good and determined, that App, Claudius with all speed possible, should go into Hetruria: and after him, two Roman legions followed, to wit, the first and fourth, with twelve thousand allies; who encamped not far from the enemy. But more good was done there, in respect that they came this ther betimes, (to the end that the fear of the Roman name might keep in awe certain nations in Hetruria, which already intended war) than for any exploit performed either skilfully or luckily, under the conduct of the Conful. Many skirmilhes there passed in places of disadvantage, and at I times unconvenient; in so much, as the enemy took more heart, and conceived greater hope every day more than other: and now it grew welneer to this point, that neither ion dies could well reckon of the sufficiency of Captain, nor Captain trust upon the loyalty of the souldier. In three feveral Annals I find, that Appine dispatched his letters to his fellow Consul, and fent for him out of Samnium: howbeit, I am loth to fet this down, being fo uncertain as it is a feeing that the very Confuls themselves of Rome, who now the second time were coupled together in one government, contested, and openly jarred about this point; whiles Appins denied flatly that he fent any script at all, and Volumnius again avouched, that he was sent for by Appius his his letters. Volumnius by this time had won three Callles in Samnium, wherein were flain three thouland enemies; and almost halt so many taken prisoners: and composed besides the sedicions and quarrels w of the Lucans, which arose from the Commons and needy persons; and that, with the exceeding good contenument of the chief and principal personages of the country, by the means and mediation of Q. Fabins the Proconful, who was thither fent with the old army. This done, he left Decius to wast and pill the country of the enemies, and himself with his forces marched toward his Colleague into Hetruria. Who at his first coming, was received generally with all the joy that might be. For mine own part, I suppose verily, that as Appius had good cause to cary an angry fromack with him, in case his conscience bare him witness, that he wrote not unto him: so 4gain; if he had need of his Colleagues aid, he shewed an illiberal, unkind, and unthankful nature of his own, in that he would to diffemble, and not be known thereof. For being come forth to meet him, before they had well greeted and faluted one another, How now, quoth be, O L. V. N lumning, is all well? How goes the World in Sannium? What hath moved you to abandon and leave your own charge and province, and to depart? Volumnius made answer, that in Samnius all things went well and chieved prosperously, and that himself was now come, as sent for by his letters: which if they were counterfeit, and that there were no need of him in Hetraria, he would prefently turn his enfigns, and be gone. Mary, quoth be and good leave have you : you may be gone when you will, and no man holderh you; and ill beleeming it is, that you who peradventure are not able to wield and manage your own affairs of war, frould glory thus, and make your boaft that you are come hither to belp others, Hereat Volumpius should reply again and says It is well, and God fend us good luck: Lhad rather lofe my labour, than ough thould have hapned, whereby one Confuls army were not sufficient to deal with Herroris. Nowasthe Confuls o were parting afunder one from the other, the Lieutenants and Colonels of Apping his army, came and flood round about them both: "fome requested their own General, that the aid of his Coltaleague which opphe to have been accepted by them if it had been required; now that it was "offred to willingly, and of his own accord, thould not be refuted and rejected. But the more "part encountred Volumnius, as he was ready to go his way, and earneftly befought him not for "any froward contention, and debate with his companion, to betray the common-weal. For if "any overthrow or misadventure should happen, the blame would be imputed rather to the for-

"faker than the forfaken: and now things were come to this pass, that the honor or dishonor of "the war in Herraria, prove it well or ill, should fall upon L. Volumnius: for that no man would "enquire of the words and language that Appius gave him, but of the fortune and success of the ar-"my: and albeit Appins had given him his farewel and pasport, the weal publick and the army held "him fill by the sleeve, and for proof hereof, let him but make tryal or the foundiers hearts and "affections. Thus with remonstrances, perswassions, and hearty prayers to the one Consul and the other, they drew them both, in manner against their wils, to party in publick audience before the whole army. Where they grew to longer ipeeches and discourses, but to the same purpose and effect, as before in the hearing and presence of a few. Now when Volumnius (as having the better B caule/seemed to reply, and that with good grace & words enough, against that singular eloquence of his Colleague; and that Appins in irumping and taunting manner, gave out and faid, That they were beholden to him, and might con him thank, that of a dumb and congue-tied Conful they had one now, that was so ready and eloquent : and who in his sormer Contuiship, and specially in the first months, could not open his mouth, and speak a word, was now of a sudden become an Orator, and able to make plaufible and popular Orations: then replied Volumnius and faid, "Would "God, with all my heart, you rather had learned of me to fight valuantly, then I of you to speak "finely; and in conclusion, he said, he would tender him an offer, which should determine and put "out of all doubt, whether of them twain, were, not the better Lawyer and Orator (for at this " present the Common-wealstood not in need of such) but the better warrior and Captain Gene-C " ral. Whereas therefore, there are ii. Provinces, Herrura and Samnium, it shal be in your choice ''(qd, he) to take one of them, whether you will, and I my felf will with my own army, make war "in the other. Then began the fouldiers to cry aloud unto them, that they would jointly enter "both upon the Tulcan war. Which confent and accord of theirs, when Volumnius had perceived, "For afmuch (qd, he) as I have once militaken and militaterpreted the will of my Colleague, I wil " not in any case stand in doubt and be ignorant of your minds too: Let me know therefore by a "fhout of yours, whether you would have me tarry or depart? Whereat they fet up fuch a note, that it gave an alarm to the enemies, and raifed them out of their camp; and prefently they caught their weapons up, and came forth into the field. Volumnius likewife cauled the trompets to found, and the standards and ensigns to be brought abroad. Then Appias (as it is reported) seeing plain-D ly that whether he fought or face fill, the victory would be afcribed to his Colleague, flood in a mammering and sulpenie for a while: but afterwards fearing, left that his own legions also would follow Volumnius, gave likewife unto his menthe fignal of battel, which they to instantly called for, But neither they, nor the enemies were well arranged and in good order: for both the leader of the Samnits (Gedius Egnatius) was gone a foraging abroad, with some sew cohorts and bands with him; whereupon the fouldiers rather of their own head, than by conduct and direction of Captains; began to charge: and also the Roman armies were not both lead sorth together nor yet had time enough to be marshalled accordingly : for Volumnius first gave the charge before that Appius could come to encounter the enemies: whereupon, the forefronts were not equally matched together: and as if some fortune had exchanged the enemies, that they were wont to sight withal ; E the Tulcans presented themselves to Volumnius, and the Samnits who stayed awhile (for that their General was ablent) affronted Appius. It is reported that Appius in the very heat of the skirmish, was feen in the front of the formost ensigns, to liftup his hands to Heaven, and pray in this wife, "OLady Bellana, if thou give us victory and the honor of this day then, be fure, I vow here unto "thee at this hour, a fair Temple. When he had thus prayed, as if the goddels had put life unto him, and animated his courage, both himlelf matched the valour of his Colleague, and his army antwered the vertue of their Commander, For he performed the devoir and part (indeed) of a brave General. The fouldiers likewise, for fear that the other army should begin the victory, endeavoured and streined all that ever they could; Whereby, they distrayed, discomsted, and put to flight the enemies, who could not eafily abide any extraordinary force and violence, more than Fthey were wont to meet withal. And so with pressing hard upon them still that retreated, and chasing them hotly that were scattered in flight, they bear them into their camp. There, by the coming in of Gellins and the Sabellian bands, the battel for the time was freshly renewed. But when they also, within a while were discomfitted; then was the camp assaulted by the conquerors. Thus whiles Volumnius for his part entred with banner displayed unto the very gate, and Appins ever and anon reiterated the name of Bellona the victress, and all, to set on fire and inflame the courage of his fouldiers; there was neither trench nor campier that could hold them back. So the camp was won and facked, and a huge pillage thereinfound, which was given all to the fouldiers. Seven

During the time that both Confuls, and the whole puillance of the Romans, were thus more the marches of the Roman Dominion: who taking their way through the Vefilins, into Campania and the country of Falerias, drave huge prizes and booties away. And as Voluminias of their primers returned into Samniams (for by this time Fabius and Decius were cometo an end of their protogued government) the bruit that was blown abroad of the Samnis army and their forraging of the territory of Cappaa, turned him out of his way, to the defence of his allies and confederats. So foon as he was entred into the country Calebaum, both himfelf faw the fresh marks and tokens of great dammage and desolation: and also the Calenians advertised him, that the enemies carried with them already to excessive a prey and booty, that they were scarce able for the it to march in good order, and that their Captains began openly to speak and say, that the best course they could take, was presently to retire Samnium, there to leave their prizes and booties. and to to return afresh to their rodes and make new expeditions; and not to commit an army, to laden and furcharged, to the fortune and hazard of a battel. Which words, aibeit they founded much to a truth, yet he thought it meet to look better into the matter, and to build upon a inter ground, and therefore he tent certain light Hortemen, to intercept tome forragers as they flragled and were scattered one from another in the fields. By whom he learned, after much question-* Natarone, or ing with them, that the enemies encamped by the river * Vulturnus, and from thence at the third watch, would fet forward on their journey directly into Samnium. After he had sufficient intel-I licences and advertitements concerning these things, he dislodged and put himself upon his way and encamped to far from the enemies, as his approach by being too neer could not be known, and yet he might be able to surprise them as they should issue in disorder out of their camp. So a good while before day, he marched towards the enemy: and fent such as were well feen in the Olcian tongue, to liften and learn what they did. Who being intermingled with the enemies (which was an easy matter in that night garboil and consustion) they found that the entigns were fer forward, not sufficiently accompanied with armed men for defence; and that the whole pillage with the guard and convoy thereof, was now going forth, and marched carelefly like a fort of vile and base lozels, every man thinking of his own particulars and running on his own head, without confent of others, and with little or no direction and government. This was thought the meetelf w rime to let upon them: and now it drew neer day. Wherevpon he commanded the trumpets to found the charge, and fet upon the march of the enemies. The Samnits, incumbred as they were, and peffered with their booty, and few of them here and there in armour, began, some of them to double their pace and to march faster away, and drive before them the booty: some stood fill, and wift not whether they were better, to go on forward, or retire again into the camp. But whiles they thus trifled and stayed, they were environed and surprized by the Romans: and by this time they had gotten over their rampier: much killing there was, and confusion in the camp. The Samnits, as they marched, besides that they were troubled with the assault of their enemies, were also disquieted with the sudden escape and revolt of their prisoners: who being some of them loose, loosed also those that were bound : whiles others of them, caught up their wea-L pons which were fastned to the packs, and being confusedly intermingled in the march, madea greater and more fearful garboil and havock, than the very battel of the enemies. And more than that, they performed one memorable and notable Act above the rest. For as Stating Eqnative the General, went about the ranks and files encouraging the fouldiers to fight, they fet upon him, scattered the Horsemen afunder, that accompanied him, environed him about, and took him as he fat on Horseback, and haled him to the Roman Conful. Upon which tumult and ftir, the formost ensigns of the Samnits were called back, and the batter which in manner was done, now began afresh: yet could not they any long time resist and hold out. Slain there were about fix thouland; two thouland and five hundred taken prisoners. Amongst whom were 4 Colonels and 30 Enfigns and (that, wherein the victors took contentment) of captives, 7000 M and 400 hundred were again recovered; with an exceeding great booty which they had got from their allies: whereunto, by proclamation were called, all that could lay any claim, or pretend a right, to seize upon their own goods, and to receive the same by a day appointed. And look what parcels could not be owned or challerged by the true owner, was given away to the fouldiers: who were compelled to make sale thereof, to the end, that they should not set their heart upon any This faccage of the territory of Capua, had railed great trouble and stir in Rome. And at the very fame time also, it chanced, that there came news out of Heirnria, how that upon the withdrawing of Volumnius his forces out of those parts , all that country was no afresh in arms; that Gellius Egnatius the Samnit Captain, and the Umbrians likewife, were moved to revole; and the N Gauls also follicited with great sums of mony. At this bruit the Senat being affraid, commanded an abitinence or vacation of term, and that all forts of men should be mustered : and not only the free born natural citizens, and the flower of the youth were prest and sworn, but * Cobartete i. of certain * companies also of the elder fort, yea, and bands of Libertins newly enfranchised, were inrolled by the hundreds. Likewise they sat in Councel about devising means for defence of the City: and P. Sempronius the Pretor, had the whole government of the State. But the Senat was partly eased and discharged of this care, by the letters of L. Volumnias the Cos. which gave intelligence that the forragers of Campain were defeated, flain, and put to flight. Therenpon were decreed in favour of the Conful, for this exploit by him archieved, folemn processions, and the abstinence of term again was remitted, which had continued for eighteen dayes space: and the procef-o fion aforesaid, was right joyfully performed. Then began they to devise about garrisons for defence of the country, thus wasted and overrun by the Samnits. And agreed it was that two Colonies should be sent about the Vestin and Falern coasts, one to the mouth of the river Livis, which Colony was called * Minturna, the other in the Vestinforrest and streights, adjoyning to the Falern country; where Synope, a Greek Town sometime stood, and afterwards was called by the " Sinuesta, ver Romans there inhabiting, * Sinuesta. The Tribuns of the Com. had in charge to ordain by an Act of the common people, that P. Sempronius the Pretor should choose certain Triumvirs, about the sending and translating of inhabitants into those Colonies. But much ado they they about the schooling and training or maintained into stole Coloners, furpoing indeed that they were hadro find those that willingly yeelded to be involled Coloners, supposing indeed that they were fent thither, not to inhabit Land and ground for their best behoof, but to lie in garrison, and to fland upon their guard in those frontiers, which were continually molested by warlike enemies, From the care of these affairs, the Senat was withdrawn, by occasion of the Tuscans war, whereof the rumour daily encreased: and letters also came thick from Appius, who warned them not to negleft the rining of that countrey: which letters imported, that four nations had united their forces, and banded themselves together; to wit, Tuscanie, Samniam, Umbria, and the Gauls: that they were already encamped in two places, for that one was not able to receive fo great a militi-B tude. Upon these occasions, as also for that the time drew neer of Election of Consuls, Lucius Volumnius the Contul was called home to Rome. Who before that he called the Centuries for to give their voyces, having assembled the people to an audience, discoursed before them at large, concerning the greatness of the Tuscan war. "How that afore time, when he himself and his brother Conful warred there together, it was offo great importance, that neither one lea-"der, not yet one army was jufficient: and by report, the Umbrians, and a mighty power of "Gauls were afterward combined unto them, So that they should remember, that they were to "chuse that day two Coss, against four Nations, As for himself, but that he was certainly per-"fivaded and affured, that the people of Rome would with a general content declare him Coff, "who at that time, without all controversie was counted the principal Captain and best leader of C "all others, he would forthwith nominat a Dictator. No man dou red, but the Q Fability was the man, who by the affent of all, was meant and deflined to this charge: and him together with Volumnius, both the prerogative tribe, and all those that were called first, every one, nominated to be Coff, Fabius made a speech by way of excuse, in substance, like as he had done before, two years together: but afterwards seeing he was overcome with the general agreement of the people, he framed it so in the end, that he required P. Decini to be his collegue: "Alledging, that he would be in itead of a good prop and itay to him in his old age: how he had found by expe-« rience in one Centorthip and two Confulthips, born jointly together with him, that there was "no furery and desence of the Common-weal, to the concord and agreement of those that are come panions in government. And to any other new Collegue besides him, hardly could an old mans D " mind fore and frame. Also that he would and could more easily impart his mind and purpose to "one, whose humor, condition, and behavior, he had been already acquainted with. The Cost. himself confirmed his Oration, and accorded thereunto; as well, in regard of the commendable parts and deferts of P. Decius, as also of the good that proceeded and ensued upon the managing of war-affairs, by the concord and unity of the Consuls; and of the hurt which happed and sollowed upon their disagreement and diffention: "and therewith he shewed how neer they were e of late to utter peril and destruction, through quarrels between him and his brother Appias; "admonishing Decins and Fabius both to live lo, as with one mind and heart they affected and intended the same things. He added moreover and said, they were men of Action both, born for « war and to be fouldiers; for martial feats renowned already: but for to maintain contentions E "ofwords and quarrels of the tongue, altogether rude and unskilful, and fuch natures, (faid he

"were fittelt to make Consuls. As for nimble heads and fine wits, deeply seen in points and "quircks of law, full of their eloquent tearms, such as Ap. Clandins was; those were meet to be "made Lord Prefidents of the City and chief Justices in the common place, for to fit in judgment se of causes, and see the execution of laws. Thus in handling of these matters was that day spent, The morrow after, according to the Confuls appointment, was the Election held, both of new Confuls, and also of Pretors. Q. Fabius and P. Decius were created Confuls, and App. Claudius Pretor, all abient. And L. Volumnius by Act of the Senat, and grant of the Commons, had his government prorogued, and continued in his charge one year longer.

The fame year were many strange fights and prodigious monsters seen: for the turning away For the dangers forefignified and menaced thereby, the Senar decreed supplications and Letanies for two dayes together. Wine and incense for the sacrifices, was allowed at the publick charges of the City, and in procession went both men and women in great number, with much reverence, to visit the Holy shrines, and there to do their devotions. Their solemn supplications were more renowned and memorable, by reason of a contention that arose among the dames of the City, in the Chappel of Lady Pudititia Patritia, which standeth in the beast-market, by the round Church of Hercules. The Noblemens wives would not admit into that Chappel Proginia the daughter of Aulus, who, notwithstanding she was nobly descended from the race of the Patriti. yet had espouled Volumnius the Consul, a Commoner and was married (iorsooth) out of the family and ranck of the Parritii. Whereupon, there began some short and cutted shrewd G words to be dealt between: and so (as women commonly are soon angry and set on fire) there grew to heart-burning and hot contention. Whiles Virginia alledged and faid, that the being a Gendewoman and Parritia born, and a chaft and honest Dame, was entered in the Chappel of Patritian Chaffic es: over and befides, she had not been noted for Bigamy; but was the wife of one only husband . unto whom the was given and brought a pure maid : and as for her husband, and his dignities which he had born, his noble acts that he had atchieved, the had no cause to complain, or be ashamed, nay rather, the gloried therein right greatly. After this, she accumulated these magnificent and glorious words, with a generous and brave a deed. For in the long freet where the dwelt, the fer by and cut off a part of her dwelling house, as much as would a lerve for an Oratoy or pety Chappel, and there erested an Altar. And when she had affembled the wives of the Commoners together,, and had complained of the injurious dealing of the Patritian dames; "This altar (quoth the) do I dedicate unto Pudicitia Plebeia: and all you here I exhort, that with what emulation, the men our husbands, in this City contend about feats of valour "and arms, who may do best; so likewisethe Marrons and wives strive-and excel in continence "and chastity; and that ye will labour and endeavour, that this alter may have the name to be " frequented, and reforted unto, with more reverence and devotion, yea, and if it be possible) of "more chast women, than that other of the Nobility. And so it fell out indeed, that from that time, this altar also had the same rites (in a manner) and ceremonies as the other, which was I more ancient : in such fort, as no wife, but of approved honesty and chassity, and wedded but to one husband during her life, might be allowed there to facrifice and offer oblations. But this religious order and institution, in lapse and process of time was prophaned afterwards and divulged. and the altar frequented by them that were stained and infamous, and not only by matrons of name and quality, but also by women of all forts and degrees, until at last through difuse it grew to be utterly forgotten, and came to nothing.

The same year the Ædiles Curule, Cn, and Q. Ogulius accused certain Usurers, who were convicted, and their goods forfeit and confifcat. And of that which came into the common cheft, they caused to be made a brasen portal in the Capitol, and silver vessels forto furnish out three tables in Jupiter his Chappel: also the image of Jupiter himself in the Lantern or frontispice of the K Capitol, fitting in his chariot drawn with four fleeds. Moreover, at the Fig-tree Raminalis, they ercord and fet up the images of the foundling babes, the first founders of the City, pendant at the teats of a shee-wolf. They paved also with square stone, the causey and high way from the gate Capena, unto the Temple of Mars. The Ædiles likewise Commoners, L. Ælim Parm, and C. Fulvius Curvus, of the forfeited mony which they levied of the grafiers or farmers of the City passures, who were condemned and fined, exhibited certain pageants and playes, and set up gol-

After this, Q. Fabius the fift time Conful, and P. Decius the fourth, entred their government, who now had been companions together in three Consulats, and in one Censorship, men renowned, not more for the honor of their noble exploits in war, which was right great, than for L their loving agreement and concord, Which unity of theirs was not perpetual to the end; by occasion I suppose, of the contention of the States that same between, rather than of any difference betwist themselves. For the Patritii laboured, that Fabius should have the Province of Tuscan extraordinarily: and the Commons were as earnest with Decises to put the matter to a Lottery. Certain it is, that a great contention there was in the Senat. But afterwards, feeing that Fabius was able there to do more and make a greater fide than his Colleague, the matter was brought again before the people. In which affembly, few words passed between the parties themselves, being martial men both, standing more upon deeds than words. Fabius gave out and said "That it was an indignity, that another should gather fruit under the Tree that he had planted. and Also, that himself was the man, who had opened the way through the wood Ciminia, and had M given entrance and passage for the Roman war, through desart and wild forrests. What meant and Fabius for co "they then to trouble him, a man of those years, with this place of charge, in case, they minded "to give the conduct of this war to any other General but himself? No doubt, but by little and "little he upbraided them covertly and cast in their teeth, for chusing unto him an adversary, and " not a companion in government: yea, and charged Decius, that he repented and envied the "good concord, wherein they had lived together, during the time of three Magistracies already. "Finally, he aimed and reached at no farther matter than this, but if so be, they thought him "worthy of the Province, thither to fend him. For as he had been at the appointment and plea-"fure of the Senate, fo would he be at the ordering and direction of the people. On the other "fide, P. Decins complained of the injury offered by the Senat: for that the Nobles had endea-N "voured to their power, and done their best that no Commons might have access to honourable er places and dignities: and after that prowefs and valour had got the upperhand, and prevailed " fo, as even in those kind of men vertue wanted not her due reward and honour; there were " means fought, that not only the voyces of the people were deluded and made vain; but also ce the very awards and arbitrements of fortune, were transferred to the wills and pleasures of some " few. All Confuls before him had their provinces by lot: and now the Senat by their absolute " authority, without casting lots, gave unto Fabins the charge of his province. If it be (faith he) " to honour the man: verily, he hath so well deserved both of my self and of the Common-"wealth, that I favour highly and tender the glory of Q. Fabius; provided alwayes, that it get "not a shining lustre, by a foil of my disgrace and dishonour. And who will ever doubt, where 0 "there is one difficult and dangerous war, and the same precisely and absolutly charged upon "one Conful, without ordinary and lawful calling: but that the other Conful standeth for a "Cipher, and is reputed either needless, or good for nothing? As for Fabius, like as he gloried "in his service and noble Acts archieved in Tuscan, even so would Publius Decius also full fain co do the semblable: and peradventure, he should be able to put out and quench that fire once for "all, which Fabrus left behind him, so covered and raked up, as that oftentimes it suddenly brake

A "yeeld the titles of honour and all rewards of vertue unto his Collegue, in the reverent regard of his old age, and majefty of his person: but for any hazard or jeopardy that might be pre-"fented unto them, he neither at this time gave place, nor ever would (with his good will) to "him or any man else whatsoever; and if he gat no other good by this contention, yet would he "obtain thus much at the leaft, that the people should hold their own, and dispose of that abso-"lutly at their discretion, which was in their power; rather then permit the Nobles to gratifie "any one therewith at their pleasure. And herewith he prayed Tup, Opt, Max, and all the im-"mortal gods, that even as they youch afed to bestow upon him and his Collegue equal valour "and happiness in the conduct of their war, so they would afford them one and the same right B "and authority and rule. For, furely it was in nature meet and reason, for example good and profitable, and for the credit and fame of the people of Rome much material, that such should be Confuls, as by either of their guidance and conduct, without exceptions, the war with the "Tuscans might be administred as it ought to be. Fabius then, having besought the people naught elfe, but that before the Tribes were called in to give their fuffrages, they would hear the letters of App, Claudens Pretor read, which were brought out of Tufcany, departed out of the affembly. So the Province of Tulcany, without casting lots, was awarded unto Fabius, with no leis consent of the people, then of the Senat. Hereupon, all the younger fort (in manner) ranunto the Conful, and offered their service of themselves, and gave their names to be enrolled, so defirous were they to serve under that Captain. Which multitude being thus flocked about him cround; Four thousand footmen (quoth he) and fix hundred horse, and no more, am I minded to take up and levy. As many therefore, as to day and to morrow, will present themselves and give their names, will I accept of, and take with me: more care have I to bring you all home rich and wealthy, then to have numbers of fouldiers to fight my battels. Thus went he forth with a competent Army well appointed, and so much more confident, and in hope of good fuccels, by how much less he flood upon the great number; and directed his journey to the Town Aharna, where Apply the Pretor encamped, and from whence the enemy was not far distant. A few miles on this fide, the fewellers or wood-purveiors, accompanied with a good guard of fouldiers for their convoy, met him: who feeing the Sergeants going before, and underflanding that it was Fabius the Conful, with joy and theerful hearts, thanked God and the people of Rome, for fending unto them such a General. After this, when they came all about the Conful to falute and welcome him, Farius demanded whither they went? who answered, To purvey wood and fewel. Say ye so? (quoth he) and have ye not your camp empaled and fortified? Yes, cried they all, and that with a double rampart and ditch, but yet are we in exceeding fear. Then (quoth he) we have wood and timber enough. Go ye back again, and down with the trench and pallifade. Who returned into the camp, and as they were plucking up the rampare, they gave the alarm both to the fouldiers that tarried behind in the camp, and to Apple himself. and made them afraid. Then every man faid to one or other as they came, that it was by the express commandment of Q. Fabius the Conful that they did so. The morrow after they removed the camp; and Appear the Pretor was definished and sent away to Rome. After which time, the E Romans abode no where in standing camp: for he said, it was not good and commodious for an army to make abode in any one place; but that it was better and more wholfom both for the agility and health of their bodies, to have a running camp, to be ever marching, and changing the air and the foil. But their journeys were no other, then the winter would permit, which was not yet palt.

In the beginning of the Spring, Fabius having left the second legion at Clusium, which in old time was called Camars, and appointed L. Scipio Pro-pretor to begovernor of the camp he returned himself to Rome for to consult about the war: were it of his own accord and motion, because it appeared evidently in view of eye much greater then it was reputed before; or that he was fent for by order from the Senat for there be writers that a ffirm both the one and the other Some would have it thought, that he was called back again by Appius Claudius Pretor, who both at the Councel Table in the Senar House, and also before the body of the people (like as he had continually done by letters) enforced the fear and to or of the Tuican war, faying, that one General and one Army, were not sufficient to make head against four Nations: that it would be dangerous and doubtful, whether they jointly in one body gave battel unto one, or maintained war apart in divers quarters: that one man was not able to perform and mannage all at once. As for himself, he had left behind him two Roman Legions and no more, and with Fabius there were come not full five thousand in all, of horse and soot together. His opinion therefore was, that with allipsed, P. Decius the Conful, should go to his Collegue into Tuscany, and L. Von lumnius have the charge of Samnium in the mean time. But in case the Consul had rather go into his own Province, then he advised, that Volumnius took his way directly with a full and compleat Consular army into Tufcany, to the Consul. When this discourse of the Pretor had moved a great part of the House, then P. Decim spake (by report) to this effect; That all should be left entire and free to the disposition of Q. Fabius, until such time as either himself in person (if it might stand with the weal-publick) were come to Rome, or sent one of his Lieutenants by whom the Senat might be enformed, and truely understand the poyte and importance of the war in Tufgany; what forces were requifite, and how many Leaders and Captains were expedient and needful; Fabius, fo foon as he was returned to Rome, both in the Senat-House, and also in the audience of the people, held a middle course in all his speech; that he might seem neither to encrease, nor the ver to diminish the rumor of the war: and in assuming to himself another Captain, he pretended, that he condescended thereunto, in regard of other mens fear, more then for his own fafety, or for any danger that the State was like to incur. Howbeit, if they would allow him a coadjutor and companion in war, how might he forget P. Decius the Conful? of whom he had fo good proof and experience in so many Magistracies, which they had born and administred together. Of all men in the world he loved none better, and would make choice of no one sooner: and having P. Decius with him, he would never think his forces too few about him, nor his enemies too many before him. But if perad venture the mind and heart of his Collegue flood otherwise, his request was, that they would give him L. Volumnius to be his affiftant. The determination of all was referred over to Fabius, both by the people and Senat, and also by the Consul himself. And when as Decius shewed and testified, that he was ready to take a journey either into Samnium or Tuscany, there followed such a joy and gratulation of all men, as if they had conceived in their spirit a victory afore-hand, and even now, had decreed for the Confuls, not a doubtful war, but a glorious triumph, I find in some writers, that Fabius and Decius, presently upon the entrance into their Magiltracy, went into Tuscany, without any mention of casting lots for their charges and provinces, or of the contention between the two Collegues, which I have fet down. There be some again, who having laid abroad these debates, stayed northere, but over and besides have added a furcease of matter, touching the invectives of Appuss before the people, against Fabius in his absence; as also the obstinate stubbornness of him being Pretor, against the Consul, to hisk very face: moreover, another contention and variance between the two Contuls; whiles Decius endevoured to bring about, and was instant that each one should keep him to his own Province allotted unto him, and hold it. But all writers agree in the course of the history, from the time that both Confuls went out to war, and to forward.

But before that the Consuls arrived in Tuscany, certain Gauls called Senones, came with a great power before Clusium, ready to give affault unto the Roman Legion and the camp. But Scipio, who was left Governor thereof, thinking it necessary to help out the small number of his men, by advantage of the ground, led his army up to the hill between the town and the camp, But (as it falleth out in such sudden cases) he had not discovered aforehand the wayes and passes all about; but inconsideratly went forward, and engaged himself up to the top and pitch of the hill, which the enemy was mafter of already, by another fide. Thus was the legion affailed on the back and beat down, and thus was it enclosed and environed round, by a multitude of enemies, and put to the sword. Some writers there be who report, that the whole legion perished there so as not one escaped alive to carry tidings. Also, that the Consuls who now were not far from Clust-1811, had no news brought them of this overthrow, before the horsemen of the Gauls were in fight, who carrying the heads of them that were flain, fome hanging before at their horsepoittels, others flicking aloft upon their lances, braved and triumphed, inging and chanting longs of joy, after their manner. Some write that they were the Umbri and not the Gauls, and that the defeat and massacre was not so great: also that when the fortagers for the camp under the leading of L. Manlius Torquatus a Lieutenant, were compassed about by the enemy; then Scipio the Pro-pretor came forth of the camp to succour and rescue them, and that the Umbrians who first had the better, afterwards when the battel was renewed, suffered the foil and wereovercome, and that as well their prisoners as their booty was taken from them. But more probable it is, that this overthrow was given by the Gauls, then the Umbrians; for that as divers times afore, so that year especially the City was frighted with the tumults and risings of the Gauls. Upon this defeat, over and befides, that both the Confuls were gone to war with four legions, and a great power of Cavalry of natural Romans, and a thousand horsemen of Capua, chosen out of purpose for that war, and sent unto them, with a greater power also of Allies, and of Latins then of Romans; there were two other armies not far from the City of Rome, opposed to frontier and make head against Tuscany: the one in the Faliscian territory, the other in the Vatican. Cn. Fulwins and L. Posthumius Megillus, both Pro-pietors, were commanded to keep a standing camp in those parts. But the Consuls by this time, having passed over the mountain Apenninus, were come to the enemies within the country of the Sentinats. And there about four miles off, they fat them down and encamped. Then the enemies, after much confultation, resolved in the end upon this point; not to be intermingled all in one camp, nor come into the field and hazzard all their forces at once in one battel: But that the Gauls should take the Samnits unto them, and the Umbrians join with the Tuscans. The day of the battel was appointed, The Gauls and Samnits had the charge to maintain the fight: and in the time of battel the Tuscans and Umbrians were commanded to affault the camp of the Romans. But these their designs and purposes were altered by reason of three Clusin sugitive traitors, who by night fole away privily unto the Conful Fabius, and disclosed the intents and enterprise of the enemies: who were fent away with rich rewards, to the end that every hour, upon new plots and devices that should be determined by the enemies, they would give them an inkling and certain intelligence. The Confuls write unto Fulvius and Posthumius, that the one should advance and come forward with his army, out of the Faliscan country; and the other out of the Vatican directly unto Clusium: and that with all their forces, they should overrun and destroy the enemies country. The rumor of these rodes & invasions, caused the Tuscans to remove out of the

Sentinar territory, to the defence of their own frontiers. Hereupon the Confuls made freed to A strike a battel in their absence. And for two dayes space they skirmished continually with the enemy, and challenged him to the field but for those two days, no worthy deed of importance was atchieved. A few on both fides were flain, and hereby were their courages rather provoked, and their flomacks whet to a full fet battel then any trial or hazard made of the main chance. Upon the third day into plain field they come with all their power. When both armies flood ranged in battel array, there fortuned a Hind to be chased out of the mountains, and to run away before a Wolf, even through the midlt of the plains between both armies: then, parted both these wild beafts a funder, the Hind took her way to the Gauls, and the Wolf his course to the Romans. The B Wolf had way given him through all the tanks and files; but the Hind was killed among the Gauls Then a Roman fouldier, one of the forefront, who was to fight before the Entigns: There will the flight (quoth he) there will the flaughter be, where you fee the beaft facred and dedicated to Diana lie dead : but here on this part, the martial Wolf, confecrated to Mars, having with victory gone clear away fafe and unwounded hath put us in mind of our martial Nation and of our first tounder, the fon of Mars. The Gauls put themselves in the right wing, the Samnits in the left Against the Samnits, Fabius marshalled the first and third Legions, in the right point : and Deciusa the fifth and fixth in the left, affront the Gauls. For the second and fourth served in Samnium under L. Volumnius Pro-conful. Arthe first shock and encounter, the battel was so indifferently fought, and with so equal force, that if the Tuscans and Limbrians had either shewed themselves in the field, or affailed the camp, the lofs and overthrow must needs have, light in either places whereas they had bent their forces, Howbeit, although hitherto the conflict of battel went conal and indifferent, and that as yet fortune had not determined, which way the would encline and give the victory; yet they fought not alike, in the right and left wings . For the Romans under the conduct of Fabine, rather warded the enemy warily, and flood upon their guard, then offered to charge luftily : fo as they maintained fight, and drew it at length until it was very late in the evening, because the Captain was enformed and periwaded of the Sampits and Gauls both, that being as they were in the first skirmish very hot and surious, it was sufficient to keep off at length, and at staves end. As for the Samnits, their courages would abate and fall by any long conflict and the bodies of the Gauls, (who of all other can least away with travel, & heat especially) would turn all to sweat, & melt away: who at the beginning, fight more fiercely then men, but in the, end more faintly then women. Against that time therefore, when the enemy used to fall & give over, Eabius had kept his fouldiers in breath & referved their ftrength fresh & lufty. But Decims being very eager & hot by reason of his youth and courage of heart, laid on lustily at the fift, and spent upon the enemies all the force & vigor he had : and for that the Infantry seemed to fight but coldly, he set the Cavalry awork: and himself personally in the thickest throng and troop of most valiant and hardy Knights, exhorted and belought the formost gallants of those lusty youths, to join with him & to charge upon the enemy faying that they should carry away a double honor, if by the means of the men of arms, the victory began at the left wing. Twice they forced the Gauls horiemen to turn fide and back; but when as they were engaged farther within; and were now fighting hard pell mell ar mone the fonadrons of the hor femen, they beheld a new and firinge kind of fight, which troubled and terrified them. For the enemies standing all armed upon chariots & wagons, with a great noise of their fleeds, and rumbling of the wheels, ran full upon them, & mightily, affrighted the horses of the Romans, which had not been acquainted with such uncouth & strange noises, So the horfmen who had the upper hand before, & were at point of victory, were now with a foul fear distomfited and scattered as if the hideous furies of hell, & the divel himself had been amongst them. Where upon they fled suddenly & not looking before them were overthrown both men & horse By this occasion the entigns of footmen were diffrested & difordered, and many of those that were ranged in the front before the entigns, were by force of horse & wagons driven crossthrough the barraillons, troden under foot, and their guts squashed out. Herewithal the battailions of the Gauls sootmen, seeing their enemies thus scared sollowed on apace, & gave them no time of breathing. Decim cried out aloud to his men, Whither flie ye? Or what hope have ye to fave your felves by flight? Decins opposed himself against them that retreated and fled Decins rallied those that were disbanded and scattered but seeing that by no force or means he could flay them, thus amazed & affonied as they were; he called upon his father P. Decins by name, and faid; Why do I stay any longer the fatal death that is destined to my house & name? "It is given to our race & family id be facrifi-"ced in lieu of propiniatory facrifices for to affoil & fave the publick-weal from dangers menaced " & threatned unto it. Even now therfore, wil I offer the legions of the enemies to be facrificed "with my felf to Dame Tellus and other infernal gods. When he had spoken these words, he commanded M. Livius the high Prieft (whom as he marched into the field, he straightly had charged notto depart from him) for to pronounce and fay that form of words, whereby he should devote. offer, and betake himself to death, together with the legions of the enemies, for to fave the army of the Quirits and people of Rome. Which when he had done by the same form of prayer and in the same habit wherein his father P. Decius at the river Veferis, in the war against the Latins, caufed himself to be offered to death : and besides these solemn prayers, added moreover these words: "That he drave before him, Fright, Flight, Murder, Maffacre, Bloodshed, Ire and Wrath of gods, in "Heaven, & fiends in Hell; and that he would with deadly maledictions and execrable curies imite "the enligns, weapons, and armors of his enemies; and that one and the same place, should give so both himself, and also the Gauls and Sammers together with hims plague, perdition, and deflers to "Ction. After these cursed, horrible, and derestable speeches against his own person and his enemies; look where he law the thickest ranks of the Gauls, thicker he spurred his horse, and rode in amongst them: where amidst the pixes, javelins, and swords, he was preferrly stain. Then could it hardly be seen, that the battel was any longer fought by power and help of man. The Romans fo foonasthey had loft their Captain, (which at all other times is wont to finite a terror into them) flayed their flight, and were willing and contented to renew the battel afresh. The Gauls, and especially that troop which stood about the Cos, his body, fared as though they had been out of their wits, flang their darts from them (I know not how) to no purpote, and in vain: fome of them flood fill, as it were benummed, forgetting both to run away, and to fight flill, But on the other fide the high Priest Living, with whom Decim had left the fer jeants, and whom before his death he nominated and ordained to be Propretor, cried out, as loud as he could, that the Romans had the victory, and by the death of the Cof, were acquit and excused from all other fatal danger but as for the Gauls and the Samuits, they were destined and forfeited (as it were) to mother Tellus and the infernal spirits. And now Decius (quoth he) haled after him and calleth to follow him, the army that with him was devowed, curled, and offered: now all the enemies are full of furies and fearful fright. Then, as these aforesaid began the skirmish again, behold there came unto them, Cornelius Scipio, and C. Martins with a supply of succours from the rereward; who by commandment of Q. Fabius the Conful, were fent to aid and rescue his Collegue. Where they heard of the worthy end of P. Decius, a noble example to encourage them to adventure all K hazards in the fervice of their country and Common-weal. Therefore, when as the Gauls flood close and thick together, opposing their targets before them, ranged and joined one over another featherwise, so, as to deal with them affront, and to cope together at hand stroaks, was thought a difficult and dangerous matter; then, by the commandment of those two Lieutenants, the darts and lances which lay firewed upon the ground, between the two armies, were gathered up, and flung against the pavoisade or tortuse-femie of the enemies targets abovelaid. And by reason that these javelins and spears light and stuck fast, some in their rargets, and some in their very bodies, it happed that their knot was broken, and the battaillon(as huge and close as it was) disbanded, in such fore; as many of them, notwithstanding their bodies were untouched and unhurt, fel down aftonied one upon another. Lo how fortune altered the case, and changed all in the left wing of I. the Romans, But in the right, Fabius (as is beforefaid) at the first, lingered and drew on the day. but afterwards, when ashe perceived, that neither the enemies shouts, nor their manner of giving charge, nor yet the darts and javelins which they lanced, had the same vigor and force, as beforethe commanded the Captains of the horsemento wheel about with their Cornets, and to flank the Sammits, that upon a figual given, they might charge them overthwart with all the violence shey could whiles his own Legionary footmen by little and little advanced forward, and brake the ranks and difordered the enemy. When he faw once, no refiftance made, and that without all doubtythey were wearied and out of breath: then hegathered together all his subfidiary companies of the rereguard, which he had referved until that time and bufinels, fresh and in heart; and at once, both fee forward the Legions, and gave the horiemen alfo a fignal to fet upon the ene-in mies. But the Sammits could not endure this violent charge, but ran as fast as ever they could to recover the camp fast by the battaillon of the Gauls, leaving their fellows behind them in fight to pay the reckoning. The Gauls having likewise made a target-fense, stood thick and close together under it. Then Fabius advertised of the death of his brother Conful, commanded a wing or Cornet; to the number almost of $ 00, horsement of Capua, to withdraw themselves out of the conflict, to call about and to play upon the backs of the Gauls: after whom, he caused the Principes of the third Legion to follow; and wherefoever they elpied the ranks of the enemies by force of horfstien difordered and broken, there, to second them, and press on still, and kill them whiles they were in difarray, and afraid. Himself vowed a Temple to Jupiter Victor, together with the spoils of his enemies; Which done, he advanced ftraight forward to the camp of the Samnits. Thither N all the multitude of them were driven in great fright and difarray. And for that the gages were not able to receive fo great a multitude, crouding together, they that were kept out, and could not get in, by reason of the throng of their sellows, began again to fight under the rampart. Where Gellius Egnatius, the General of the Samnits was firucken down and flain : after this, the Samnits beaten within their sampart, were killed every one, and their camp after small resistance won. The Gauls behind their back were environed and cut in pieces. That day were flain of enemies five and twenty thouland, and 8000 taken prisoners. Howbeit, this victory cost the Romans blood; for of P. Decius his army, there died 7000 and of Fabius, 1200, Fabius then having sent out to leek out the body of his Collegue, gathered up all the spoils of the enemies into an heap, and burned them, to the honor of Jupiter Victor. But that day could not the Conful his body be feen, by o reason it was covered and hidden under heaps of the Gauls that lay there dead. The morrow after it was found and brought again with many a tear of all his fouldiers. Then Fnbius fetting all other matters for the time afide, folemnized the burial and funeral obsequies of his fellow Conful, with due commendation and condigne praises, and with all honor that could be devi-

In Tuscany also about the same time, Cn. Fulvius Propretor, had fortunat success to his hearts deire for befides great damage done to the enemy, by invafions & rodes into the country, he fought A also a notable battel: wherein of Perusins and Clusingwere slain above 3000, and twenty en figns won. The Samnits, as they fled through the territory of the Pelignians, were by them intercepted and enclosed; and of five thousand, they were lest but one thousand. Great is the same of that day, and of the battel that was fought in the Sentinate territory, if a man hold him only to the truth, and make no more of it than it was. But some have overreached a little, and written, that the enemies were 40330, foot, and 46000, horse strong: also, that they had a thousand tharriots or waggons, reckoning and comprising the Umbrians and Tulcans withal : who also (as they fay) were at the battel. And to encrease also the power and forces of the Romans, they record, that L. Volumnius Propretor, was a Commander, together with the Copiuls, and that his army B was joined with the Legions of the Conjuls, But I find in most Chronicles, that this victory was atchie ved by the two Confuls only. Volumnius in the mean time warred in Sammium; and having forced and driven the army of the Samnits, to take the hill Tifernum, nothing atraid for the diledvantage of the place, discomfitted them, and put them to flight, Q. Fabius, having left the army of Decres behind him in Tuscany, reduced his own legions into the City, and triumphed over the Gauls, Tutcans, and Samnits. His fouldiers followed him in his triumph, who in their rude military rhimes and longs, celebrated no less the brave and noble death of P. Decius, than the

For all these notable victories atchieved, yet neither the Samnits nor the Tuscans were at quiet. For, both the Perufins began to rebel, fo foon as the Conful had away his army: and also the Samnits came down to forrage and spoil into the territory of Vestin and Formianum, and another way into Eletranium, which lie along the river Vulturnus. Against them was Appins Chandans the Pretor, sent with Decius his army. And Fabius in Tuscany, which began new war flew four thoufand and five hundred Perufins, took priloners 1740, who were ranformed for * 3. 0. After a piece, * 46/b, 10.d. The rest of the spoil was all bestowed upon the souldiers. The Legions of the Samnits being pur- ob. Hers. fued hard at heels, partly by Appius Claudius Pretor, and partly by L. Volumnius Proconiul, met Dall together in the territory of Stella. Where both the Samnit Legions abode, and also Appius and Volumnius joined and encamped together. There was a sharp and cruel battel fought on both sides. The Romans were incensed with anger and choler against those that had so often rebelled: the other, upon a desperate mind were resolute to hazzard the utmost. So there were flain of the Samnits, 16300; 2700, taken prisoners, and of the Romans there died two thousand

This year so fortunate in war, was by reason of pestilence much asslicted; and for certain prodigious tokens, ful of care and perplexed. For it was reported, that in divers places it rained earth: and that in the army of Appius Claudius, there were many smitten & blafted with lightning. In regard hereof, the books of Sibylla were peruled audiought into. The same year Q. Fabius Garges, Ethe Conful his son, fined and punished by the purse, certain wives who had been convicted and condemned before the people, of Adultery : of which money fo raifed by their fines, he canted to be built the Temple of Venus, which standeth neer the Cirque or Race.

There remain yet behind certain wars of the Samnits, whereof we have now continued our history in thele four books, for the space of fix andiorty years, ever since that M. Valerius, and Au. Cornelius were Confuls, with were the first that warred in Sammum. To let pais therefore, and not to trouble the readers, with a prolix narration of the alternative overthrows given and received between both nations so many years one after another, for all which calamities and losses their hearts and courages could not be daunted or conquered : the very last year, the Samnics, in the Sentinat country, in the Pelignsterritory, at Tifernum, and in the territory of Stella, were de-F feated both by themselves, with their own legions, and also mingled with others; and that; by four armies, and four Roman Captains ; loft the bravest and most noble General of all their nation; saw their consederates and allies in war, the Tuscans, Limbrians, and Gauls, in the same predicament as themselves, not able to stand and maintain their estate any longer, either by their ownpower, on with help of forraign forces ; yet for all this, would they not abstain from war, to little weary were they of defending their liberty, although it were unfortunatly: shooting rather, to be vanquished, than not to attempt the winning of victory. Who is he, that would not think it irksom, and tedious, either to write or read this long suit and train of wars, which they in fighting, were never wearied?

After Q. Fabius and P. Decius, succeeded Consuls L. Posthumius Megillus, and M. Attilius Re-Ggulus. Tothem both, was committed chatge of Samnium, for that the bruit wene, that the enemies had prepared three full armies, the one to go again into Tuscany, the second to invade and over-run airesh the terricory of Capua, and the third to defend their own frontiers. Post humins by reason of sickness remained at Rome, but Attilius went presently with an army forth, to the end that he might surprize the enemies on a sudden in Samutum, before they had taken the field; for to the Senat had given direction: and he found the enemy in the way to meet him, as if it had been fo' of purpose before by them determined, ready there to keep him from entrance and fofar off-were they from wasting the inds of the Samnits, that they could not once enter into Dd_3

their confines; nay, the Samnits debarged them from departure thence, into the peaceable parts to and territories of their allies. Now when as they were encamped affront one against another: that, which the Romans being fo often conquerors, would hardly have adventured, (see how meter despair driveth mento ralh projects and extremities) the Samnits attempted : even to give assault upon the Romans camp. And albeit this so ventrous enterprise sped not well in the final effect, yet was it not altogether invain attempted. There chanced to be a foggy milt, which continued a good part of the day, to thick and palpable, as men could not see before them, I say nor. fo far as without the trench, but not fo much as those that came close to speak one to another. The Samnits hereupon taking the advantage fit for an ambushment, before it was full day light, and the same much overcast and dim with the mist, came as far as the Corps de guard of the Romans, I who in the gates and entrance of the camp warded but negligently: being thus taken on a sudden, they had neither courage nor thrength enough to relift. At the back-fide of the camp, they affaulted the great gate Decumana, seized the Questors pavilion, and that quarter about it: where the Questor himself (L. Opimius Pansa) was slain, and thereupon the alarm was given. The Cos. being with this tumuk raised, commanded two bands or cohorts of allies, to wit, the one of Lucanians, and the other of Sueffans, which haply were next hand, to defend and guard the Pretors pavilion, and that quarter. In the mean while he marched with the legionary bands along the high broad street in the camp, called Principalis, and before they had buckled and fitted their armor about them, they were ranged in battel array; and had knowledge of the enemy, by the ear and onteries, rather then by the fight of the eye: neither could they give an estimate what K number they were. At the first, as doubtful of the event, and missrusting their fortune, they retreated, and received their enemies in, and let them come even into the midft of the camp: but then the Conful cried out, and asked, Whether they meant to be turned out of their own ramparts and holds first, and after have a new piece of work to assail and win them again? So, they let up a shout, and put all their might together, and first made resistance only and kept their ground: but afterwards they fet forward, and pressed upon them: and having once beat them back, they drave them afore them; with the same sear, that they themselves began, yea, and chased them out of the gate and the trench: but to proceed further, for to pursue the chase, they durst not, for fear of some ambushment, by reason of the misty and troubled weather, contenting themselves with the saving of their camp and no more: and so they retired within their ram- L parts having flain to the number welnear, of three hundred enemies. Of Romans, as wel those that were in the first Corps de guard and Sentinels, who kept the watch, as of those that were furprised about the Questors lodging, were killed 230. This bold adventure of the Samnits speeding so well, made them take better heart; so as they would not permit the Romans to encamp farther into the Country, no, nor to much, as to go a forraging into their territory: whereupon they were compelled to retire again, and to purvey forrage in the quiet and peaceable quarters of their friends about Sora.

The bruit of all these occurrents more troublesome and seaful then truth was, being come to Rome, caused L. Posthumius the Cos, before he was well recovered of his sickness, to take the field: meet. Himself now dedicated unto the goddess Victoria, the Temple, which in the time of his Curule Ædileship he took order to be built, with the money raised of certain fines taken of perfons condemned. Then took he his journey to the army, and so went forward from Sora directly into Samnium, to the camp of his brother Conful. But the Samnius distructing themselves, as not able to withstand two armies, were dislodged, and departed back: and the Consuls also parted one from another, fundry ways, to wasterne country, and assault the towns. Possibilities athis first coming, assayed by meer force to assail the town Milionia, and seeing he could do small good that way, at length by rolling trenches and platforms, he approached close to the walls, and wan it: and albeit the town were thus forced, yet there continued a fharp and long fight in all firects and parts thereof, from the fourth hour of the day until the eighth, with N doubtful and variable events for a good while; but in the end the Romans became mafters of the town. Of Samnits were flain 3200 and 4200, were taken prisoners: besides the gaining of other booty and pillage. From thence, he led forth the legions to Ferentinum, but the inhabitants with their bag and baggage, and all that ever they could drive or carry, had quit the cown in the fill night feason, and departed in great filence at a contrary postern gate, which opened from the camp of the enemy. The Conful fo foon as he was come, arthe first approached the walls, as well appointed and provided of all things, as if he should have found as much to do, as at Miliona: but afterwards, perceiving all filent and desolate throughout the City, seeing neither men fall headlong ere he were aware, into the trains of some hidden and privy ambush, he commanded two Cornets of the Cavalry of Latine confederates, to ride about the walls about the counterscarp, and well to view and considerall places. The horiemen finding one or two gates need together standing wide open, and in the very same ways that led from thence, the fresh tracks and footing of the enemies, as they fled by night; rode foftly neerer and neerer to the gates; and there but ere he departed the City, he proclamed the Rendezvous at Sora, for his fouldiers thereto M normunition within the towers and upon the walls; he held back his fouldiers, defirous and greedy to enter upon the bare walls, so abandoned and dissurnished of defence: and doubting to 0 they might see straight aforethem safe entrance, and the City lying open even from one end to the other: whereupon they brought word back to the Conful, what the City was abandoned, and the

A enemies gone: which was very evident and apparent as well by the very folitude thereof, as the new and tresh marks and traces of their dislodging and departure; as also by the stuff and goods that lay here and there frattered all abroad, whiles they halfned fearfully in the dark, to take their flight. The Conful upon this report, with his hoft drew to that fide of the town, which the horiemen were at and pitching down his enligns not far from the gate, commanded five other horemen to enter into the City; giving order, that when they had gone forward a pretty way, three of them should stay behind in the same place, if they saw all safe and out of danger; and the other two bring him word what they had teen and found. Who being returned, made relation that they were gone so far as they might see about them every way into all parts, & could perceive Bnothing but filence and valt defolation all about, both far and neer: then forthwith, the Conful entred the City, with certain cohorts lightly appointed, and charged the rest in the mean while to fortifie the camp. The fouldiers being once entred, fell to break open the doors; where they found a few filly old folk, and some feeble and diseased persons, with such moveables as were hard to be conveighed and transported : those they rifled, and ransackt; and by certain captives they under-flood, that divers other towns thereabout, were all with one accord fled and gone: and as for their own countrymen, they departed at the first watch of the night, and they thought no other verily but that in the rest of the Cities, they should find the like emptines and solitude. And as the priloners faid, to it proved indeed and the Conful possessed himself of those forlorn and abandoned towns.

C The other Conful M. Attilius, had so easie war for his part: who as he was marching with his Legions toward Luceria, which he heard was befreged by the Samnits: the enemy encountred and met him in the very entry of the frontiers, and gave him battel: and the anger and indignation on both parts, but the end and iffue more heavy and dolorous on the Romans fide: both because they were not used to be vanquished; and also for that in the very loose and retreat, rather then in combat and skirmish, they found that many more were hurt and slain of their part. Which fearful fight and terror, as it began in the camp, if it had surprized them in the conflict, it would have been an heavy day with them, & no doubt they had received a notable overthrow. And even then, being as it was, they had a careful night, and full of anguilh, thinking verily that the Samnits would prefently affault their camp, or at least wile that in the morning betimes they D must of necessity fight with the conquerors. But the enemies, as their loss was less, so their heart and courage was never the more: For fo foon as the day brake, defirous were they to be gone without any battel, Howbeit there was bur one way, & that lay close and neer to their enemies; which they were not so soon entred into, but they made shew a far off, as if they marched straight to the affault of the camp. The Conful commanded his men to arm, and to follow after him without the ramparts. To his Lieutenants, Colonels and Captains of the Allies the gave feveral charges to do as he thought needful and requifite. They all promifed to execute any direction what foever : but they faid withal, that their fouldiers hearts were done, that they had watched and fit up all night, amongst the grievous wounds and uncomfortable groans of them that lay a dying: and no doubt if the enemy had come before day against the camp, so daunted were they, that they E would have abandoned their colours: and even now for very shame and nothing elie, they forbare indeed to run away, but otherwise their hearts were gone, and they clean spent. The Consul hearing this thought good to go obout himself inperson, unto every one of his souldiers, and to speak unto them; and even as hemet with any of them, and faw them fo backward, and going about so coldly to take arms and weapon in hand; he checked and rebuked them: crying aloud, and asking why they fat faill? why they loitered and made such delay? saying, that the enemies would come to them within the very camp, and cut their throats, unless they made more haste to fally forth: yea, and forced they should be to fight before their tent doors, if they would not give battel without the trench and ramparts. They that are armed (faith he) and will fight manfully, thall obtainundoubted victory : but the unarmed and naked man that attendeth the enemies coming,

F must either die for it, or endure captivity. As he rated and rebuked them in these tearms, they anfwered flatly again; that they had enough of yesterdays work, and were utterly done; and had neither firength nor blood left them in their bodies: and now the enemies (fay they) feem more in number then they were the day before. Amid these speeches the army approached: and being now but a little way off they might take a full view of them more certainly, and see every thing. Wherupon they faid confidently, that they faw the Samnits to bring with them their stakes and pales to cast a pallaisado, no doubt, round about their whole camp. At this, the Consul cried out upon them for very shame to suffer so soul a reproach and disgrace of a most dastardly enemy." And shall "we be (onoth he) befet and empaled within our own camp, there to die for hunger and famine "with shame, rather then by edge of sword (if there be no other remedy) with honor, like men?

G" The gods speed us well (quoth he) and their will be done : and do every man as he thinks beff: "asfor M. Attelias the Conful, he is refolved even himself alone (if no man else will follow) to meet the enemy in the face, and rather be beaten down and die amongst the Samnits enfigns, "than see the Roman camp besieged with attenth cast, and rampart raised obout it. The Lieutenants Colonels, and all the bands and Coronets of the Cavalry, yea, and the principal Centurions of the formost companies liked well of this, and accepted the Consul his words. Then the fouldiers for flark shame, full faintly take weapon in hand and as slowly, God wor, go forth of camp, And thus in long ranks and files; not close uninted together but broken here and there, with heavy cheer, and as men half vanquished already, they marched after a fort toward the enemy, who H was neither in hope nor in heart better rejolved and fetled then they. For io joon as the Samnits discovered the Roman Standards, suddenly from the vanguard to the rereguard, there went a muttering and bruit from one to another, that the Romans were come forth (the only thing they always leared) to empeach and stop their passage, so as now there was no way for them to sly and escape from them, and save themselves, but must either die in the place, or slav their enemies and make a land even over their bodies. All their packs and fardels, they cast together upon an heap in the midit: and being armed as they were, every man ranged and marshalled themselves in their own arrays. Now was there a very little space between the two armies, and they stood looking one upon another, waiting when their enemies would begin to give the first charge, and set up the I first shout. But neither of both had any stomack to fight. And surely on both sides they had gone fundry ways untouched, and without any blows given or taken, but that they feared both, left if they had dismarched of one part first, the other would have come upon them. Thus of themselves they began a faint fight, as unwilling and loath thereto, with an uncertain and unequal shout; neither stirred any man one foot. Then the Roman Consul, to begin the skirmish, sent out some sew Cornets of horsmen from a side, without the battaillons: wherof the most part fel from their horfes, and others were difarrayed and put out of order: whereupon both Samnits ran out tokill those that were fallen, and Romans also to rescue their sellows. Then the skirmish began a little to wax hot: but the Samnits advanced forward in greater number far, and bestirred themselves (as it feemed) more luftily : and withal, the Roman horiemen being disordered and in confusion, K with their horses affrighted trod under their feet the sootmen that came to rescue. Who beginning once to flie, caused the whole Roman army also to turn their backs. And now the Samnits played upon the backs of the Romans, as they fled: whereat the Conful rode before a gallop to the camp gate, where he bestowed a good corps de guard of horsemen, opposite in the way: and made proclamation, that who foever came toward the camp, were he Samnit or were he Roman, should be taken and used as an enemy. With these and such like threats, he put himself against the fouldiers, that marched fo fast in heaps to the camp. Whither away firrah, (quoth he to eve-Ty fouldier that he met) even here shalt thou find men in arms to fight withal; here shalt thou meet with thine enemy, as well as in the field behind: no entring here into the camp without victory, so long as thy Conful liveth: chuse therefore whether thou haddt rather fight with thy L own countrimen or thine enemies. Whiles the Conful entertained them with this welcom, the horsemen also with spear in rest, and bent full against them, came all about, charging the sootmen upon their peril to turn again to battel. Thus not only the Conful his vertue and prowess served in good stead, but fortune also went on their side : for the Sammits followed not the chase so hard, but that the Romans had both time and ground enough to turn about their enfigns, and to direct their battaillons from their camp against the enemy, Then one encouraged another to go to battel again. The Centurions fnatched the banners out of the bearers hands, and advanced them forward: declaring to their fouldiers, how few the enemies were in number, and how diforderly and out of all array they came against them. In this while the Consullift up his hands to heaven, and with a clear and audible voice, vowed a Temple to Jupiter Stator, if so be the Roman M army flayed their flight, and by renuing the conflict flouid kill and vanquish the Samnits Legions. Hereupon enderoured they on all hands, the Captain and souldier, both horiemen and footmen, to re-enforcethe battel. And even the very gods from heaven feemed to have a frecial regard of the Romans at that time, fo quickly the dice turned, and the enemies were repulsed from the ramparts, and within a small while forced again to the very place where the battel began. Where by reason of their fardels and packs which they had heaped together in the midft, and now lay in their very way, they were flopped in their very passage, and for fear left their goods should be risled and spoiled, they cast a ring round about their bag and baggage. Then the Roman Infantry afront, and the Cavalry behind, compassed them, and charged upon them right fiercely: wherein the midst between, they were either slain or taken. The prisoners were N in number 7300. who were all put naked under the yoak, and fold: the number of them that were flain was about 4800. The Romans for all this had no great lift to boaft and breg of their victory, for the Conful taking view and account of his lois these two days, found by computation, that he missed 7300.

Whiles these things thus passed in Apulia, the Samnits with another power, assayed to surprize and get again Interanna, a Colony of the Romans: situate upon the Latine high-way: but when they could not be masters of the town, they overran and plundered the territory: and having got a good booty of men, women, and cattel, one with another; whiles they were driving the same before them, together with certain Coloners whom they had taken prisoners, they light upon Conful as he returned with victory from Luceria: where they not only loft their spoil, but were o themselves slain as they marched disorderly in long files. The Consul made proclamation, That every man should repair to Interanna, for to own and challenge his own goods, and to receive the same again: and there, leaving his army, went to Rome, against the Election of new Magistrates. When he laboured instantly for a triumph, he was denied that honor; both for that he had lost fo many thousands, and also because he had put his captives under the gallows, and sold them, without farther imposition.

The other Col. Posthumius, wanting subject matter of was to work upon among the Samnits,

A passed with his army into Tuscany : and after he had first pilled and spoiled the Volsinians territory, he gave them battel not far from their walls, who issued forth to defend their frontiers; where there were 2200. Tufcans flain: the reft, by reason that the City was so neer, escaped and saved themselves. Then led he his army into the territory of Rosellum, where he not only laid the fields waste, but won the town also: took prisoners above two thousand and slew under two thousand before their walls. Howbeit, in that year, the peace obtained in Hetruria, was more honorable and renowned then the war had been, Forthree of the strongest and most puissant States, even the very Capital Cities of Tulcany, to wit, Volfinit, Perulia, and Arctium, defired accord. For these acts done, the Consul * 1562, Ltos. having requested triumph of the Senat, for manner and fashion, rather then upon any hope to feel. fpeed; and perceiving fome of them to deny him flatly, as pretending, that it was so lateere he departed the City; and other some, for that without order and direction of the Senat, he passed out of Samnium into Tuscany and that partly his adversaries, & partly the friends of his Collegue, who might take some comfort and contentment, that he also had the repulse with him, were against his triumph: My Masters (quoth he) you that are Senators of Rome, I wil not be sofar mindful of your honor and majesty, as that I will forget my self to be a Consul: and by vertue of the fame authority of commission, wherewith I have conducted and managed these wars; for so much C as, I have happily brought them to end, and subdued Samnium and Tufonny, atchieved victory, and obtained peace; triumph I will, and ask you no leave. And with that he departed out of the Senat. After this, there arole a debate and diffention among the Tribuns of the Commons. Some of them faid, they would enterpose their negative, that he should not in this manner triumph, and give fo illa precedent. Others gave out, that they would affift him in his triumph, mangre the heads of all their Collegues. After much ado, the matter was referred unto the people, and the Conful being thither called, alledged, that L. Horatius, and Mar. Valerius Confuls, also Caius Marting Rutilius of late days, even the father of him, who then was Cenfor, triumphed without the authority and approbation of Senat, only by the ordinance of the people. Over and besides, he added and faid, that himself also would have moved the people therein, but that he knew that the O Tribuns of the Commons, who were become vaffals and flaves to the Nobles, would have nipped and croffed the bill. As for himself, he protested, that he did and would account of the will and favour of the people, agreeing together, as well as of all their Acts and Decrees whatfoever. So the morrow after, by the affiliance of three Trib. banded against the opposition and negative voices of feven, yea, and against the general resolution of the Senat, he triumphed: and all the people with great joy solemnized and celebrated the honor of that day, But the records do vary much about the acts and affairs of this year allo. Claudius writeth, That Posthumius having won certain towns in Samnium, was after in Apulia discomfited and put to flight: and that himself in perfon being hart, was with some few besides, driven to take Luceria for resuge: and that it was Attilius, that fought in Tuscary, and triumphed. Fabini contrarily reporteth, That both Confuls E warred in Sammium and at Luceria : and that one of the armies was transported into Tulcary: but which of the Coniuls had the conduct thereof, he hath not fet down withal : also that before Luceria, there were on both parts many flain: and how in that battel, there was a Temple vowed to Jupiter Stator, like as Romillus had done before intimes past : howbeir, before this time, there was no Temple erected, but only a Fanum, [i. a place pronounced, destined, and confectated before to build a Temple on. But in this year at last, the City being now twice bound and obliged to perform one and the same vow, made a conscience of it, and moved the Senat to decree and take order, that the house and temple aforesaid should be edified accordingly.

After this year, there succeeded a brave and noble Conful, L. Paprrins Carfor, as well in regard of his fathers glory, as his own reputation. Also a mighty great war, and such a victory as never F any General wan the like at the Samnits hands before that day, but L. Papyrius again the Confuls father. And as it fell out they made the like preparation for war, with the same endeavor and furniture of most costly and brave armor, as before time. Moreover, they used the help and favor of the gods befides, by a firange kind of induction and inflitution of the fouldiers, binding them to take their oath, after an old ceremonial custom, as if they were to take orders in someholy mysteries; yea, and levied musters throughout all Samnium, after a new form of a law and edich: That who loever of the younger fort and ferviceable men, fit to bear arms, shewed not themselves, and gave attendance at the Generals appointment and proclemation, and wholoever departed without his leave and licence, his head should be forfeit unto Jupiter as accuried and damned. Which done, the Rendezwouz was appointed at Aquilonia, for all the forces to affemble. Where there 6 gathered together, to the number of forty thousand fighting men, even the whole flower and manhood of Samnium. There, about the midft of the camp, was a plot of ground fet out, well fenced and enclosed all about with hurdles and boords, and the same covered all over with linnen cloaths: the place was two hundred foot square, every way. Then there was a solemn sacrifice celebrated and divine service said, according to an order read out of an old book made of linnen, and the iame by a certain Priest, one Ovius Paccius, a very aged man: who avouched, that he fet these sacred and holy ceremonies from the old ancient Religion of the Samnits, according to the manner and custom, which in times past their ancestors had used, at what time as they completted complotted fecretly and conspired, to surprise Capua out of the Tuicans hands. When the facrifice H was done, the General of the army by his Pursevant at arms, commanded so cite and call forth by name, the noblett persons, either for parentage, or acts atchieved : who were brought into the place aforefaid, one by one. Amongst other preparations of this facred solemnity (which were able to firike a religious fear and devotion in a mans mind) there were certain altars erected in the midft of this place clotely covered in all parts, and facrifices lying flain all about, and the Centurions standing round with their swords ready drawn. Then the souldier was caused to approach neer the altars (like a facrifice himself, rather then one that should have his part of the sacrifice) and urged by vertue of an oath, to promife, that he would never utter absoad and reveal, whatfor ever he there should see or hear. Atterward he was put to swear, after an horrible and dreadful t form of words, framed and tending expresly to the cursing of his own person, his house and all his race and linige, in case, he went not into any battel, whereloever the Generals should lead him, and if either himself fled out of the field, or law any one to run away, and slew him not outright in the place. At the first verily, somethere were that refused to take such an oath, and presently were massacred by the Altars fide. And lying there along together with the beasts, which had their throats cut for facrifices, they served for a warning to teach all the rest how they made refusal. When the chief of the Samnits had taken this abominable and cursed oath, ten of them were elected and nominated by the foveraign Captain, who every one had in charge to chuse himfelf a fellow, and they likewise successively to take other to them, man by man, until they had made up the number of 16000. And these were called Lineata Legio [i, the linnen Legion] taking K the name of the covering of that inclosure, wherin the Nobility of the Samnits were sworn. These had given unto them brave and glorious armor, with helmers crefted and plumed, because they should seem taller then the rest. Another army there was, consisting of twenty thousand and better, who neither in goodly and tall personage, nor in martial prowers and reputation, nor yet in furniture and fetting out, were inferiour to the linnen Legion aforefaid. Lo, what a number there was of fighting men, even the whole strength and manhood of all Samnium, aftembled and encamped in Aquilon a.

The Roman Consuls took their journey from the City of Rome, and C. Carvilius first; unto whom were appointed the old Legions, which M. Airilim the Coniul of the former year, had left in the territory of Interanna. And with them he marched into Samnium. And mean while i that the enemies were over much bussed and amused about their superstitious ceremonies, and held their fecret and mystical councels, he won by force from the Samnits, the town Amiternum, Where almost 2800, men were slain, and 4270, taken prisoners. But Papprins, having by direction from the Senat enrolled a new army, forced the town Duronia; took fewer prisoners then his Collegue, but in lieu thereof, put many more to the tword. A rich booty there was got, both in the one place and the other. Afterwards, the Confuls overran the whole country of Samnium, but they poiled and wasted especially the lands about Atinium. Carvilius marched as far as Cominium, and Papprius to Aquilonia, where the whole power of the Samnits lay encamped. There, for a good while they neither fat fill, and were altogether idle in the camp, nor yet was there any hot service in the field. They spent the time in provoking them to fight, that gladly w would have fitten fill; or in lying off and giving ground, to those that affailed them: and thus, fay, with threatning, rather then offering battel, they passed the day. For whiles they began ever and anon, and gave over as quickly, there was no iffue feen of any skirmifhes, & the decision even offimall matters and occurrents were prolonged and put offirm day to day. The other camp of the Romans lay twenty miles off : and albeit the other Conful was absent yet his hand and counfel was in every enterprise and exploit. For as there lay a greater weight and charge at Aquilonia, then at Cominium: fo Carvilius had a more careful eye that way, then to the place which himself belieged. L. Papirius being now at all points provided to fight, dispatched a messenger to his Collegue, to fignifie unto him; that he minded the next day, if he were not checked by the Auspices to give the enemy battel: and withal that it was expedient and needful that he likewise N should with all his forces affault Cominium; that the Samnits within, might have neither means nor leifure to fend any succour to Aquilonia. This post had that one day allowed him to doe his messige, and attend his dispatch; and by night he made return; and brought word unto the Gonsul from his Collegue, that he liked well of his purpole and advice, Paprius then immediatly dismissed and sent away the courrier aforesaid, and assembled his souldiers to an audience, where he discoursed at large concerning war in general. Much he spake also as touching the present preparation and magnificent furniture of the enemies, more brave and goodly for shew and oftentation then effectual and of importance in the end: "For they are not the plumed crefts (quoth he) that give the deadly wounds, but the Romans spear and lance it is, that is able to " pierce their guilded and damasked shields : yea, and that other glittering army with milk white o "disper coats must be died red in blood, when they come to firoaks, and to try it out by dint " of fword. The golden and filvered armies of the Sampits, were sometimes by my father put to the fword, and killed to the last man: and they served rather for rich spoils to honour the victorious enemy, then for armor of proof, to defend and lave themselves. This is a fatal gift, " and deffined to our name and family, for to be chosen Generals, and to be opposed against the " greatest puissance and attempts of the Samnits, and to bring away with them, those spoils which might be ornaments to beautifie the publick places of the City. And the immortal gods

"no doubt are present to defend and affift us in our quarrel, against those that so oft have sought A "for peace and alliance, and as often broke the same themselves. And is a man may conjecture "and guess of the will and providence of the Gods, they never were to any army more adverse "and jull of indignity, then to that, which being stained and polluted with the blood of beasts "and men, massacred and mingled together in an horrible and execrable kind of sacrifice; and de-"vowed to a double anger of the gods, having in dread and horror of one fide, the vengeance " of the same gods, witnesses off their breach of covenants with the Romans; and on the other "fide the detettable and abominable curies, compriled in an oath, taken against all covenant and "promife: hath fworn by conftraint and perforce; hateth and deteffeth the oath whereby they "are perjured, and at one time, is in fear of the gods, of their own felves, and their enemies. Thus having shewed unto his souldiers (who were already of themselvs badly and malitiously enough bent against the enemies) that he had certain intelligence of all these things, by the conflant relation averted by certain fugitives that were fled from them unto him; they all being now full of affured hope of Gods help and mans, with one uniform cry called for battel; and nothing grieved them more then this, That it was put off until the morrow; hating in their hearts the rest of that day behind, and that one night, for being so long. About mid-night, Papyrius having received letters back from his Collegue, gat him up closely when all were tast afleed, and sent the chick-mafter to take token, & observe the presage of the pullets. There was not one throughout the whole camp, of what quality or degree foever but had a defire to fight. The highest as well as the lowest were earnest and eager: the Captains might behold and see the fouldiers affection and courage that way, and the fouldier likewife the Captains; in fo much that the fame ardent dente of battel which was in all the reft, reached also even to those that had the charge of the Autoices. For when as the chickens would not peck, the chick mafter adventured to lye and falline the token, and made report to the Conful, that it was "Tripudium folifimum. Whereat the Conful right glad and joyous pronounced that the token was lucky, and that they were to kens fell to fell with the Conful right glad and confuct of the gods; and hereupon he put forth the Gonal or blad this meas for fight under the favour and conduct of the gods; and hereupon he put forth the fignal or bloody eagerly, that banner of battel. As he was now marching forth into the field with his army, behold a fugitive with their haout of the enemies camp, brought word, that twenty cohorts or companies of Samnits, and those fly feeding, were about 400 in a cohort, were gone to Cominium. And because his Collegue Carvilius should some com rest not be ignorant hereof, he presently dispatched a currier in post unto him, and himself commanto the ground, ded the Entiens and Standards to be advanced and fet forward with speed, ordaining the bands and rebounin the rereward for fuccours, and disposing them in divers places, with Captains over the same, ded again; and accordingly. He appointed L. Volumnius to lead the right wing, and L. Scipio the left, and the this was Tripus, horsemen he committed to the conduct of two other Lieutenants, C. Ceditius, and Trebonius, man, and in As for Sp. Nautius, he charged him in all hafte to take off the pack-faddles from the Mules, and their learning to mount the cohorts of the light armed footmen that serve in the wings, upon their backs, and was reputed with them to fetch a compass, and to seize upon an hill there in soft, and in the heat of the con- the best Auflict, to shew himself from thence and to raise as great a cloud of dust as possibly he could. Whiles spicium in that the General was occupied hereabout, there arole some warbling amongst the chicken-masters leged most E touching the Auspice or presage of that day; inso much as they were over heard of the Roman happy success. horsemen; who supposing it a matter of good consequence and to be regarded, advertised Sp. Papyrius (the Confuls Nephew, or Brothers Son) that there was some doubt and question about the Autoice. The youth born in those days when there were no Atheitis, nor Lectures read of despising God and Religion; enquired farther into the matter, because he would not certifie any thing wherof he was not fure: and when he had found out the truth, gave knowledg thereof to the Conful: who said thus unto him, "God bless theemy son, and be not thou dismayed therat, "but fight hardly more valiantly, and do thy best endeavour. As for him that has the charge and "overfight of the Birds and Auspice, if he have made a wrong report, and given up a contrary " presage, or false sign, all the mischief and peril light upon his own head for his lewd lye. As for me F "I was told of a Tripudium, and that the birdsfell heartily to their meat and I hold it for a lucky "Anspice and token of good success unto the people of Rome and the army, and for no other. This faid, he commanded the Centurions to fet those pulletors, in the forefront of the battel. The Samnits also for their part set forward their Ensigns, and their battaillons follow after gallantly set out in gorgeous armor and brave apparrel, in such fort, as the very fight of the enemies represented a magnificent and stately shew to the beholders. But see what hapned; before the first shout given, before the first volly of shot and encounter, the principal Pulletier chanced to be stricken with a javelin lanced at aventure and at random, and fell down dead even before the Enfigns. Which being reported unto the Conful, "Behold the handy work of God (quoth he) the gods are prefent "in this battel, the guilty person hath his due reward. And as the Consul was a speaking these 6 words, lo, just before him a Raven set out a wide clear throat, and cried with a loud note: at which Augury, the Col, rejoiced, and avowed, that the gods appeared never in mens affairs more evidently. And herewith he commanded the trumpets to found, and to fet up a lufty shout then followed a cruel and cerrible fight on both fides, but with hearts and courages far unlike. The Romans were ravished and carried on end to the battel, with anger, hope, and heat of conflict greedy of bathing their swords, and embruing their hands in the enemies bloodshed. But the Samnies and offend the enemy. Neither had they sustained and held out the first shout, charge and H shock of the Romans (as having now for certain years past been used ever more to go away defeated and vanquished) but that a mightier fear imprinted and setled in their heart roots, held then perforce from running away: for they ever had continually represented in their eye, the whole furniture of that fecret factifice; of those armed factificers and Priests with naked (words; of that hideous butchery of men and of brute beafts, lying flain one with another in their blood intermingled together; of the Altars beiprinkled and stained with the lawful shedding of the one; and the detectable effusion of the other; of the dreadful and horrible execuations; and to conclude, of that frantick, furious, and detestable form of words, composed and devised to the detestation and malediction of their line and race. Being fast bound, I say, with these bonds for sleeing away, they flood to it, and flirred not back, fearing their own countrymen more then the enemies. The Romans from both points, and from the middle and main battaillon charged hotly, beat them down, killed and cut them in pieces, thus amazed and aftonied as they were with dread of gods and awe of man. Small refistance made they, as who only seared to flie and run away: fo as by this time, there was execution and havock made of them almost to the very Standards. At which very instant, there appeared overthwart from the one side a dust, as if a mighty army had raised it to their march; namely, Sp. Nautius (or as some say, Octavius Metius) who had the leading of certain Cohorts called Aleria, mounted upon Mules, which on purpose made a dust greater, then for that number they were. For those variets and new horsemen, as they fat on their Mules and Sumpter-beafts, drew after them trailing on the ground, boughs of w trees full of branches and leaves: and first, there appeared in the fore-front (as it were, through a duskish and dim light) their armour and guidons : but the dust behind them, rising higher and thicker, made shew of a troop of horsemen flanked an army of footmen : wherewith nor only the Samnits but Romans also were deceived. And the Conful himself, to avow the error and bear them down it was fo; cried aloud amongst the formost Ensigns, so as his voice reachedunto his enemies, That Cominium was won, and his Brother Conful was come with victory; and therefore, they should endeavour and emorce themselves to get the day, before that another army should win the honour out of their hands. Thus cried he out on horseback gallopping among the ranks to and fro. Then he commanded the Colonels and Centurions, to make a way for the men of arms. Himself asore, had willed Trebonius and Ceditius, that when they i espied him to bear his spear upright and to shake it, then they should with all the might they had, put forth the Cavalry and charge the enemies. Every thing was done at a beck, according as they were directed and instructed before hand. The wayes were made wide between the files. The horsemen sling out, and with spear in rest charge upon the middle battaillon of the eneinies, and brake their arrayes whereloever they charged. Volumnius and Scipio seconded them with the Infantry: and while they were difarrayed overthrew them, and bare them to the ground. Down went theie linnen Cohorts now, when God and man fought against them, and were difcomfitted : and as well those that took the oath, and the other that were uniworn, fled amain; and without respect of one thing or other, feared none but their enemies. All the footmen that escaped the battel, were beaten into their camp at Aquilonia. The Gentlemen and the men of M arms fled toward Bovianum. The Cavalry of the Romans pursued the horiemen, and the Infantry chaied the footmen. The wings took divers ways, the right toward the camp of the Samnits, the left unto the Town, V. Limnius was somewhat before, and got the Camp. Scipio found more resistance in the City: not for that vanquished men, as they were, had more courage and resolution, but because that walls are stronger to endure an assault, and better to keep out armed men, then a plain trench and rampart. For, from the Courtine, with stones they beat and repulied the enemy. Scipio for cleering well enough that they should be longer about the assault of a strong and senced town unless he dispatched the matter quickly and went through with it, in their first affright and confusion, before they took heart again: demanded of his souldiers. If they could take it well, and abide to see the camp won by the other point of N the battel, and themselves (being likewise Conquerors) to be repelled from the City Gates? When they all cried, No; and faid they would never endure that difgrace: himself with his target over his head, approached the gate, the others following afterunder a target-sense, rush into the City, thrust down the Samnits about the Gate, and gat to the Walls: but to engage themfelves farther into the City, they durst not, being fo few as they were. The Conful himselfe at the first knew nothing of all this, but was occupied about the retreat, and rallying of his men: for now the sun was well neer down; and the night comming on apace, caused every thing evento the very victors to feem dangerous and impicious. But when he was advanced farther, he faw on the right hand the camp taken: and on the left, he heard a confused cry and tumult in the City, compounded of the noise of fighting men, and frighted persons: and even at that inflant, it fortuned, that they skirmished at the gate, Then he rode on, neerer and neerer, and saw his own men upon the Walls, howbeit nothing yet sully performed; but through the rash adventure and fool-hardiness of some few, an overture only made, and some advantage got of performing a great piece of service and worthy exploit. Whereupon, he commanded the forces that were retired to be called, and with banner displayed to enter the City. So soon as they were in, they took the next quarter to the Gate, and for that the night approached, there they refled, and went no farther. But even in that very night, the enemies abandoned the Town.

A There were flain that day before Aquilonia 30340 Samnits, and 3870 taken prifoners: and of field enfigns they went away with 90. Moreover, this is reported and recorded of Papprius, that there had not been lightly feen a General in any battel more lightlome, chearfull, and merry; were it of his own natural diposition, or upon affured considence of victory. Upon which contage and resolution, he could not be revoked from battel, albeit there was some diection and Kraple about the Auspice: and even in the hottrest time, and dangerous point of the conslict, at what time as the manner is to vow temples to the immortal gods: he vowed unor Japater Victor, Islo be that he defeated the Legions of the enemies, to present him with a cup of a sweet and pleasar mead, before he drank any strong and heady wine of the gape; which vow the gods accepted and pliked of, and turned the ill presage of the Auspices to good.

The other Confull had as good speed at Cominium: For at the break of day he approached with all his forces to the wals of the town, and invested it round about: and set strong guards at the gates, for fear they should iffue or fally forth. And even as he was about to give the figuall of affault, there came a messenger post from his sellow Cons, who in great affright brought word of the coming of twenty cohorts to the succour of them within the City: which both kept him short from giving the assault, and caused him to call back again part of his forces, which were arranged and ready under the counterfearp to affail the defendants. Then he gave charge to Decius Bratus Seava, one of the Lieutenants, to take the first legion and twenty cohorts of the wings, and other horiemen, to make head against the reicue of the enemies aforesaid; and wheresoever he met them, there to impeach them, yea, and if occasion served, to give them battel; and in no case to suffer that power to come to Cominium. Himself commanded that ladders should be reared on every fide of the town, and under a fence of targets approached the gates. So that in an inflant the gates were burst open, and the wals scaled on every part. The Samnits, as their hearts served them well enough to keep the enemies from entrance, before they faw any armed men upon the wals: fo, after they perceived, that they were affailed not aloof with stones and darts, but fast by and with hand-ftrokes : and how that they, who hardly and with great difficulty from the plain gat up the wals, having now gained and furmounted the place (which they most feared before) could fight at ease from alost with their enemy, who was not able to match them in the even ground; quit their towers and wals, and gathered all together in the market place, and there for D2 while tried the utmost hazard of battel. But afterwards throwing down their weapons, 15400 of them yielded themselves to the Consul his mercy. There were stain 4380. Thus went the game at Cominium, and thus at Aquilonia.

In the mid way between these two Cities, where a third battel was looked for, the enemies were not to be found. And when they were seven miles off from Cominium, they had a countermand from their own country-men, and were called away, and so came not to the rescue, neither in the one battellnor the other. In the flutting in of the evening, when it began to be dark, being within the tight of the Camp of one hand, and Aquilonia on the other; they might hear a like noise and crystrom both parts, which caused them to pause. But afterwards, when they were over-against the Camp which was fired by the Romans; the flame spreading far r abroad declared the defeat of the Samnits more evidently, and stated them there for going farther. In which very place they laid down here and there in their armour (as they were) and passed a restless and unquier long night, expecting (and yet fearing) the light of the day. At the dawning whereof, and so soon as it began to peep, while they were uncertain and doubtfull what way to take they hapned to be discovered by the cavalry of the enemies: and suddenly in a fearfull amaze and affright, they took them to their heels and fled in great difordet. Those horsemen having pursued the Samnits, who in the night season escaped out of the town, chanced to efpy this forefaid multitude, and perceived they were neither entrenched, nor defended with a good corps de guard. This company was descried also even from the wals of Aquilonia: whereupon by this time the legionary footmen likewise made after them; but they could not overrake r them in the chase, so fast they fled : howbeit the horsemen cut off some, and slew two hundred and fourcore in the tail of the rereguard. In this affright they left much armour behind them, and eighteen enligns, and so the rest of the army faved themselves, and as well as they might in so fearfull confusion, recovered Bovianum. The joy of these two Romans armies was wonderfully encreased, to see one another have so good and fortunate success in their enterprises. Both the Confuls, by each others advice and confert, gave their towns thus won unto the fouldiers to be facked and rifled : and after the goods were out; to fet fire on the empty houses; in such wise, that in one and the fame day both Aquilonia and Cominium were burnt to ashes: and the Consuls, with mutuall congratulation and joy, as well between their Legions as themselves, seasting one another joyned both their Camps in one. Afterwards in the fight of both Armies, Carvilius highly G commended and praised his fouldiers every one as he deferved, and rewarded them with eifts accordingly. Papyrins also for his part, who had performed many and fundry skirmishes as well in the field and battel, as about the winning of the Camp and forcing the City, bestowed by way of honour upon Sp. Nautius, and Sp. Papprius his brothers ion, as also upon four Centurions and the band of the Halfari or Javelineers, bracelets and coronets of gold: and namely, Naurius for that he bare filmfelf to worthily in that journey and expedition, wherein with his counterfeit troop of horsemen upon Mules, he so terrified the enemy, as if he had conducted a main army of men at armes: and young Papyrius for his good service with his cavalry as well in the battel and con-flich, as also in that night, wherein he forced the Samnits to flie secretly, and quit the City Aqui-H logia: the Centurions and fouldiers, in this regard, that they were the first who seized the gates and wals of that town; as for all the horsemen, in consideration of their manifold travell, and brave exploits shewed in fundry places, he gave them bracelets and little horns of filver. This done. for a fmuch as it was time now to withdraw their army from out of Samnium, either both twain, or one of them alone, they fate in Council and confultation thereupon: and thought it was the better course (to the end that the Samnits might be brought lower, and their state more sensibly decayed) to go forwad fill, and charge them with greater force and refolution, and to purfue the rest that was behind; that Samnium might be delivered up to the Consuls their successors, utterly tamed and subdued: since that the enemies now had no army abroad in field, like either i to give or abide another battel; and there remained but one manner of making war, even to befiege and affault their Cities and firong Towns; by the winning and subversion whereof, they might with the pillage enrich and make their own fouldiers for ever, and with all impoverish their enemies, and make a hand of them quite being now at the last cast, forced to fight for Church and Home. Hereupon the Confuls dispatched their letters to the Senat and people of Rome, containing the effect at large of all their exploits; and then divided themselves, and took two severall waies; Papyrius marched with his legions to the fiege of Sepinum; and Carvilius with his to befiege Voluna.

The Confuls letters were read and heard with exceeding joy, as well in the court of the Councill of the City, as in the Common Hall of affemblies; and this publike contentment and rejoy- K cing was folempized with generall processions, for the space of four daies, and with marvellous zeal, affection, and devotion of private persons in particular, And to say a truth, this victory was to the state of Rome not only great and honourable, but also of great consequence, in regard that it fell out in fo good and commodious a time. For even then, news came, that Tulcany was revolted and rebelled, and men began to cast in their minds, and discourse how they should do (in case ought should hap but well in Samnium) to withstand the forces and invasions of the Tuscans: who taking heart, and prefuming upon the Samnits, and their curfed and execrable oath. by vertue whereof they were obliged to light to the utmost extremity, embraced the occasion and opportunity of taking armes again, whiles both the Conjuls and the whole forces of Rame were diverted and withdrawn into Samnium and there employed. The Embassadors of their al- L lies and confederats, were by M. Airileus the Przetor brought into the Senat, and had audience given them; where they complained, that their Territories were over-run, burnt, and spoyled, by the Tuscans their next neighbours; and all because they were unwilling to revolt from the people of Rome: humbly beleeching the LL, of the Senate, to defend and protect them against the violence, wrong, and outrage of common enemies. Answer was returned unto the Embassadors: That the Senate would have regard that their allies should have no cause to repent of their faithfull allegeance, and constant loyalty; and that ere many daies went over their heads, the Tufcans should taste of the same cup that the Samnits had begun unto them. Howbeit, they would have been flack and cold enough in dealing with the Tuicans, had not fresh news come, that the Falifei also, who had for many years continued in amity and friendship with the people of Rome, M were combined with the the Tulcans and entred into arms, as well as they. The near neighbourbood of this nation, gave an edge to the Senators, and whet them on, to take care and ordain. that their Feciall Heralds should be addressed thither to demand restitution and amends for harms done: which being denied, and no goods restored; by the advice and authority of the Senat, together with the grant of the people, war was proclamed against the Tuscans : and the Confuls were commanded to cast lots, whether of them should pass out of Samnium with his forces, into Tuscany

By this time now Carvilius had won Volana, Palumbinum, and Herculaneum, towns appertaining to the Samnits. Volana was forced within few daies: Palumbinum, the fame day that he came before the wals: but at Herculaneum, he fought two severall battels, with doubtfull and uncer-N tain iffue, yea, and with more loss of his own part than of the enemies. But afterwards he pitched his camp before the town, beleaguered the enemies, and kept them within their walls, gave the assault, and won it in the end. In these three towns there were either taken prisoners of flain in all, to the number of ten thousand: but so, as through fear the greater part by far, suffered themselves to be captives, rather then to dye on the edge of the iword.

The Confuls cast lots for their Provinces; and it fell unto Carviliasto go into Tuscany, as the fouldiers wished and defired who could no longer away with the rigour of cold weather in Samnium. Asfor Papirius, he found a greater power of enemies, and more refistance, before Sepinum. Many a time he was fought withall inbattell arranged: oftskirmished with in his march: year and oftentimes under the very walls, the enemies fallied out against him from the Town, in such O fort as he could not tell what to make of it: for neither was it to be called properly a fiege alone, nor yet altogether a battell fight; considering that the enemies were no more protected and covered themselves, by thestrength of their walls; than the walls were defended by force of arms, and men of war: howbeit in the end, what with fighting and what with skirmifning, the lodged them within the City so as they durst come abroad no more, but kept themselves close, and were befieged indeed: and after long fiege, as well with forcible affaults, as by trenches, baftils, and rampiers, he was mafter of the town: and therefore after he was possessed of it, upon anger and a choler that they had so long stood out and put him to so much trouble, that there was more blond-fied; and seven thousand died by the sword, whereas under three thousand were taken priloners. The spoil and pillage, which was exceeding great, considering that the Samnits had laid up all their gods in some few Cities, was given to the souldiers. And now lay the snow thick all over upon the ground: neither could menendure abroad in the field without houle and harbor: and thereupon the Conful retired his Army out of Samnium. Against his comming to Rome, it was decreed by the general voice of all men, that he should triumph: and so he triumphed whiles he was in his Magistracy, with great magnificence, and sumptuous pomp, as those daies would afford. For as well his footmen as horsemen marched and passed by in a shew, adorned with their
